Resolved, That the statue be accepted, to remain in the National Statuary Hall, and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, be forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Wisconsin.

UNITED STATES COURTS, ROANOKE, VA.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7668) to establish a term of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Roanoke, Va., in the western district of Virginia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a term of the district and circuit courts of the United States shall be held in each year at Roanoke, in the western district of Virginia, on the Tuesday after the second Monday in February and August.

SEC. 2. That the counties of Roanoke, Botetourt, Giles, Craig, Franklin, Montgomery, Floyd, Pulaski, Tazewell, Bland, and Carroll, and city of Roanoke shall be attached to the division of the court established by the first section of this act, and all process running to said counties shall be returnable to said counties.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Amendments recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary were adopted, as follows:

Section 2, line 3, strike out the words "city of Roanoke."

Section 2, line 6, strike out the word "counties" and insert "courts."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OTEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT ORIENT POINT, LONG ISLAND, ETC.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 853, providing for the erection of a light-house at Orient Point, Long Island, New York, and for the proper lighting of the entrances to Greenport and Sag Harbor, and the west shore of Shelter Island.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Light-House Board is hereby authorized and directed to erect a light-house at the site of the beacon heretofore existing at Orient Point, or Oyster Pond Reef, on the west side of Plum Gut, at the entrance of Long Island Sound, in the State of New York, and the said Board shall also erect beacon lights or gas buoys at the following points in the county of Suffolk, N. Y.:

First. On Hay Beach Point, Shelter Island.

Second. At the end of the Greenport breakwater, Greenport.

Third. On Conklings Point, about 2 miles west of Greenport.

Fourth. On Rocky or Stearns Point, on Shelter Island.

Fifth. On Hallowes or Paradise Point, on Great Hog Neck, opposite Shelter Island.

Sixth. On Tyndalls Point or Clarks Point, north of Sag Harbor.

Seventh. On the shore south of West Neck Harbor, on Shelter Island.

Eighth. On the shoal about three-fourths of a mile north of the Sag Harbor wharf, Long Island.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $65,000, to be available immediately, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing and placing the foregoing light-house, beacons, and buoys.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I observe that there is no limitation in the bill as to the expenditure.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I do not know that I caught the reading of the bill accurately, but if I did it seems to be an omnibus bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, no. The other items in the bill in addition to the light-house are for small gas buoys.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should like to hear the report.

Mr. McCORMICK. I will ask the Clerk to read the report.

The report (by Mr. CORLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 853) providing for the erection of a light-house at Orient Point, Long Island, New York, and for the proper lighting of the entrances to Greenport and Sag Harbor and the west shore of Shelter Island, report the same back with an amendment, and recommend that the bill thus amended do pass.

The correspondence from the Department herewith submitted shows the necessity for the proposed legislation.

The committee recommend to amend by striking out all of section 2.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 15, 1896.

SIR: The letter from your committee of January 6, 1896, inclosing House bill No. 853, providing for the erection of a light-house at Orient Point, Long Island, New York, and for the proper lighting of the entrance to Greenport and Sag Harbor and the west shore of Shelter Island, and asking suggestions touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage has been received.

This matter was referred to the Light-House Board, which has replied that it recommends the establishment of a light-house and steam whistle at Orient Point or Oyster Pond Reef, at the entrance of Plum Gut, Long Island, and gas beacons on eight points or shoals on the course to Greenport Harbor, and thence to Sag Harbor.

Respectfully, yours,

S. WIKE, Acting Secretary.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, if I am correctly advised, the Light-House Board classifies these light-houses under three heads: Indispensable, necessary, and desirable. I should be glad to have the gentleman in charge of this bill state in what class this proposed light-house comes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Indispensable, beyond question. This light-house is on the great route through Long Island Sound to New England, and is intended to take the place of a small light that was carried away a year or two ago.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Missouri will permit me, I will state that the Light-House Board takes up all of the light-houses, beacons, and fog signals that are authorized by Congress, and in its annual report classifies them under the heads of indispensable, necessary, and desirable; but I do not understand that the Committee on Commerce ever makes such classification.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has the gentleman from Texas any information as to the propriety or necessity of this expenditure?

Mr. SAYERS. None at all. I know nothing about it.

Mr. McCORMICK. There has not been a more meritorious bill before the House in this session. This proposed light-house is right on the highway of travel from New York to New England. It is at a point which thousands of passengers pass every week.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the whole proposed cost?

Mr. McCORMICK. Sixty-five thousand is the estimated cost.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is to be the running cost when these appliances are under way?

Mr. McCORMICK. That I do not know.

Mr. McMILLIN. Well, if you want $6,500 for this light-house and these beacon lights or gas buoys, which, I think, are the most expensive kind of appliances, it strikes me that the cost of maintenance after construction will be very considerable. I do not know but this light-house may be necessary, but I call the attention of the House to the probable cost.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a single statement to the House. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, the revenues of the Government failed to meet current expenses by $69,808,260.58. During the last fiscal year the current income was inadequate to meet current liabilities by $43,805,223.18, and it is now estimated that the deficiency in current revenues for the present fiscal year will not be less than $25,000,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. And eleven millions more for Pacific Railroad bonds, making the estimated deficiency $36,000,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. My information is that the deficiency will be about twenty-five millions.

Mr. DINGLEY. But that does not include the Pacific Railroad bonds.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman from Maine is accurate in his statement it only emphasizes the fact I desire to press upon the attention of the House.

Mr. Speaker, our current revenues are unequal to the task of meeting the current expenses of the Government. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, just why that statement should be applauded by my friends from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. We were expressing our gratification at the gentleman's statement with regard to the deficiency. This is the first time the fact has been admitted by a Democrat.

Mr. DOCKERY. I did not know that any intelligent Democrat had ever denied it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There must be a great scarcity of intelligent Democrats, then.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I rose in a perfectly judicial frame of mind to state a few facts, but it is apparent that the gentlemen desire to provoke a partisan discussion. So far as I have heard, and I have been a regular attendant, no gentleman on this side of the House has denied—and I challenge the gentleman from Pennsylvania to produce the record to the contrary—that the current income of the Government during the period I have mentioned has been inadequate to meet current expenses. It is true we have a surplus of $273,873,417.73 in the Treasury, including the $100,000,000 gold reserve, but the gentleman and the country know how that surplus was created. It is the result of borrowing money by the issue of bonds.

Mr. DINGLEY. Exactly.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, then, the Government is confronted with this unfortunate Treasury situation, and as business men, without regard to party affiliations, it seems to me that we should determine either to increase taxation, borrow money by the continued issue of Government bonds, or reduce expenditures. Of these methods, I prefer a reduction of expenditures.

Mr. MAHON. Let them pass the revenue bill over in the Senate.

Mr. DOCKERY. We do not desire to pass a prohibitory "revenue" bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, this is our situation in respect to revenue and expenditures. This Congress has met that condition by doing what? You have already authorized by the bills that have passed the House or pending in the Senate contracts amounting to $93,541,147.91. That is to say, the river and harbor bill as reported to the Senate carries an authorization of contracts, additional to the $12,609,550 of direct appropriations, of $60,623,871.91; the naval bill as passed by the House authorizes the construction of four battle ships and ten torpedo boats, which it is estimated will cost, additional to the amount appropriated, $27,375,000; the fortification bill as passed by the House authorizes contracts, additional to appropriations, of $5,542,276, making the total contracts authorized (and certainly the amount will not be decreased) $93,541,147.91. The appropriation bills as they left this body carried $505,079,410.88. So that, without taking into account the six and a half million dollars added by the Senate to the sundry civil bill, without reference to the certain increase of the deficiency bill and increases upon other bills, the specific appropriations of this Congress amount now to $505,079,410.88, and on contracts authorized $93,541,147.91, making a grand total of appropriations and liabilities of $598,620,558.79.

It can not be stated at this time with absolute accuracy what the increases of the Senate will be; but I assume that the bills when they become laws will carry not less than $7,000,000 (a very conservative estimate) additional to the $505,000,000 carried when they left the House. It is obvious, therefore, that as a net result of the action of this Congress the direct appropriations will aggregate not less than $512,000,000, and contracts not less than $93,000,000, making the enormous total of $605,000,000 of liabilities and appropriations for the session.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that discarding partisanship—in view of inadequate revenues—in view of the liabilities already imposed by this Congress—the hour has come when the House and Senate should call a halt on appropriations unless they be absolutely indispensable for the proper conduct of the public service.

Mr. McCORMICK. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has taken occasion to make a speech on national affairs, a political speech—a speech for the country at large—in connection with the proposition to pass a simple bill of which he evidently knows nothing—a bill, I may say, that involves no national or party issue, and that no man who examines it can reasonably object to. No matter what the financial obligations of the Government are, or may be, it can not afford—no Government could afford—to expose life and property in the manner they are now exposed in my district for the want of a single light-house. The light-house for which this bill provides is to be constructed on Long Island Sound, directly in the line of all water travel between New York and New England. It will be nearly opposite New London, on one of the most important points upon Long Island. The temporary light-house which was formerly at this point—Orient Point—a small and inadequate affair—was destroyed several years ago, and all the people have petitioned for a new and permanent light; and it is indispensable to safe navigation.

Beyond the through travel on Long Island Sound, which, as gentlemen know, is an enormous travel, thousands of passengers go to Shelter Island and other points at the east end of Long Island annually by steamboats, and need the use of this light. Its establishment has been urged by the officers of all the steamboats and all the navigation companies doing business on Long Island Sound. It also has the approval of all the Government authorities. It was approved by the Light-House Board before I introduced it, and has since been twice approved in communications to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The president of the Light-House Board has within a few days expressed to me the hope that this bill will be passed at this session. I may say that since I introduced the bill a wreck has occurred for lack of the light.

The bill does not carry an appropriation. That must be put in a regular appropriation bill. I do not know that we shall get a dollar this year. At most only enough will be asked to start the work, which should not be delayed to another season, which it will be little less than criminal to delay.

I repeat, there is no more important bill of this class before this House, no more meritorious and unobjectionable bill, no bill that ought to receive more prompt consideration. Congress can not afford to neglect to pass a bill of this kind where the question of the protection of life and property on one of the most important maritime highways in the Northern States is involved.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman one question in relation to this bill; and let me say that if my question to the gentleman inflamed my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], I am willing to withdraw that question. [Laughter.] I should like to know why this bill carries a provision for buoys. It is unusual for Congress to provide in this way for the establishment of buoys. The Light-House Board has ample authority and ample funds to provide buoys wherever they may be needed.

Mr. McCORMICK. That provision has been inserted because around Shelter Island, as anyone familiar with that island knows, these buoys are necessary at every point.

Mr. LOUD. I do not doubt that; but why is special provision for them carried in this bill? It has never been customary for Congress to provide specifically for the establishment of buoys.

Mr. McCORMICK. The buoys are carried in the bill, let me say to the gentleman, with the knowledge and approval of the Light-House Board and the House committee.

Mr. LOUD. The Board can establish them where they think there is necessity for their establishment, and I do not see the propriety of making specific provision for them.

Mr. McCORMICK. Probably the Board has not money enough.

Mr. LOUD. This provision would not give them any more money.

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, then, it can do no harm to put the provision in the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Only to this extent, that it is an entire departure from the custom which has prevailed heretofore with reference to this matter. There are hundreds of places throughout the country that no doubt need this system of buoys just as much as the point the gentleman refers to, but this undertakes to direct the Light-House Board where to establish them. I do not think it ought to be in the bill for that reason.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Light-House Board has made no objection to the direction or designation made in the bill, and I do not feel at liberty to strike out all reference to the buoys; certainly not without further consultation with the Board.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to interrupt the consideration of this bill, but deem it necessary and proper at this time to make a single word of response to the remarks of my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. Speaker, no one feels more deeply than I do, or has felt during the entire session of Congress, the importance of exercising the most rigid economy in the appropriations for carrying on the Government. We all know that since the 1st day of July, 1893, the revenues of the Government have not been sufficient to meet the current expenditures of the Government. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has stated, up to the present time the deficiency of revenue to meet the current expenditures of the Government is nearly $138,000,000 since the date mentioned, July 1, 1893. In addition to this we have been called upon to pay maturing Pacific railway bonds to the extent of $11,000,000 more; so that we now have a deficiency arising from all sources to the extent of nearly $149,000,000, and with the absolute certainty that this deficiency is to continue. And this deficiency has been practically met by the sale of bonds, for it has been necessary to use greenbacks redeemed with the gold obtained by the sale of bonds to pay this deficiency, and thus these greenbacks have been put in a position to be again presented for redemption.

More than that, on the 1st day of January next, nine and three-quarter million dollars more of Pacific bonds will mature, and must be met, with no revenue in sight to meet them.

Now, it is well known that so far as we are concerned on this side of the House, we have recognized the fact that this Government, with the utmost economy, can not be run with the revenues we are now receiving under the present revenue laws and with the condition of business industries of the past three years. It is impossible, with the utmost economy, to run the Government with the revenue we are likely to have from that system of laws for some time to come.

We proposed to increase the revenues to the extent of $40,000,000 a year in order to meet this exigency, and passed a bill for that purpose; but we all understand that that bill has not yet become a law, and is not very likely to become a law at the present session of Congress.

With respect to appropriations already made, it is very true that, in form, including the so-called permanent and indefinite appropriations, the appropriations made by this session of Congress are likely to exceed a little the sum of $500,000,000. But it must be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that $500,000,000 of that sum, coming under the head of so-called permanent appropriations, is the estimated amount to be set aside for the purposes of the sinking fund, which is not of course an ordinary expenditure but an estimate for a reduction of the interest-bearing debt. The actual appropriations for current expenses of the Government, including postal expenses paid by postal revenue, and for interest on the public debt, therefore will slightly exceed $450,000,000 this session. The revenues, unless there shall be a considerable increase, under existing laws will not reach that sum in all probability. Including postal revenues, they are estimated for the next fiscal year at about four hundred and forty or fifty millions.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. PITNEY. On the point of the comparison between the appropriations made during the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses, respectively—

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, there has been no increase of appropriations.

Mr. PITNEY. Permit me to ask this question: When the appropriations come to be made up—that is, the total appropriations for the two Congresses—they include the permanent annual appropriations, and the sum total is made up in part of the interest on the public debt and in part of the sinking fund, which goes to diminish the principal of that debt—

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely.

Mr. PITNEY (continuing). And is it not true that the recent bond issues, amounting to $262,000,000 during the present Administration, have increased the annual interest account of the Government by eleven and a half million dollars and the annual expenditures on account of the sinking fund by over two and a half millions?

Mr. DINGLEY. I was about to say that the interest on the public debt now will exceed by eleven and a half million dollars the amount it had reached two years ago, and simply because of the fact that during this Administration, in a time of peace, the bonded indebtedness of the Government has been increased over $262,000,000, thereby increasing the interest charge carried in the permanent appropriations to that extent. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, in view of this condition of things, it is important that we should be exceedingly careful with respect to appropriations; and I want to say, in general, so far as this House has acted, it has thus far been very careful. I may say again, with reference to the contracts that have been authorized in the river and harbor bill and in the naval appropriation bill and in connection with fortifications, they will amount, in the course of five years, to sixteen or eighteen millions a year. But bear in mind that these expenditures are to be stretched over the future, and will probably amount to about $18,000,000 a year. So far as that is concerned, of course we are appropriating during this session of Congress for some contracts made by past Congresses. The contract system has been thought to be economical, and hence contracts are authorized for the future, stretching over a number of years; but on the whole it is regarded as wiser than the simple appropriation from year to year. I think that perhaps some of the contracts which have been authorized have been larger than they should have been, but, nevertheless, in the end there is no doubt of the economy of that system. So, therefore, when it is said that at this session of Congress $90,000,000 of contracts have been authorized, it must be borne in mind that they are stretched over at least five years; that it will take five years to cover all these contracts, and that we are now appropriating money for contracts that have been made in the past; and the one fact offsets the other.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. In nearly every instance, let me say, no new project has been begun under the contract system. They are all old projects.

Mr. DINGLEY. Very well, but I am not discussing that question at all.

Mr. SAYERS. I am sure the gentleman does not wish to give an erroneous impression to the House?

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all.

Mr. SAYERS. When the gentleman seeks to draw a comparison between the present session of this Congress and either session of the last Congress in reference to contracts authorized, if the gentleman will examine the appropriations he will find that the last Congress at each session was required to make much larger appropriations in order to meet contracts which that Congress did not authorize than does the present Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is so, I presume. The amount of actual appropriations by this Congress is substantially what the appropriations have been for several years. There is no increase of aggregate appropriations, as might be inferred from what has been said—certainly not outside of the increase of interest on the public debt. We are running along as carefully, on the whole, as we probably can, with the Government and its needs as they are. We need more revenue. There is no doubt about that at all; but it should be borne in mind that we have not appropriated $500,000,000 for current expenses. It is about $450,000,000, including the postal appropriation, which is paid by postal revenues. The amount of actual expenditure that must be paid by taxes outside of the postal revenue under the appropriations authorized by this Congress for the next fiscal year will be about $360,000,000, about a million dollars a day.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to submit to the gentleman whether this discussion at the present stage, so far as the relative appropriations at either session of the last Congress and the present session of this Congress are concerned, is not premature?

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, I admit that, but when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] made the statements he did I was not willing to have it go to the country in the precise form in which they were made without a suggestion in response. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to say to the gentleman—

Mr. SAYERS. One other question. I am not taking any part in this discussion, except that the House may not have an erroneous impression. The gentleman from Maine spoke of an increased amount of permanent appropriations because of the interest due upon the bonds issued by the present Administration. That was something over $11,000,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. Eleven and a half million dollars increase in the interest that we have to appropriate for.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not question the gentleman's figures. Now, after deducting the $11,500,000 rendered necessary on account of the interest on bonds issued by the present Administration, the gentleman will find that the appropriations at this session of Congress are still in excess of those of either session of the last Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do you mean the first session?

Mr. SAYERS. Either one of them.

Mr. DINGLEY. The appropriations at the first session of Congress are usually more than those of the second session.

Mr. SAYERS. Not in the Fifty-first Congress. The appropriations of the last session of the Fifty-first Congress were $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 more than the appropriations at its first session. In the last Congress the appropriations at the last session were smaller than those of the first session. That is to say, the appropriations were smaller after the election than before.

Mr. DINGLEY. That depends—

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Maine suggests that I made reference to comparative appropriations. I made no comparison with the appropriations of former Congresses, but will make that later on.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is true that the gentleman made no comparisons directly, but I was not willing for the inference to go to the country from his remarks that there had been larger appropriations made at this session of Congress than have been appropriated on an average for four or five sessions of Congress past.

Now, so far as that is concerned, when it is stated that we are a billion-dollar Congress, making appropriations of $500,000,000 for each session, bear in mind that these billion dollars include $100,000,000 of estimated payment of debt; $50,000,000 each year is put in what is called the permanent and indefinite appropriations.

Mr. SAYERS. The sinking fund was put in the sum total of permanent and indefinite appropriations for the last Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. When we come down to the real matter of public expenditures there have been no larger appropriations at this Congress than at the several sessions of Congress that have preceded for four or five years. Yet we ought to be extremely careful as to appropriations, because of the fact we do not have revenue sufficient to meet the current expenditures of the Government. Notwithstanding this House has passed a bill to provide this additional revenue, yet another body refuses to take it up, even for consideration. The fact that we have not sufficient revenue and that we are in this situation is not because of any fault at this end of the Capitol.

Now, in reference to this particular bill, I am not prepared to say from the information before us whether it is "indispensable" that this light-house should be erected during the present year. If it is not, then there should be a postponement until we shall obtain more revenue. For it seems that we shall have to appeal to the people to obtain a President and a Senate before we can get more revenue. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he would consent to the introduction of a proviso that no work should be done on this until more revenue is obtained?

Mr. MCCORMICK. I consider this is an "indispensable" work. A wreck or two have occurred at that place since I introduced the bill. It is opposite New London, a section which is traveled extensively. The bill has the approval of all the steamboat people, all the captains that go up and down the Sound. The owners of the large steamers engaged in the Newport, Stonington, and Fall River trade think it is indispensable. They think that an appropriation of $25,000 would be sufficient; but there is no appropriation in this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I would suggest, before unanimous consent should be given, that there ought to be a proviso inserted to the effect that the cost of the work herein named shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $65,000.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I will accept that proviso.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. This communication from the Treasury Department does not say whether this is an "indispensable," "necessary," or "desirable" case. Has the gentleman information as to whether the Treasury Department consider this "indispensable"? It seems to me that we ought not to go further than the cases that are reported as "indispensable."

Mr. MCCORMICK. I am assured by the Department that it is absolutely "indispensable," and that it ought to be done at once, and that there ought to be a small appropriation.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman to include in this bill a provision to appropriate the money necessary to build the light-house. If it ought to be built the money ought to be appropriated; and if it should not, we ought not to pass the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman from Tennessee is very well aware of the fact that for several years we have not put an appropriation in the bill authorizing the construction of a light-house, because only a small portion of the cost could be used in the fiscal year, and the appropriation is put in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think my friend will find that the custom has been both ways.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not in recent years.

Mr. McMILLIN. Sometimes it is put in, and sometimes it is not put in.

Mr. McCORMICK. I would be glad to have this appropriation made, but I am told this is not the appropriate place for it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Any appropriation for a light-house goes into the sundry civil bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. So I understand. Only a small sum will be required for use this season.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw this bill and present it again to the House in the regular form.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have had this bill on the Calendar for two months, and every day I have been receiving letters and telegrams urging its passage.

Mr. LOUD. Well, this is a departure from the usual custom, and I think I shall have to object on that ground.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

MARRIAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1904) to regulate marriages in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with, as I think it is fairly understood.

There was no objection.

Mr. BABCOCK. The Senate has refused to concur in the House amendments. I move that the House insist and agree to a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, Mr. ODELL, and Mr. COBB.

THE CAPITAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I also call up the bill (S. 888) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," etc.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MAHON. I object.

The bill was read in full, with the amendments.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the House insist upon its amendments to the Senate bill and agree to a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. BABCOCK, Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, and Mr. RICHARDSON.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bankruptcy bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8110) to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the opposition is now entitled to occupy as much time as was occupied on yesterday by the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes; go ahead.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, the consideration of this bill does not involve any question of party politics. It is a matter which simply calls for the best judgment and the best thought of the members of this House without any reference whatever to their party affiliations. Republicans and Democrats alike will favor the bill and oppose it. While I regret to take issue with so many members who, I believe, sincerely favor the passage of this bill, I do so only from a firm conviction that the passage of an involuntary bankruptcy bill would be a great misfortune and disaster to this country. We borrow our common law from England, and underlying our codes of State law the principles of the common law as compiled by Sir William Blackstone are found. Naturally we look to England as a guide in the matter of a bankrupt law, and while it is admitted that England has a bankrupt law, yet it is a fact that it has been found almost an impossibility in that country to obtain a law that was satisfactory to the people and that worked good results to debtors and creditors alike.

They have had some sort of a bankrupt law in England ever since the time of Henry VIII. In 1825 they undertook to pass a general statute, and they have been amending that and passing new laws from time to time ever since. In 1825 the various existing acts of bankruptcy were consolidated and some amendments were made. Long before that they had various provisions of law pertaining to bankruptcy, but gentlemen will find on examination that those laws were not consolidated until 1825. That law of 1825 was amended in 1831, was changed in 1841, changed again in 1847, changed again in 1849, again in 1861, again in 1869 and in 1869, until they came down to the year 1893, when they enacted an entirely new bankrupt law. The history of bankruptcy legislation in England has not been satisfactory, but when we come to compare that country with this, when we realize the fact that the laws for all England are made in one legislative body and that the whole country, including Wales, is not so large as the States of Virginia and West Virginia—when we realize these facts and compare that country with our own, where 44 States are making laws, where the principal part of the laws relating to the subject of debts and credits are made by the States, and where there is a conflict between the States in reference to the insolvent and debtor laws, we can understand how much less the probability is that a uniform law can be enacted which will be satisfactory to the people in a country like ours. If this were the first attempt to pass a United States bankrupt law, if this were our first experiment, we might very properly enter upon the subject in an entirely different frame of mind from that in which we are compelled to be in the light of history.

We have had three United States bankrupt laws. The first was passed in 1800. It was intended to remain in force, and it provided that it should remain in force for five years. It was repealed at the end of three years. That law applied only to involuntary bankruptcy, and the acts for which a man could be put into bankruptcy were all acts of actual fraud, not of constructive fraud. Yet that law was so unpopular, so unfavorably regarded by the people, that Congress was quick to repeal it, being unwilling to wait even for the two years at the end of which it would have expired by limitation. Then we had the bankrupt law of 1841. That law lived about two years. So much hostility, so much objection, was manifested to it that Congress, bowing to the will of the people—the debtors and creditors alike—repealed it. That law was repealed under the same Administration under which it had been enacted. This brings us down to the act of 1867. Following the late civil war, we enacted a bankruptcy law in 1867. That law was in force eleven years.

It was constantly changed, and every amendment that was made was intended to make it more liberal and less harsh to debtors and creditors alike; yet finally it became so unpopular, so detestable to the people of this country, that it was repealed. Gentlemen will remember that that law was generally regarded by our people as a curse to the country, and they will also bear in mind that while that law was in full force and effect we had, in 1873, the most serious panic that has ever visited this country, and President Grant sent a special message to Congress pleading for the repeal of the law. A committee of this House, of which Mr. FRYE of Maine was a member, had tried with great care and diligence to make amendments to that law which would render it acceptable to the people; but they finally announced their inability to do so.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to send to the desk and have the Clerk read that portion of the message of President Grant in which he recommended the repeal of this law.

The Clerk read as follows:

Careful and prudent men very often become involved in debt in the transaction of their business, and though they may possess ample property, if it could be made available for the purpose to meet all their liabilities, yet on account of the extraordinary scarcity of money they may be unable to meet their pecuniary obligations as they become due, in consequence of which they are liable to be frustrated in their business by proceedings in bankruptcy at the instance of unrelenting creditors.

People now are so easily alarmed as to monetary matters that the mere filing of a petition in bankruptcy by an unfriendly creditor will necessarily embarrass and oftentimes accomplish the financial ruin of a responsible business man. Those who otherwise might make lawful and just arrangements to relieve themselves from difficulties produced by the present stringency in money are prevented by their constant exposures to attack and disappointment by proceedings against them in bankruptcy, and beside the law is made use of in many cases by obdurate creditors to frighten or force debtors into a compliance with their wishes and into acts of injustice to other creditors and to themselves.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, it is very common for those who favor a bankrupt law to call attention to the uniform bankruptcy laws of England and other foreign countries; but in such suggestions gentlemen forget that the conditions of this country are wholly dissimilar; that our circumstances and environments are altogether different, and that what might be a proper law in any one of those countries would necessarily cause great trouble in its administration in this country. In the Congress which repealed the bankruptcy law of 1867 there were many men who were favorable to a bankruptcy law; yet, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that the vote in the House for its repeal was 205 to 40, and in the Senate 38 to 6. Senator Conkling, who represented the State of New York, favorable to a bankrupt law, anxious to have the old act of 1867 maintained, believing that it was possible to so amend it as to make it acceptable to the people of this country, expressed his views upon that subject; and I desire to have the Clerk read what he said in comparing this country with other countries where bankruptcy laws had been maintained.

The Clerk read as follows:

I do not know, Mr. President, perhaps I should not feel warranted in saying—but for a consideration which I will refer to in a moment, and which alone would restrain me—that the present bankrupt law, with changes which we might hope for, would be clearly a wise measure of legislation to remain; yet I am inclined to think that the most serious complaints grow out of conditions wholly unavoidable. For illustration, at least, I may say that our geographical difficulties are very great and that they can not be overcome. Men look at the administration of the bankruptcy system in Great Britain, and they compare it with ours, and they wonder with discontent that the comparison is against us. They forget that the bankruptcy system in Great Britain operates upon a limited area, amid a very dense population, with a very numerous and effectual judicial staff. England without the 12 counties of Wales has a little less than the area of the State of New York. Twenty-four million people inhabit it. Look to the taking of the census for illustration of what I am saying. The British census is taken in one night. It is taken between sun and sun and after sundown.

We take an enumeration here to count all the people scattered throughout all our borders, and weeks and months are exhausted and expenses are involved which would seem apocryphal, comparing them with the expenses of taking the British census and making no allowance for the disparity of conditions. So when you come to execute a bankrupt law in the thirty-eight States of the Union, sparsely populated and illy conditioned for transit from place to place, as many localities are, without a judicial staff so numerous as to carry justice to every man's door, you find great impediments, prolixity, postponement, expenses; and accordingly you find, as was stated, I think, in a petition presented by my colleague, perhaps to-day, a percentage of the outcome of assets, and a percentage of that which is swallowed by the proceedings, and of that which accrues at last to the creditor, and very naturally say that this is a failure. But if you look into the causes, I fear you will find that most of them are such that no art in drafting a bill, no reformation in administration, nothing which falls within the province of legislation can encompass and avoid them, and so it may very well be said the best considered argument would acquit the present bankrupt act of much of the guilt laid at its door, and attribute its evil consequences, as I have endeavored to show, to conditions beyond the purview of legislation.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, the single matter of exemptions will more directly call attention to the varying operation of such a law as this in the different States, and the difficulty of applying any bankruptcy law to all of them. Take, for instance, the State of Pennsylvania, where the exemption allowed to a debtor is $300; and he may select any property which he deems it most essential for him to save. In some other States the debtor may have a whole homestead exempted, to the value possibly of $5,000. The bill under consideration provides that the exemption allowed to bankrupts in any State shall be that allowed under the law of the particular State. So that this bill, if it should become a law, might compel a debtor in Pennsylvania to give up all his property except possibly his household property and some necessary articles for himself and family, while debtors in other States would be left with quite a larger exemption. In a country like ours, where there are forty-four or more States making laws all different, and where the laws of our Western States are so framed in the matter of exemptions as to encourage immigration from the Eastern States, I do not see how it is possible to adapt a bankrupt law to the varying conditions of the country.

Another objection, Mr. Chairman, is that the people, many of them, live so far away from the United States courts. Some of them reside 200, 300, or 400 miles from the place where court is held. The idea that you can substitute a referee and call him a court is simply ridiculous. The place where the orders are made which affect the property of the bankrupt is where the court sits.

Our people are very seldom in a United States court. Those courts are not looked upon with favor generally by the people; and the court is in many cases so far removed from them that it is a journey to visit it. They have so little to do with that tribunal that the idea of being cited to appear in a United States court strikes the average man living in a back county with something of a fright. It is impossible, in my judgment, to obtain anything like a general bankruptcy law that will reach the everyday acts of the people.

Again, Mr. Chairman, when we come to look at the operation of a bankrupt law it does not affect the secured creditor at all. I am speaking now of what is known as involuntary bankruptcy, where a creditor is forced to go into bankruptcy against his will. In that case the secured creditor is not affected, because he holds his security. After the secured creditor and the referee and the trustee and the clerk and the marshal and the attorneys are through with the estate, after it has paid the State taxes, the United States taxes, the county, city, borough, or township taxes, after all the mortgages and judgments are paid, after the property upon which there are liens has been sold or exchanged, then the unsecured creditor, the man who holds a note or due bill or bank account, has simply what is left. And, Mr. Chairman, there is scarcely anything left for him. Yet it is for the benefit of such creditors, and for their benefit alone, that this bill purports to be drawn. It can not affect the Government; it can not affect the State; it can not affect the county, the city, or the township; it can not affect the man who holds the mortgage, judgment, or lien. Who, then, will it benefit? If it benefits anybody, it will only benefit the general creditor.

Now, the statistics of insolvent estates in bankruptcy and out of bankruptcy in this country show that out of them all a very small percentage of the assets of such estates upon final settlement go into the hands of the general creditor. In the western district of Pennsylvania, composed of the largest number of counties in the State, under the act of 1867 there were 5,280 cases of bankruptcy. I had the clerk, who was formerly the clerk, during that period, of the court, a very competent, reliable, and trustworthy man, undertake to make an estimate of the average percentage paid to the general or unsecured creditor under the bankruptcy proceedings in the court, as he was in a position to know the results, and although he favored the bankrupt law, having resigned his office as clerk to become a lawyer, and was familiar with the practice in bankruptcy cases, yet he tells me that the average to the general creditor does not exceed 15 per cent of the estates, and that it never did average over that amount. What is, then, the benefit to the general creditor?

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if this bill becomes a law it will create more hazards, more damage, and produce more trouble than it can possibly do good. It will benefit lawyers, of course, and benefit people who want to be referees, trustees, and assignees; it will increase the fees of clerks and marshals, but will hurt and harm very many people.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me just there? May I ask whether the examination, to which you have referred, related both to voluntary and involuntary cases of bankruptcy, or was it confined exclusively to the involuntary cases?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It related to both—it covered all cases pending before the court.

Mr. RAY. Now, does not the gentleman see that such figures as he has stated would be very unfair as a basis of measuring the efficiency of a bankrupt law, because two-thirds or three-fourths of the cases examined into might have been voluntary cases of bankruptcy, where the parties had no property at all, but simply took the benefit of the bankrupt law for the purpose of obtaining a discharge from their liabilities? Does he not think, if he confined the examination solely to the cases of involuntary bankruptcy, persons with property, he might have found that the average paid to the creditor was very much larger?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not think so. My recollection of the act of 1867 is very fresh. I enjoyed my share of practice under it and am quite familiar with the practical workings of the system, and know something of the number of the estates that went through bankruptcy under it. I can scarcely recall an involuntary proceeding under that act where the assets arising from the estate ever surprised the unsecured creditors by making them think it worth while to put the party in bankruptcy. There were generally great disappointments growing out of the proceedings.

So, Mr. Chairman, I do not think it a good provision for the creditor, and I know it is bad for the debtor; and I can not see any good to anybody to be accomplished from the enactment of such a law. Let us take, for instance, as an illustration, a little country town. Suppose there are three or four merchants who are engaged in the dry goods business, and one of them is forced into bankruptcy, and the store must be sold for the benefit of the creditors. It is sold by the trustee—by the auctioneer. Immediately the goods in that store come into competition with the other three merchants in the same town. They are sold necessarily without regard to cost; they are sold at auction; and you will find, if this bill becomes a law, that in every country town and village throughout the land the men who are struggling to escape from the period of hard times that has been besetting us will have to come into competition with the assignee and the auctioneer, and either sell his goods at the same price that they are sold at public sale for, or else he must suffer the consequences. There is no legitimate merchant, who desires to sell his property at a profit, who can possibly compete with the auctioneer. But that is what will have to be done if this bill becomes a law. Hence I say it disturbs the channels of trade; it upsets the regular order of things, and brings trouble, confusion, and increased competition.

Many men have been forced into bankruptcy because those engaged in the same line of business with them had gone in, and they had either to sacrifice the stock of goods on hand or shut down, or wait until the bankrupt goods had been sold out and consumed. I recollect a case under the law, the last one in existence, where a lumber merchant having a large quantity of lumber of every variety had it brought to Pittsburg and piled up in a yard there, but was forced into bankruptcy, and that lumber yard and his stock supplied the consumers of lumber there for more than six months, and forced two other dealers in lumber into bankruptcy who would not have gone in otherwise.

That is the natural result of the enforcement of such a law. One of the great arguments against the change in the tariff system is that it disturbs trade and unsettles things, and the same argument can be applied with equal force to a bankrupt law; it disturbs trade, unsettles things, diverts the channels of trade, and brings into it other elements not legitimately or naturally there, to wit, it authorizes the auctioneer to come in and the assignee.

Now, concede, for the sake of argument, that many men are anxious to have the law passed that they may go into bankruptcy, or that there are many creditors who wish to force others into bankruptcy. Why, gentlemen, in nearly every instance, if a man is an honest debtor and has any property to divide among his creditors, he will have no trouble in getting a compromise with his creditors without the aid of a bankruptcy law. I can cite you to men in my city who have been doing business for years, and who have failed time and again. Each time their creditors have got together, extended payment, reduced amounts, have even loaned them money and indorsed their paper to help them along. Intelligence, accompanied by experience, has visited the creditor as well as the debtor, and to-day there is nobody that wants to drive another to extremity if he is honest, if he is sincere, if his failure is an honest one. If his failure is dishonest, if he is a fraud, you might as well let him go first as last. You will get nothing out of him anyhow, no matter how much law you have.

The purpose of this law—I do not say it is the purpose in the minds of the gentlemen who have reported this bill, for I concede their absolute sincerity—the real purpose behind it is to enable the wholesale dealers in large cities to visit their customers in country towns and places and shake this bankruptcy law over their heads and threaten them until they compel their debtors to secure them and commit an act of bankruptcy. It is to be used as an aid and a spur and a whip to collect debts. Well, I do not wish to say that a man ought not to pay his debts, but I do wish to say that the very spirit and enterprise of trade in this country, that which has made poor boys rich men, is this credit, this hazard, this chance which enterprising men take. Let any young man sit down and scan over this bill, look at the impediments in it, look at the thin places in the ice, and then let him decide to borrow money and go into a hazardous business if he dare. It is an obstruction to trade; it is a clog upon the wheels of credit; it is a hindrance to enterprise and chance; it is an interference with the spirit of commercial and active business trade and life in this country, because it is a menace, it is a threat, it is a danger that does not exist there naturally.

The proposition is not to pass a voluntary bill, to enable men who are honestly in debt to unload their burdens and take their chances again for a brief period of three or five years. It is an attempt to fit to this country a uniform bankrupt law, which is an absolute impossibility. Pass it, if you will, but if you do, you or your successors will make haste to repeal it inside of five years.

I do not think that commercial bodies who now and then pass resolutions, and newspapers which say they favor a bankruptcy law, are the proper indexes and guides by which to judge the wants of the community in this respect. I know in my own State, where we have a chamber of commerce, and where they have annually indorsed the Torrey bill for the last fifteen years, at their session last fall one man who got up and explained the difficulties and hardships of the law, and made the chamber of commerce really understand it, succeeded in defeating a resolution similar to that which had annually passed unanimously for fifteen years.

Go to the judges of the State courts throughout this whole country. They are better judges of the wants of the community in respect to a bankruptcy law than boards of trade or newspapers; and I defy you to find very many men who have sat on the bench in different States, and who were there when the last law was in force, who will favor a bankruptcy law.

I send to the Clerk's desk and desire to have read some letters which were sent me by judges of courts when practically this same bill was before the Fifty-second Congress. I wrote to different judges in different States, knowing that they had been on the bench for years, knowing that they had sat constantly in determining controversies between the people in their sections; sent them copies of the bill and asked them to tell me what they thought of it. I ask the Clerk to read first a letter from the Hon. James T. Mitchell, of the supreme court of Pennsylvania.

PITTSBURG, October 16, 1893.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 14th is just received, and I reply promptly. My experience in general is not favorable to a bankrupt law. Though the power to pass such a law was put in Congress by the Constitution, no exercise of it has ever been satisfactory to the country or has been more than temporary in duration. I had considerable experience in the working of the last act, and I believe it to have been intricate, cumbersome, expensive, and oppressive, and I do not believe any new act can be drawn which will be any better in those respects, because the difficulties are inherent. Only the hard cases will ever come under the operation of such a law. Those easy of adjustment will always be settled out of court—the commercial spirit will compel such settlement.

When assets come into court the fees and expenses must be heavy, or the business will be unprofitable, and inevitably fall into the hands of the less competent or lower-toned members of the profession, and become a source of oppression and scandal, as in fact the pension business so largely has, while if they are heavy the dividends for creditors will be small in proportion to expenses, which always produces dissatisfaction, as it perhaps justly ought. If we look beyond these practical objections, as it perhaps justly ought, there are two main objects which a bankrupt act may be intended to promote, the relief of debtors or the facilitating of creditors.

The former is now cared for by the State laws to the satisfaction of their own communities, in which the bulk of indebtedness is generally owed, and there does not appear at present to be any substantial reason or demand for the exertion of the paramount national authority on the subject. Perhaps in a short time there unfortunately may be. For the other, the putting of severer remedies in the hands of the creditors, the time appeared to me particularly inappropriate. If the present financial situation shall continue there will certainly in a year or two be a vast body of debtors unable, not by their fault, but by misfortune, to pay promptly or in full. To put in the creditors' hands now, in advance of such a contingency, any additional weapons of compulsion would, in my judgment, be oppressive and particularly ill-timed.

I have answered your query at more length than is desirable, but I have had no time to condense. While written hastily, these are my settled views, and you are quite at liberty to make such use of them as you desire.

Yours, very truly,

JAMES T. MITCHELL.

To Hon. WILLIAM A. STONE,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I now desire the Clerk to read a letter from Justice Henry W. Williams, of the supreme court of Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor relating to the subject of bankruptcy and the passage of a bankrupt law is before me. In reply I must say that it is my belief that the passage of such a law would not be wise for several reasons, among which are the following:

First. It would not facilitate the collection of debts. Except in rare cases, except in rare instances, no bankrupt law does. The real purpose and the direct result of such legislation is to enable an insolvent to shake off his debts—pay them by his certificate of discharge.

Second. It would naturally tend to increase existing distrust. It would be regarded as a Congressional declaration that bankruptcy and distress were before us, and that existing debts might be paid by a discharge in bankruptcy.

Third. In so far as such a law should place in the hands of creditors any additional means of constraint or coercion upon their debtors, such means would be so used by exacting conditions as to increase the difficulty in the way of every struggling business man, and make his ruin certain.

Fourth. Both the honest debtor and the humane creditor would suffer from the practical operation of such a law, while the estate would be consumed in fees and costs.

Fifth. The United States courts are removed from the people. There are so many of those subject to their jurisdiction remote and strange.

The right of appeal is beset by conditions, expenses, and delays that are exasperating to those who are in haste, and discouraging to men of moderate means. The State laws are known, the State courts are near and open at all times.

Sixth. I would have the whole subject to be settled under existing State laws, and by the parties. An enlightened selfishness—in other words, a consideration of what is best for all concerned—will lead to compromise when such relief is desired, and it will not open the doors for swindlers and unprincipled scoundrels to push their credit for the mere purpose of preparing to fail for a purpose.

With kind regards, I remain, very truly, yours,

HENRY W. WILLIAMS.

Hon. WILLIAM A. STONE.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from Judge Dean, of the supreme court of Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 14th, in reference to the bankrupt law, is before me. Such a law is of course intended to accomplish, first, protection to the creditor; second, relief of the debtor; third, material advantage to the State. Not much need be said as to the first and third, but as to the second, relief to the debtor, such a law passed now to take effect soon—and by soon is meant within two or three years—will operate with unnecessary hardship on the debtor class. This, as you are aware, is a time of serious business depression; fully 75 per cent of all men in business are heavy debtors. They have of real value ample assets in most cases.

These assets can not be turned into money at half their real value, and creditors will accept nothing but money. These debts have been incurred in view of existing laws; in great part they would have had no existence if such a law had been anticipated, and sudden change in the law will work financial disaster to many of them who, if not disturbed for a reasonable time, will squeeze through and have left considerable capital; if forced to a sale now their property will not bring half its worth, and after discharge they will start without capital. While a national bankruptcy law ought to be passed, it should not go into effect for at least two years. It is with some diffidence I give expression to this opinion. As you are aware, my judicial observation extends no farther than this State, but while limited as to territory, all imaginable kinds of business carried on in the State have been brought to my attention both on and off the bench.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN DEAN.

Hon. WILLIAM A. STONE,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I now desire the Clerk to read the letter from Judge Earl, of the court of appeals of the State of New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter asking my views as to a bankruptcy law, I have to say I know of no good reason for passing such a law. I speak only of this State. Here the laws are just to both debtor and creditor, and no change is needed. They furnish ample facilities for the collection of debts, and an honest debtor, who has unfortunately become insolvent, can nearly always obtain a discharge from his debts by a surrender of his property.

Bankruptcy proceedings have always proven expensive, and, unless the bankrupt estate is large, the lawyers and officials always get more of it than the creditors.

Very truly, yours,

R. EARL.

Hon. WILLIAM A. STONE.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to read a letter from Judge W. T. Spear, of the supreme court of Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF OHIO, SUPREME COURT CONSULTATION ROOM,
Columbus, October 20, 1893.

DEAR SIR: Your valued favor of recent date is duly received.

In general, I favor a uniform bankrupt law, if framed so as to be fair to both creditor and debtor and the fees of court officers so limited as to admit of economical administration. Such a law would be, I think, more advantageous to all concerned than are the present inconsistent insolvent laws of the several States.

But I doubt very much the advisability of enacting such a law at this time. It seems to me that if made a law now the compulsory provisions would give inconsiderate creditors an undue advantage, and would result in driving many deserving debtors into bankruptcy, who, if not unduly crowded, would struggle through and finally avoid financial ruin, which result would certainly tend to further complicate the unfortunate financial disturbances which are now troubling the business world.

These suggestions are but first-blush impressions, and are not regarded by me as entitled to much weight, but I have no objection to reference being made to them.

Yours, very respectfully,

W. T. SPEAR.

Hon. WM. A. STONE,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I do not so much object to a provision which has purely voluntary features, for a brief period, to enable those who have been struggling during the past few years of depression to get relief from their debts and start in life anew. But the involuntary features, especially, of this bill convince me that they would result in great hardship to everybody concerned.

Take the acts of bankruptcy under section 2 of the bill as proposed.

The first provision is this: If this person shall have—

Concealed himself, departed, or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with the intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors, and shall not have returned at least forty-eight hours before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, and before the rights of creditors shall have been impaired, altered, or interfered with.

In the first place, he may get back in forty-eight hours, and they have forty-eight hours to put him in bankruptcy. Under the old law, if he returned before the petition was filed against him, you could not put him into bankruptcy for that. It seems to me this is an unnecessary and harsh provision, and ought not to prevail.

Mr. RAY. If the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. I think the gentleman misapprehends the meaning of the section. That is when he runs away to avoid service of process and to defraud his debtors, he may repent and return; and if he gets back within forty-eight hours before they file a petition, why, then, you can not put him in bankruptcy.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes; but if he comes back you have got forty-eight hours to put him in.

Mr. RAY. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I have carefully considered the matter, and that is the conclusion I have arrived at concerning it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The gentleman has spoken of the rapidity with which the old bankruptcy laws have been repealed. Have you examined to find out whether the popular objections to those laws were because of the harshness of the provisions, or did the objections lie to the principle of allowing the creditor to put his debtor into bankruptcy?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, I think all influenced somewhat the many who opposed it; but so well as I could gather from all sources in regard to the repeal of these bills it was the general unpopularity of a bankruptcy law, especially an involuntary bankruptcy. We have never had a law of pure voluntary bankruptcy in this country. It is absolutely impossible to apply a uniform bankruptcy law, voluntary or involuntary, in the various States under the various, different, conflicting laws of the States in reference to debtor and creditor. As I stated early in my remarks, the last bill was repealed by an overwhelming majority in the Senate and House on the message of General Grant.

Mr. COX. Will you allow me one question, though it may break into the line of your thought?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes.

Mr. COX. Has your mind been directed to the matter and have you made an examination in the case of involuntary bankruptcy to ascertain what proportion of the estate belonging to the bankrupt went to the creditor and what proportion to the officers and officials connected with the bankruptcy proceedings?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I have already stated that; but I will state further that in the report filed by the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary in 1892 they reached a conclusion in reference to the per cent paid to creditors, and it averaged about 15 per cent.

Mr. COX. And the rest went to expenses.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, it appears that after the secured creditors and officers were paid—on an average about half, in insolvent proceedings, under that law, as this committee reports. It is easy to obtain this report, which is numbered 1674, second session Fifty-second Congress, part 2. This report shows that the creditor has received twice as much under the insolvent laws of the States as they do in an involuntary proceeding under the act of bankruptcy.

Mr. COX. That is very satisfactory, with this little suggestion, if you please.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes.

Mr. COX. It is this: That in all involuntary bankruptcy proceedings the creditors receive about 15 per cent. Now, it must have been that the rest of the estate was exhausted in expenses and in going through the court.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, the gentleman presumes that there was an estate.

Mr. COX. Now, I am speaking about the Federal courts.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, I say you will find that in all cases of involuntary bankruptcy the insolvent debtor has his property pretty well put up as collateral. His secured creditors are not affected, and after the secured creditors are paid very little remains for those that are unsecured.

Mr. COX. That is the point I made.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It resulted in no good except to marshals, lawyers, referees, and people who were interested in the bankruptcy proceedings and got the benefit of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, turning again to this bankruptcy law, I will state, with all due respect to the committee who have reported this bill, for I know they have done the best they could, that they have reported as good a bankruptcy bill as they could, with the assistance of Judge Torrey, who has haunted the halls of Congress for the last fifteen years in an effort to secure a bill of this character for the wholesale dealers of the large cities; and yet I think this bill is infinitely worse than the last bill passed, and which existed for eleven years, and which this country was so anxious to repeal; and I will try to prove what I say.

Take the third act of bankruptcy:

Made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors and has not regained the ownership and possession of such property before the rights of creditors have been altered, impaired, or changed by reason of such transfer and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy.

He must have regained possession of his property at least ten days before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. I understand that to mean that he must have regained possession of his property and held it in his possession ten days before the beginning of the proceedings in bankruptcy, but if at any time before the period of ten days a petition is filed against him he may be thrown into bankruptcy.

Mr. RAY. No. That is where the gentleman falls into error. The original Torrey bill provided that if a man disposed of his property in the way there mentioned at any time within four months thereafter, even though he had regained possession of it, he might be thrown into bankruptcy. The committee have amended that by providing that if a man disposes of his property for the purpose of defrauding his creditors and it can be shown in case a petition is filed against him that he has regained possession of it at least ten days before the filing of the petition, then the petition must fail. So that even if a man has committed the acts mentioned and has repented and got his property back, he can not be thrown into bankruptcy if he can show that he got it back at least ten days before the commencement of the proceeding.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Suppose he got it back nine days before. What then?

Mr. RAY. Well, the committee had to make some limitation, and they made it ten days.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But the man goes into bankruptcy if he gets his property back nine days before the commencement of the proceedings, does he not?

Mr. RAY. There had to be some limitation fixed. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, we will not quarrel about one day. The gentleman may be right about that.

Now take the fifth act:

Made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference, and has not regained the ownership of such property or released same from such levy before the rights of creditors shall have been altered, changed, or impaired by reason of such transfer, taking, or levy and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy.

Made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property * * * for the purpose of giving a preference.

Here is a man who is insolvent and who wants to borrow a thousand dollars. He has 50 shares of Pennsylvania Railroad stock, which is worth $2,500 in the market, and he puts it up as collateral on which to borrow that money. He is insolvent, and he has made a transfer of this property, and therefore you may throw him into bankruptcy.

Mr. MAHON. That is not transferring the property for the purpose of giving a preference; it is transferring it for the purpose of securing a loan.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, if you turn to the definition of "preference" you will see that there will be considerable difficulty in determining just what it does and does not cover, as there is in all these bankruptcy laws.

Mr. RAY. As a lawyer, will you say on the floor of this House that if a man were to borrow $10,000 and put up his property to secure it, and put that money into his business, the giving of that security would be a transfer of his property for the purpose of giving a preference within the meaning of this act?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I would say, as a lawyer, that it would not be. But I wish to call your attention to a fact which you should remember as a lawyer, that in the early days of the bankruptcy law of 1867 our judges all construed it differently. There was no uniformity whatever in their rulings. They even held that a man once in bankruptcy under involuntary proceedings had, by virtue of that adjudication, put a bar between himself and a discharge and could not get out at all; and it was not until the Supreme Court of the United States began to lay down the construction of that bankruptcy law that we had any uniformity of rulings among the judges. You will have the same experience under this bill if it becomes a law. You will have all kinds of decisions and constructions. You will have the judges of the district courts differing entirely with each other in their construction of the law. It would be far better to reenact the old bankruptcy law of 1867, with its modifications and with its constructions as determined on appeal to the higher courts, than to throw a new law before the ninety or the ninety-five judges of the district courts of the various districts in the United States, who will do as they did with the former law, making all sorts of different constructions of the act and its provisions. I started out with the proposition that this bill was worse than the act of 1867, which gentlemen all admit was bad. If I remember correctly, the gentleman from Iowa himself [Mr. HENDERSON], in his very able and learned discussion of this bill yesterday, did not pretend to justify the old bankrupt act of 1867, but argued that this bill was far better and more liberal in its provisions.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman refers to me I want him to refer to me correctly. I pointed out distinctly the features of the old law that I complained of. The great difficulty with that law was that it was too expensive, and that is substantially the ground of objection to it set forth in the letters which the gentleman has had read here.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, I want to correct you when you misrepresent me.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. You will have an opportunity to do that. If I misrepresent the gentleman I desire to be corrected, but I understood him to say that this bill was much more humane and better than the bankruptcy law of 1867.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Very well; on that I take issue with the gentleman.

Mr. HENDERSON. But there were many good things in the old law, although there were certain defects which I pointed out.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Does not the gentleman think that on the whole the act of 1867 resulted in benefit to the commercial interests of the country?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I decidedly do not. I think it was a great injury and a curse to the commercial community. And so the whole country thought, so the President thought, so Congress thought, and they repealed it when they got at it.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. How many years was it in force?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Eleven years.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Were they then quick to repeal it?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. They were, as soon as they got to understand it; and they will repeal this law as soon as they come to understand it.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. How many persons took the benefit of the bankruptcy law of 1867 and were relieved, as they could not have been otherwise?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. A very small percentage of debtors or creditors really got any benefit from that law. The great benefits of it were realized by bankruptcy attorneys, by registers in bankruptcy, by assignees, etc., the various persons who held appointments under the law.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. That was the abuse of the law.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Very well—

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Such abuses are corrected by this bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I claim that this bill, if it should become a law, will be capable of being abused in the same way, and is liable to even worse abuse.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Why not amend the bill so as to make it good?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I say it is an impossibility so to amend it.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman had better demonstrate that, I suggest.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I can not very well do it—

Mr. HENDERSON. No; you can not.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If gentlemen are interrupting me with questions all the while. I think I can better succeed, however, in demonstrating the abuses of this proposed law than some other gentlemen have succeeded in attempting to demonstrate its benefits.

I claim that this bill is more objectionable than the old bill. Take the composition which is authorized by creditors under the provisions of this bill:

b An application for the confirmation of a composition may be filed in the court of bankruptcy after, but not before, it has been accepted in writing by a majority in number of all creditors whose claims have been allowed, which number must represent a majority in amount of such claims.

In other words, a composition may be ratified by a majority in number and amount whose claims have been allowed at any time after the first meeting of creditors. Now, everybody knows that in most of the States months must elapse before all the creditors have proved their claims. Some of the creditors live at a great distance, and proceedings may run along for months. The provision I have just read will enable the bankrupt to obtain a meeting of a majority of his creditors, and as soon as they have had a meeting will enable him to present a petition for his discharge, and it will enable him to make a composition with those creditors who are merely a majority in number and in the value of their claims—although perhaps only one-third of the creditors have had their claims approved or allowed. Thus a bankrupt may be discharged before the real majority of the creditors know that he is in bankruptcy.

Mr. NORTHWAY. This bill provides for notice.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But how many times do these notices reach the creditors?

Mr. NORTHWAY. They do not fail in one case out of a hundred.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me call attention to the old law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLUE. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended until he has completed his argument.

Mr. HENDERSON. The time is under control of the gentleman on the other side [Mr. BRODERICK].

Mr. BRODERICK. How much time does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Twenty or twenty-five minutes.

Mr. BRODERICK. I yield to the gentleman twenty minutes further. I would be glad to yield more time, but a number of gentlemen are yet to speak.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, let us look at the former bankrupt law, which has been condemned by everybody; let us observe the provisions of that law, which all admit to have been unpopular and to have been a failure in its results. Let us compare the provision of that old law in reference to compositions with the provision I have just read from this bill. The former law provided—

And such resolution shall, to be operative, have been passed by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors of the debtor assembled at such meeting either in person or by proxy, and shall be confirmed by the signatures thereto of the debtor and two-thirds in number and one-half in value of all the creditors of the debtor.

That provision, it will be observed, applied whether the creditors proved their claims or not. Yet here you bring in a provision which allows a majority in number and value of the creditors whose claims have been allowed to ratify a composition. I call attention to the fact that in nearly all the cases where the estates of bankrupts were really of any great value there was under that old law a compromise. The estates which finally were sold paid generally only a very small and limited percentage to the unsecured creditors. I submit whether it is fair to allow a bankrupt to compromise his debts until he has obtained the consent of at least a majority in number and value of all his creditors, regardless of whether they have proved their claims or not.

Mr. NORTHWAY. This bill, then, is in favor of the debtor rather than the creditor?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. This particular provision is in favor of the debtor.

Mr. NORTHWAY. That is the way it ought to be.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But this applies both to voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, and it will enable a man to file a petition in bankruptcy and obtain a compromise with his creditors without requiring the consent of a majority of all his creditors. Mr. NORTHWAY. He can not do so without the concurrence of the court.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, the court—the concurrence of the court—this simply seems to allow latitude for correction—Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. This concurrence of the majority of the parties in interest is simply essential to carry out the provision, and the result is only dismissal, not discharge. If the gentleman will study the section he will see—

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, I have studied it, and my only criticism on the gentleman's speech on yesterday was that he had not studied the bill very carefully himself. Let me call his attention to it:

SEC. 12. COMPOSITIONS, WHEN SET ASIDE.—a The judge may, upon the application of parties in interest filed at any time within six months after a composition has been confirmed, set the same aside and reinstate the case if it shall be made to appear upon a trial that fraud was practiced in the procuring of such composition, and that the knowledge thereof has come to the petitioners since the confirmation of such composition.

Evidently only for "fraud," where fraud is established, can the judge set aside the composition between the parties. Now, let us see what the old law does. Let us compare that with the provision of law formerly enforced:

If it shall at any time appear to the court, on notice, satisfactory evidence, and hearing, that a composition under this section can not, in consequence of legal difficulties, or for any sufficient cause, proceed without injustice or undue delay to the creditors or to the debtor, a court may refuse to accept and confirm such composition, or may set the same aside; and in either case the debtor shall be proceeded with as a bankrupt in conformity with the provisions of law, and proceedings may be had accordingly; and the time during which such composition shall have been in force shall not, in such case, be computed in calculating period of time prescribed by said act.

In this case the court is limited to cases of actual fraud, while under the old law the court could do it in any case that presented itself to its judgment and discretion.

Mr. RAY. Let me suggest to the gentleman in that connection this point: That was one of the greatest objections to the old law, because certain creditors could come in with objection to the composition, have it set aside, and thus keep the estate in court for an unlimited time and dissipate it altogether in fees, etc., wasting the entire assets in that manner. That is the object of this provision, to compel a confirmation of the composition when the creditors have agreed, and so end the matter.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There is not thrown about the provision in this bill the restriction and safeguard that the unsecured creditor ought to have.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Do you oppose voluntary bankruptcy?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No.

Mr. NORTHWAY. You have got to have compositions in that.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Not at all. It is at the instance of the bankrupt, not the creditor party. Composition is for the benefit of the man who has property and can not meet his obligations and desires to pay his debts as far as he is able to pay them—

Mr. NORTHWAY. And to help the creditor to get more out of the estate of the bankrupt.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But, Mr. Chairman, I must hurry on. What does the bill provide in reference to the discharge when granted? It may be granted, unless several things are done. Let me call your attention to the third provision. Unless the party has—

(3) Obtained property upon credit which has not been paid for or restored at the time the petition is filed against him upon a materially false statement in writing, made by him to any person for the purpose of obtaining credit or of being communicated to the trade or to the person from whom he obtained such property on credit.

Under that provision the person making a statement to R. G. Dun & Co. or to Bradstreet's contrary to the provisions of this law would fail in obtaining his discharge.

Mr. RAY. And so he ought.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Not at all.

Mr. RAY. Why, if I make as a merchant beginning business a statement of facts, communicating the same to the trade, and get the property or goods and do not discharge the obligation or return the goods, ought I to be discharged from the obligation of that indebtedness?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, after the creditors have got all there is of the man's estate I am opposed to any policy that keeps the bankrupt ever afterwards in bankruptcy.

If a man honestly gives up all the property remaining to him in the payment of his indebtedness he is entitled to his discharge; and yet under this provision he may make materially a false statement; he might make a statement materially false in reference to the estimated value of his property or estate. Many men when they are starting in business will not hesitate to tell a rosy story to R. G. Dun & Co. or to Bradstreet's, not with a view to obtain property under false pretenses or for the purpose of defrauding their creditors, but simply for the purpose of giving themselves a reasonably good standing in the community, and yet where no wrong, no injustice, has arisen from such a statement under this provision you make that a block to the discharge of the party, although he has given up all of his property in bankruptcy.

The fifth obstacle to the discharge is:

(5) With fraudulent intent and in contemplation of bankruptcy, destroyed or neglected to keep books of account or records from which his true condition might be ascertained.

Well, now, in the olden days, when the bankruptcy law was first launched on the country, the intent was always presumed to accompany the act, and if he was found guilty of keeping fictitious books, or of not keeping any books at all, the intent was presumed; and I say under this bill it will be years before we get a liberal and humane construction. I do not like the idea of withholding a discharge from a man simply because he has neglected to keep books of account. There are many men who get into bankruptcy who keep no books at all. Some of the best men in this country do not keep books. Their habits are not of that methodical character that they can do it; and while I will admit that that has been in all the bankruptcy laws, and was in the old bankruptcy law, yet I do not think it is a very wise or proper provision.

Now, coming back to this old bankruptcy law, if you will permit me, I am willing to admit that if you put men into bankruptcy for the acts stated and stipulated in this bill—and they have been in all the bills known as the Torrey bills—I am willing to admit that this bill is as well and humanely drawn and perhaps better than any of the previous Torrey bills that have been brought in here; but still I do not believe that it is wise to make any bankruptcy law at this time having an involuntary feature.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Before the gentleman starts on that point, I would inquire if he has taken up the question of the effect at this particular time of a bankruptcy bill being passed by Congress? I was not present when the gentleman began his speech.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman mean a voluntary bill, or an involuntary bill?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Involuntary.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not know that I have alluded especially to the effect at this particular time, but I can see no occasion to pass an involuntary bankruptcy law at this particular time at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is great danger in it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There is more danger in it than if the country was in a prosperous condition.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Upon that point I would call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the failures in the first three months of 1896 have exceeded in number those of 1895, 1894, and 1893 by 18, 11, and 47 per cent, respectively, and in amount by 30, 27, and 60 per cent, respectively. Now, the question that I wish to ask is, under such conditions, would it not be very apt to bring a tide of bankruptcy upon the country which would carry everything before it?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, I certainly think so, and I stated when I began my remarks that it would put honest debtors into competition with the auctioneer all over the country.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do I understand you to mean that you want a physician when you are well, and no physician when you are sick?

Mr. NORTHWAY. That is, do you want a bankruptcy law when there are no bankrupts?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, we do not want a hair doctor, even when we are sick, or a doctor who will give us medicine that will do us no good.

Mr. HENDERSON. You do not want a doctor at all, except when you are entirely well. That seems to be the theory of your speech.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I want a doctor who will do me some good, and not one who will create a panic in the family and make me think I have got the smallpox when there is nothing serious the matter with me.

Mr. NORTHWAY. That is, you do not want a bankruptcy law when there are any bankrupts.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is a question whether the doctor is a good one, not whether we want one.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. A man would not be exercising much prudence if he employed every man who came along pretending to be a doctor simply because he was sick.

Now, Mr. Chairman, referring to this bill again, it provides that any man who owes debts may go into bankruptcy. You will observe that it is peculiar in respect to the people who are privileged in this regard. Any person who owes debts, except a corporation, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act as a voluntary bankrupt.

Any person owing debts to the amount of $300 or over, if adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon an impartial trial, shall be subject to the provisions of this act, except a national bank or a person engaged chiefly in farming, or the tillage of the soil, or a wage earner.

One great objection to the bankruptcy law before was the objection raised by the farmers. This bill carefully takes them out of the category of bankruptcy. They may voluntarily go into bankruptcy, but they can not be put into bankruptcy. Many merchants all over the country own farms as well as stores, and it is difficult sometimes to determine whether they are chiefly engaged in farming or chiefly engaged in keeping store. They are exempt if they own a farm, while they may voluntarily go into bankruptcy. It differs from the old law in reference to corporations. Under the old law any person residing within the jurisdiction of the United States and owing debts exceeding in amount $300 might voluntarily become a bankrupt. There is no limit on this at all.

If he owes anything he can go into bankruptcy. Perhaps this bill is not so objectionable as to the voluntary proceedings. It is the involuntary proceedings which are chiefly objectionable. Under this bill a person may be put into bankruptcy by one of three creditors. It is not necessary to have a majority in number or in value to petition to put him into bankruptcy. Under the old law it required at least five petitioners, and any petitioner whose debt did not amount to $250 could not petition. Under this bill one man alone may put another into bankruptcy if the creditors do not exceed twelve, and three can do it where they do exceed twelve, though their debts may not exceed in amount over $500.

Now, as to another provision of this bill. I understand that when a man goes into bankruptcy under this bill he has the right of jury trial as to the various acts of bankruptcy charged against him; but when he comes to his discharge, the right of trial by jury is taken away from him. The judge alone decides the question of fact. Anybody may file specifications against his discharge under the bill proposed, and the question may go to a trial before the judge. Every one of those specifications of objection to the discharge of the bankrupt must necessarily be questions of fact and not questions of law; and yet they are submitted to the judge and not to a jury. I do not see any good reason why a man who has been forced into bankruptcy, who has had his estate divided up among his creditors, and who applies for his discharge, should not have the facts involved in the issue tried before a jury as well as before the judge, and it would be much better. In other words, the bill takes away the right of trial by jury from those applying for discharge from bankruptcy.

The old law gave the bankrupt the right of trial by jury. He was entitled to it, and under the old law he could obtain his discharge on the petition of a certain number and proportion of his creditors in value and amount. Under this law he can not obtain a discharge unless the judge who passes on the case decides that he has not committed the acts of bankruptcy complained of. In many instances when you compare the acts of bankruptcy and the grounds for asking for a discharge as set forth in the bill you will find that they are closely allied, and that the man is adjudicated a bankrupt by the judge who afterwards tries the issue raised on his application for discharge.

Mr. NORTHWAY. He can not discharge him unless he is a bankrupt.

Mr. RAY. That grows out of the fact that we have carefully limited the cases in which a man can be forced into bankruptcy to those where he has committed actual fraud. There are only three exceptions to that rule; and of course if a man is forced into bankruptcy because he has committed an actual fraud upon his creditors he ought not to be discharged from his debt.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let us see what you call this "actual fraud." Actual fraud in one case is suffering a judgment to be entered against him—

Mr. NORTHWAY. With the intent to prefer.

Mr. RAY. And with the intent to defraud. With three exceptions there is not a case of involuntary bankruptcy laid down in the bill where, under the State laws, you could not sue out an attachment and attach the property of the debtor.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. You say here, "With intent to defeat his creditors."

Mr. RAY. "Defeat" includes fraud.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It includes so many other things.

Mr. RAY. It is all fraud.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. "With intent to defeat his creditors."

Mr. RAY. Now turn back to the definition of "defeat."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will read it:

Defeat shall include defraud or delay, evade, hinder, and impede with intent to defraud.

Now, I say that in all the constructions placed upon these old bankruptcy laws by distinguished judges this intent is running along in the same line. If a man suffers a judgment to be entered against him or borrows money on a judgment note, if he gives a judgment note with intent to defraud or with intent to delay, evade, hinder, or impede with intent to defraud, he comes under this act. He will require to have a pretty smart lawyer along with him all the time to keep him out of court as a bankrupt, and if once he gets in it will require the best lawyer in the neighborhood to get him out. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAHON. Under the law of 1867, if the bankrupt had complied with the statute he was entitled as a matter of right, without consulting his creditors, to his discharge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask that the gentleman may be allowed time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. BRODERICK. I would like to know what time the gentleman desires. There are several gentlemen who want to speak.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I can finish in ten minutes.

Mr. BRODERICK. I will yield ten minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now, as to exemptions, in that respect the old law was much more liberal than this bill. Under the old law a bankrupt first had an exemption of $500, and then he had all the exemption allowed by the State. Under this bill he has only the exemption allowed by the State. I can see no material difference between the real purpose of this bill and the old law. The chief difference is that in this bill they call the registers "referees" and the assignees "trustees." The same general purpose runs through both the old law and this bill, and that purpose is to enable the creditor to collect his debt, to enable him to force the debtor into bankruptcy in all instances for acts committed, and I challenge a comparison of the acts of bankruptcy enumerated in this bill with those enumerated in the old law, and assert that in my judgment the old law is quite as liberal in that respect as this is.

Under the old law every act for which exceptions to the discharge of a bankrupt could be filed was subject to a trial by jury, but in this bill it is not so. The only instance where the creditors really have any action upon the bankrupt's estate under this bill is in determining the question of composition, and that, I say, is to the interest of the bankrupt, by enabling him to take advantage of the situation and obtain a composition, when perhaps the majority of his creditors are opposed to it. The original law of 1867 enumerated among the acts of bankruptcy the making of an assignment under the laws of the State—a perfectly legitimate transaction; but in 1874 Congress struck out that provision from the law and allowed a man to make an assignment under the laws of his State; yet this bill, brought in here when we are supposed to have profited by our experience under the old law, provides that a man who makes an assignment under the laws of his State commits an act of bankruptcy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to a voluntary bankruptcy provision, and I do not think the country would have much objection to a voluntary provision for a limited period to allow people who have been unfortunate to surrender their property and be discharged from their debts. But an involuntary bankruptcy law will make confusion, will interrupt the channels of trade, and will benefit nobody who really ought to be benefited under such a law.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much of the last ten minutes allowed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania has he consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. There are five minutes remaining.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Nevada.

[Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HENDERSON (to Mr. BAILEY). Are you ready now to occupy further time?

Mr. BAILEY. No. There are one or two other gentlemen who desire to be heard, but not just now.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time was consumed by the gentleman from Nevada?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-three minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] as much time as he desires.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who has just taken his seat, suggested that the New England States and the Eastern States were the sole beneficiaries of our tariff laws. I want to protest against that doctrine, because the State of Illinois, in which I live, great as it is as an agricultural State, is greater by multiplied millions of dollars in the value of its manufactured products. While Illinois is a great agricultural State, yet under the beneficent operation of the tariff laws of this country for the past thirty years its greatness as an agricultural State has been dwarfed by the greatness which she has acquired as a manufacturing State.

The gentleman from Nevada advises us that "gifted orators" in the coming campaign will succeed in convincing the people of this country that their salvation depends upon the adoption of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. Mr. Chairman, three years ago the tongues of gifted orators convinced the people of this country that their only salvation lay in the adoption of the policy of free trade. They carried the people off to the top of a high mountain, like a compeer of theirs of old, and showed them all the world and said, "Bow down and worship us and our free-trade doctrine and we will give you this land flowing with milk and honey," and the people bowed down, and they have stayed bowed down ever since. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. Has not the gentleman made a mistake? He speaks as if the devil belonged to the Democratic party. I thought he was a member of the Republican party.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Many people rather think the Democratic party belongs to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. Well, I just thought there was some "belonging" somewhere.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Now, sir, if the people are not content where they have been led by the tongues of "gifted orators" three years ago, let them follow the gentleman from Nevada and his "gifted orators" into another quagmire, and then, I think, after a year or two of experience in floundering there, there will be no trouble in passing a bankruptcy law in this House by a unanimous vote.

Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that the discussion of this bill should turn upon its merits or demerits, without regard to these other questions that "gifted orators" desire to discuss so much. There was once a time in this country when there was no law for the protection of property or the collection of debts. The only law then was—

That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.

But with the advancement of civilization, with the accumulation of property, it became necessary that there should be laws enacted for the preservation of that property. And when we became far enough civilized to credit each other, to accept each other's promises for the payment of money, then it soon became evident that laws were necessary for the enforcement of those promises. Hence there grew up with advancing civilization laws for the collection of debts, and as civilization continued to advance those laws became more and more severe, until to-day the laws on the statute books of all the States for the collection of debts are as severe, as inquisitorial, as harsh, as it is possible for human ingenuity to make them in the interest of the creditor class.

Gentlemen have spoken about this bankruptcy bill, or any bankruptcy bill, as a harsh measure. I ask those gentlemen and all others to reflect upon this question, Is any bankrupt law that ever was enacted in this or any other country as harsh upon the debtor as the laws that you have on the statute books of every one of your States to-day? Why, sir, there is not a State in the Union to-day but has laws under which the poor and honest debtor, the man who has been honest from the beginning of his business career, until the moment that his creditors fall upon him like harpies, may have stripped from him every cent of money, every cent's worth of property he has, except what may have been allowed him by the humane exemption laws that have been found necessary; because, gentlemen, there never was an exemption law passed by the consent of the creditor class. The creditor, like Shylock, demands every time what is "nominated in the bond." He wants "the pound of flesh"; and it was only because of the rapacity of the creditor that humanity entered into the hearts of the legislators of the several States so far as to make them say, "It will not do to permit creditors to thus impoverish debtors, to turn them out upon the world penniless, and, in addition, hold hovering over them for the rest of their lives the remainder of the debt that has not been paid."

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], a good lawyer, has argued against the involuntary features of a bankrupt law or against any bankrupt law at all. He has said that the tendency of such measures is to prevent any man who may embark in business from taking all the risks and chances of misfortune in that business, because of the inability which he may incur to pay his debt. If that is so, then how is the young man encouraged to embark in business with the certain knowledge that if by misfortune of any kind that business fails and his debts accumulate on him so that he can not pay, his creditors may then come in and sweep away everything that he has except what the exemption laws allow him—take it all and divide it among themselves, turning him out penniless upon the world, with still a load of debt hanging like a cloud over him, to paralyze his energies, destroy his hope, and absolutely deny him the ability to resume business?

There is where the enterprising man stands to-day if he has been so unfortunate as to become hopelessly involved in debt. He is at the mercy of attachments, writs of execution, injunctions, executions, and all the debt-collecting machinery that creditors for centuries have been able to devise. All those rusty implements of the law are now treasured up in the statutes of every one of your States to harass and worry the life out of the unfortunate debtor; and when they have exhausted their power the debtor is turned out with what? With nothing left, and with that load of debt bearing him down and preventing him from getting one penny of credit anywhere else.

What is the difference between a bankruptcy law and your ordinary laws for the collection of debts? Your ordinary laws allow the creditor to take all that a man has, and, having absorbed that, to leave him with the balance of the debt unpaid, liable to have every penny that he may make during the rest of his life seized and applied to those old debts, with the interest that keeps at work accumulating while creditor and debtor alike are asleep. Under the debtor and creditor laws of your various States—without any bankrupt law—it is possible for a man to labor his whole life long and have the result of his life gathered up by a few rapacious creditors who in his early days encouraged him to embark in business by extending credit to him in a business that they should have known better than he could not be made a success.

Much is said about a bankruptcy law, as though it were something so entirely different from every other law for the collection of debts that it is a dangerous thing for any people to handle. Mr. Chairman, the distinguishing feature of the bankruptcy law from all other laws for the relief of the debtor is that it is forged with a degree of humanity, with a degree of consideration for the debtor that no other law ever was forged with. It provides that you can do under the bankrupt law just what you would do under any law on the State statute books; but it goes a great deal further than that in the spirit of humanity, in the spirit of consideration for the ineffectual efforts of a man who tries to pay his debts; for the poor debtor, to whom it says, "Here you have given honestly all that you have for the purpose of paying your debts; you have turned it all over; we will not hold you in perpetual bondage for the rest of the debt; we will provide by this humane law that when you have honestly given all that you have, when you turn it all over, that debt shall no longer remain a cloud on the sky of your life, forever darkening it, but you shall step out of the bankrupt court a free man to engage again in the struggle of life." And, as you all know, you can not do that now under the laws as they stand on the statute books of our States.

You all know that is true. You all know that there are debtors in your county and in your district in that precise condition to-day, men who can not absolve themselves from their obligation of indebtedness, although they may surrender all of their property. Their property is already swept away by their creditors—not enough to satisfy all of them—and the remainder of their debt rests upon them, and the obligation still remains to pay it. They dare not accumulate property, dare not bend their knowledge and energies to the accumulation of a new estate, because they know if they do it will be swept from them by their creditors who have been watching them from the banks of the stream that these men must labor in.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], who speaks of the harshness of the bankrupt law, should not forget the harshness of the Pennsylvania statute for the collection of debts—as harsh as any statute I have ever known. It lets them take all the creditor has, my friend STONE, though he has a very small exemption, then kicks him out and compels him to live forever in a cloud of debt which he can not remove. And yet you object now that we shall not enact a law saying to that man, when he has given all that he had and honestly to his creditors, instead of relieving him of the burden of this remaining debt, you say, "Step out of the court in Pennsylvania, but you are not yet a free man; your debt is not discharged." We say step out of that court in future with a discharged debt, with a new lease of business life given to you. You can stand in the business community with your fellow-men and begin anew. But he does not want that; he does not want the debt to be absolved; he wants us to play the part of Shylock with the debtor. I say no. I say it is humane; I say it is in accordance with the spirit of the age in which we live, which has been for centuries tempering the wind to the poor debtor; that has been extending exemption in all of the States—in some more than in others—toward making a settlement of these matters and granting an exemption to the honest man, so that he may have a possibility of living again in the future.

So, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen who talk of involuntary bankruptcy and tell us that it is supposed to be in the interest of the creditor class alone will not be able to convince their hearers of the justice of that position. On the contrary, they are seriously mistaken. The creditor class have it in their own hands now to hold and oppress the debtor. With a bankrupt law they can not oppress the honest debtor, and I want to fix the machinery so that this inquisitorial power shall not remain longer in the hands of the people who have power to bear down and crush the business life out of those who have no property and can not have with their best efforts.

So, Mr. Chairman, I think with reference to all of the features of this law, if it is properly appreciated and properly understood, the debtor class are the ones who reap the richest of benefits under it. Gentlemen tell us the same benefits might be reached under an involuntary bankruptcy law. That is true; they may be. A proud-spirited man, struggling under adverse circumstances in his business, keeps the star of hope in the sky above him as his guide; and no matter how dark the financial clouds around him may be, if he is honest he looks to that star just as an escaping slave once looked to the North Star for relief, and believes that by a proper struggle he may escape the disastrous results which seem to be threatening him in his business affairs. You say here, "You may release yourself by going to the bankrupt court and ask to be discharged from the indebtedness." "I don't want to do that; I don't want to allow that," the proud-spirited man says, "I don't want it. I don't want to back out and admit my defeat. I want to keep going, no matter what the struggle may be, if I can possibly do so."

Now, I say, give him a chance. Let him struggle on, not under the same adverse conditions. I am willing that he be given a chance, that he shall be relieved from his obligation. But the friends of the exclusively voluntary bankrupt laws say, "Oh, no; that will not do. You must pay in full or else you must acknowledge your defeat, plead guilty, go into a voluntary court, and have judgment passed upon your estate." The honest man does not want to do that, and I do not want to see any law passed by the United States Congress that will make that a condition, and the only condition, that will relieve the honest man from debts he can not pay.

The involuntary law is necessary to enable the creditors of a dishonest and fraudulent debtor to compel him to do as an honest debtor voluntarily does. So long as a man's creditors have confidence in him, they will not apply the involuntary bankruptcy law to him. They, too, will hope, if his hope and courage be strong. They will hope that he may succeed, and they will lend him a helping hand. But those who want a voluntary bankruptcy law alone say that man must get upon his knees, crawl into a bankruptcy court, and beg to be discharged from debts that he knows to be honest debts, and if you will let him alone he will pay them. This bill proposes to give both remedies. It proposes to put the machinery into the hands of the creditor. It takes out of the hands of the creditor the cruel and inquisitorial power that the State laws give to the creditor and puts into his hand weapons to enforce the payment of his claims so far as the debtor's property will go. But there the law steps in and says, as was said in Shylock's case, "Not one drop of blood. Take your pound of flesh; take your pro rata share of his estate, but nothing further." There are no chains to bind him and hold him down. You must let him up when you have got all he has.

These two features are here. They are humane. Take, for instance, the State law of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] complained of the causes for which a man may be placed in bankruptcy. Does the gentleman remember the causes under the Pennsylvania statute which authorize an attachment, a summary writ, to be issued merely upon the affidavit of one creditor, who may step in and in thirty minutes take hold of all the property a debtor has in his store, tie it up absolutely, shut up the factory or the store, stop the business, turn all the men out of employment, and sell the property? That may be done by attachment in Pennsylvania, in New York, and probably in all the other States. Let me compare the provisions of this law, which justify the placing of a man in bankruptcy involuntarily, and the provisions of the attachment law of the State of Illinois, which is about on a par with those of the other States.

Now, mark you, Judge DANIELS, you owe me a thousand dollars; I am your creditor. You have done some one of these things named in this attachment act. Without your knowledge—without the knowledge of anyone—I privately go to my lawyer. He writes out an affidavit. Nobody knows of it but himself and myself. That affidavit is taken to the clerk's office of the circuit court and privately filed. In ten minutes a writ is issued and in the hands of the sheriff. He goes to your store, your shop, your factory, or whatever it is, and says, "Judge DANIELS, I have an attachment to levy on your stock of goods." That is all the property you have, probably. Very good; there is nothing to be done but to submit. The door of the store is closed and a notice is put up on the outside, "This stock of goods is in the hands of the sheriff." The proceeding is had. You owe the debt; you can not deny that. A judgment is rendered; an order is made to sell your stock of goods; and that stock of goods must sell upon my attachment, and must be sold, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] says, by an auctioneer. He thinks the auctioneer part of this bankruptcy law is something fearful, and yet every public sale in his State is by law conducted by an auctioneer.

Mr. BRODERICK. Under the laws of Illinois you have to give bond for all damages, do you not?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Oh, yes; any individual creditor must do that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. If you consider the State laws which have been enacted for the benefit of the creditor sufficient to protect his rights and interests, what is the necessity of a national bankruptcy law that will give him an additional right against a debtor, which may be used as an engine of oppression, just as these State laws which you complain of are used?

Mr. CONNOLLY. This does not give the creditor an additional right. This involuntary bankrupt law takes away from the creditor the right to oppress the debtor which he now has.

Mr. TAWNEY. What right does it take away from him?

Mr. CONNOLLY. It takes away the right to hold the residue of his unpaid judgment as a threat and a club over the debtor all the rest of his life.

Mr. TAWNEY. But, as far as his rights under the State law are concerned, he is not deprived of any of those rights.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, he is; and I will show you how. Under this attachment law a man's property is attached, put up, and sold. It pays 50 per cent of the amount of the judgment. The other 50 per cent remains there as an unsatisfied judgment, and will remain there as long as debtor and creditor live, and if that debtor acquires any property afterwards by his industry another writ issues and that property is levied on. That is the state of things under your State law.

Mr. TAWNEY. One moment.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Now, under this bankruptcy law, after the creditor has got his portion of the debtor's property, that wipes out the debt, and he can not hold the remainder of his claim as a club over him any longer.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is a benefit to the debtor.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That is a benefit to the debtor.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would not the same benefit be given to the debtor under a voluntary law as under an involuntary law?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then what is the necessity for this?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Then you did not listen to what I said. By voluntary law alone you compel an honest man to humiliate himself by deliberately going into court and asking a discharge from his honest debts; and honest men do not want to do that.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Under the attachment laws it is not necessary. An attachment can be had on making certain allegations of fraud.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Undoubtedly; like those in the bankruptcy law.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Like those under the bankruptcy law. Under this bankruptcy law, if these same allegations are made, the man is thrown into bankruptcy and has to be discharged from these claims in the same way as in an attachment proceeding.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I say when you examine—

Mr. CONNOLLY. You asked a question; you can argue it at the proper time.

Now, here, for instance, is a series of causes for which attachment may issue in the State of Illinois, and it is not singular from other States.

That in any court of record having competent jurisdiction a creditor may have an attachment against the property of his debtor, or that of any one or more of several debtors, when the indebtedness exceeds $20, in any one of the following cases:

- First. Where the debtor is not a resident of this State.
- Second. When the debtor conceals himself or stands in defiance of an officer, so that process can not be served upon him.
- Third. Where the debtor has departed from this State with the intention of having his effects removed from this State.
- Fourth. Where the debtor is about to depart from this State with the intention of having his effects removed from this State.
- Fifth. Where the debtor is about to remove his property from this State to the injury of such creditor.
- Sixth. Where the debtor has, within two years preceding the filing of the affidavit required, fraudulently conveyed or assigned his effects, or a part thereof, so as to hinder or delay his creditors.
- Seventh. Where the debtor has, within two years prior to the filing of such affidavit, fraudulently concealed or disposed of his property so as to hinder or delay his creditors.
- Eighth. Where the debtor is about fraudulently to conceal, assign, or otherwise dispose of his property or effects so as to hinder or delay his creditors.
- Ninth. Where the debt sued for was fraudulently contracted on the part of the debtor: Provided, The statements of the debtor, his agent or attorney, which constitute the fraud shall have been reduced to writing and his signature attached thereto by himself, agent or attorney.

Now, in order to obtain that attachment in my State—and you will find that substantially in all the States—the creditor simply files his affidavit, alleging his belief that some one of these things is true. Thereupon writs of attachment issue that will cover every penny's worth of property that a debtor has, and that property is held there just as firmly by an officer under that writ as the trustee holds the property of a bankrupt under this bankruptcy law.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, sir; if it is only a question.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Is it not true that under this bill, by an affidavit attached to a petition, you may throw a man into bankruptcy?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. And another question. Is there any protection to a debtor provided he is not adjudged a bankrupt and seeks to recover for the injury done him?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, sir; he will find his relief, if fraudulently charged with bankruptcy, for all damages under the common law.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Is there any bond given in this case?

Mr. CONNOLLY. A bond does not make any difference. If he takes the property there is a bond. Immediately on filing the affidavit he does not give bond, but when the property is taken he does. Now, then, suppose in an attachment under any one of those nine causes in the Illinois statute, a suit is brought on that bond by the debtor for damages, all that the creditor has to do is to prove his honest belief that at the time what he averred was true, and then he is released.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. That is not so in Kansas.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Then you must have a peculiar law there.

Mr. WOOD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that under the Illinois statute an affidavit based on information and belief is good?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD] is correct. I can not stop to discuss in detail all the questions that may be raised as to the statutes of all the States. I simply desire to mention these things in a general way for the purpose of showing the difference, and all the difference, that there is between the bankrupt law proposed here and the laws of the various States; and I repeat it, the laws of the various States are made in great part, almost exclusively, in the interest of the creditor. The only law made in the interest of the debtor is the exemption law.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it not true, however, that in almost every State in the Union no attachment can be levied except upon the ground of actual fraud or nonresidence—

Mr. CONNOLLY. I have just read the causes.

Mr. BAILEY. But I say that in almost every State in the Union an attachment is not permitted except upon the ground of actual fraud or nonresidence, and the ground of nonresidence is intended of course to obtain jurisdiction of the property of the defendant. And, as my friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] very properly suggests, in that case the party must file a bond.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Now, please ask your question and let me go on.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I will ask you this question: Is it not true that in almost every State no attachment can be levied except upon the grounds I have mentioned?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I say no; it is not. I have just read a State statute which differs radically from the gentleman's statement of the law.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman surely did not understand me to state that there was no State where the law was different, but I said in nearly every State.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I said all or nearly all. I do not know what the causes for an attachment are in Texas. I have not read the statutes of all the forty-five States on that point.

Mr. BAILEY. I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that there are not five States in the Union that permit an attachment except upon actual fraud or nonresidence.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Well, you undertake to say that, but you do not incur any responsibility or liability by that undertaking. You do not have to give any bond. [Laughter.] I accept that as your belief, but I think when you go to the statutes of the forty-five States of the Union you will find that in most of them the causes for an attachment are substantially as they are in Illinois.

Mr. BAILEY. You still imprison men for debt in Illinois.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Now, that remark shows that the gentleman is not so familiar with the statutes of the States as he thinks he is. We do not imprison men for debt in Illinois.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it not true that under the law of Illinois you can bring a debtor into court, the judge orders him to surrender his property, and he can be kept in jail until he does surrender?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Not for a debt.

Mr. BAILEY. For a tort?

Mr. CONNOLLY. For a tort, a personal injury or wrong—for a willful personal injury against the person or property of another.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course I would not assume to know the law of the gentleman's State better than he does, but I am positive that I have read such a law as that, under the process of the court, a debtor may be brought into court, may be ordered to deliver up his property to his creditors, and may be imprisoned until he has complied with the order of the court.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Undoubtedly, there were some old decisions to that effect before our new constitution.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I am right in my statement.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Not since our constitution of 1870, which is twenty-six years old. There used to be imprisonment for debt in all the States.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; and I am sorry to say that Illinois was one of the last to abolish it.

Mr. CONNOLLY. One by one they have all abolished it, just as the policy has been to abolish all these harsh laws made in the interest of creditors. As I said a while ago, this legislation for debt collecting commenced in the interests of the creditors, and it went on for centuries in their interest, until finally among civilized people the debtors began to get a hearing and humanity made itself felt in their interest, and the States exempted property in various amounts for the benefit of the debtor's family. The gentleman's own State of Texas is a notable example of the extent to which humanitarianism has gone in depriving the creditors of the rights to collect their debts and exempting almost a fortune for the benefit of the debtor's family.

Mr. BAILEY. Permit me to say that Texas was the first State in the history of the world that exempted the homestead, and it is something in the history of our State that we would not willingly part with.

Mr. CONNOLLY. It is very creditable to Texas, and therefore I would expect to see every Texas gentleman here supporting a bankruptcy bill which would tend to still further protect the debtor from the unseemly rapacity of the creditor. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, of course this bill is not in the interest of the debtor class alone.

This bill goes to the extent of protecting the creditor class in this respect, that it gives all creditors a chance to be dealt with on precisely the same footing. It establishes a rule of uniformity, so that the creditor who lives close by the debtor gets no undue advantage over the creditor who lives a hundred or five hundred or a thousand miles away. It is framed on the principle that when a man is insolvent the law will take hold of his property and divide it equally among all his creditors pro rata. Is there any reason why it should not be so?

There are certain excepted debts, debts contracted in a fiduciary capacity—wages, taxes due to the State, the municipality, or the United States. Those are exempted; those must be paid. Of what remains the creditors will all get their pro rata share. What is wrong about that? This provision is based on a humanitarian principle toward the debtor. It says to him, "Give up all you have; call your creditors all in; do not give an undue advantage to any one of them, but let each man come up, prove his debt, and receive his pro rata upon the debt that he has proven. Then you can walk out to begin life anew." That is equity; that is simple justice as regards these men who hold the unfortunate position of creditors of an insolvent man. This is a relief from the inquisitorial harshness of all the laws now existing for the enforcement of contracts and the payment of debts.

Mr. TALBERT. I am very much interested in the gentleman's remarks, and as I am seeking information, I would like to ask him a question. Will he kindly state why it is that this matter can not as well be left to the States, each State regulating the subject for itself?

Mr. CONNOLLY. There is a manifest reason why there should be a general law on the subject.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The States can not provide by law for an equal distribution of property among all the creditors.

Mr. HENDERSON. Nor can they annul contracts.

Mr. CONNOLLY. No; they can not annul contracts of course; and Congress has no power to do that, either, but Congress has power to relieve from debts growing out of contracts, and the States have not.

Mr. TALBERT. How is it that we have been getting along without this law?

Mr. CONNOLLY. This is the way we have been getting along: The creditor living nearest to the debtor, or the creditor who is most diligent, steps in quickly and gets his judgment. Two or three or four creditors, being more advantageously placed than others, get their judgments; they levy on the property and exhaust it. Creditors living in other States or in distant counties of the same State know nothing of the insolvency of the debtor until judgments are rendered for the benefit of the favored few; and these creditors who have not had similar advantages find the property all gone, so that they can not collect anything. The debtor's property is all swept away to pay a few of the most active and diligent creditors.

Now, the purpose of this bill is to protect creditors all over the United States. Business men do not limit their trade to State lines. Trade and commerce extend all over our country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Commerce has abolished State lines. So far as trade and commerce are concerned, we are all one people. New York trades with San Francisco; New Orleans with Chicago; the people in the intermediate States are trading with each other, back and forth, all the time and extending credit all the time. The lumber that comes from Texas and Mississippi is shipped to the Northern States, and is scattered all over the prairies of my own State. Lumber dealers are buying it from Mississippi and Texas men on credit. Now, the effect of this law will be to let those lumber dealers in the various States come and share equally in the property of any failing debtor.

I have spoken of the general features of this bill. I want now to speak of some of the specific features that have been criticised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE]. The gentleman has stated very properly that we have had three bankrupt laws in the United States. The one which was enacted in 1800 remained in force but a few years, when it was repealed; it was to continue in operation, at any rate, but five years. I have here a communication from President Monroe submitting to Congress a statement of the number of cases commenced under the bankruptcy law of 1800 in the States of Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, New York, and the District of Columbia—491 cases in all. I do not know why the inquiry to the President was limited to those particular States. But by the statement of President Monroe it appears that in Virginia there were 45 commissions under that law; in Maryland, 58; in Pennsylvania, 208; in New York, 166, and in the District of Columbia, 14. I find that in every one of the 208 cases in Pennsylvania a final certificate of discharge was allowed to the bankrupt. In one case in the State of New York the bankrupt's estate paid 100 cents on the dollar with interest. In other cases the amount realized ran down as low as 4 per cent.

The law of 1800 was purely an involuntary bankruptcy law; it had no voluntary feature at all. The law of 1841 had both features, voluntary and involuntary. That act, however, was repealed by the same Congress that enacted it. Then came the law of 1867, which I think, and always believed, was a most infamous law in that it allowed the estate of the debtor to be absolutely eaten up in costs and expenses. It was of no benefit to the creditor except in rare cases; it was of some benefit to the debtor, because under it he could get a discharge from his indebtedness. It was, I think, and always believed it to be, a most complete failure. There is no one familiar with the operation of that law who will read the provisions of this one and compare them with it and fail to see what a vast difference there is between the exhaustion of the estate in fees and charges under the provision of that law as compared with this one.

The amount that may be paid out is very small. The largest fee that anybody can possibly get is received by the trustee. The referee gets only $10, the trustee gets $5, and the clerk gets $10. Now, there is the sum total of all the fees that may come out of the estate, except that when the dividend is made and paid the trustee will receive 5 per cent on the amount of the dividend so paid. That is about the ordinary fee that is allowed by the laws of the different States for such service, and what is usually paid to the administrator of an estate for collecting and paying out the money. And that cost can not be paid to him, remember, until the dividend is made, thereby insuring him to give diligence and careful work in closing up the estate.

Now, one other great objection that existed to the old law of 1867 was this: That it forced all of the litigation and all of the proceedings, as a rule, to the place where the United States court for the district was held. Registers in bankruptcy were not numerous. This law provides that there shall be a referee in every county, and the vast amount of business is done before the referee. Under the old law one or two registers in a district only were provided for, and the reference of cases was made to these men and they got all of the fees. Some of them I know made fortunes out of the old bankruptcy law simply acting as registers.

This law obviates that difficulty by saying that there shall be a referee in each county. This is a minor court, taking testimony or proof of claims, and for all of the detail work. It provides that it shall be done in the county where the bankrupt lives and does not force him to go to a distant court for that purpose.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Is it not true that the question of whether a state of bankruptcy exists in regard to any man must be brought before the court before which the claim is pending?

Mr. CONNOLLY. No, sir; if the bankrupt denies the act of bankruptcy it is tried before the jury.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I am speaking now of where it is to be tried. Is it not true that the question of the discharge of the bankrupt must be tried after all before the judge of the court before which the case is pending? If that is true why make a distinction in the trial of the question of discharge between the court and the judge? In the case of the trial of the question as to whether a state of bankruptcy exists or not, you try that before the court, but when the question of discharge arises you want to send that before the judge.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Because they are not properly questions for a jury trial, but for a court to pass upon. The court has a record of all the proceedings, and can determine as to the question of the propriety of allowing a discharge.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. But upon the question of discharge, is not the point as to whether preference has been given to any creditor a matter for legal determination?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Is it not a question to be determined by evidence, as much as any other question that may be presented in the case?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Well, these are questions that the court can decide as well or better than a jury.

But, Mr. Chairman, continuing with the discussion of this particular part of the bill. In all suits brought by the trustee in connection with the estate and the debts due to it, they must be tried in the local State court; that is, they must be tried in the same court that the bankrupt would be himself compelled to bring his suit in if he were not a bankrupt. This localizes the proceedings in that regard. It brings the referee and the court just where the bankrupt lives and refuses to allow such proceedings to be tried in the Federal court except where the bankrupt himself is allowed to enter the Federal court with his suit. It withdraws all that is possible from the Federal court.

Now, as to the objections that have been made to this provision. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] insisted that this law would be a terror to any honest man going into business; that he would hesitate to take the risks involved in going into business if this law were enacted.

I maintain that this would not terrorize any honest man. It might be a terror to the rascal, but not to the honest man. Why do I say that? I turn to the second section of this bill, and I find in that section every cause laid down that will justify any creditor or any court to put a man into bankruptcy. Now, let us see, briefly, what these causes are. Nothing except one of these things will justify any creditor to attempt to put his debtor into bankruptcy.

Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having (1) concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors, and shall not have returned at least forty-eight hours before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, and before the rights of creditors shall have been impaired, altered, or interfered with.

Now, does that catch the honest man who is willing to pay his debts? This refers to a man who leaves his home, goes away to avoid the service of a summons in an action for debt against him, and who goes away with the purpose of defeating the creditor who may have that summons against him.

The second cause assigned is that a man shall have—

Failed for thirty days and until a petition is filed, while insolvent, to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold within such time under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale.

Now, that man must be insolvent.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman now, but I have the revised statutes of Illinois here on the question between us a moment ago.

Mr. CONNOLLY. You will have time to make a speech directly.

Mr. BAILEY. Whenever it suits your convenience, I want to call your attention to the statute.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Oh, well, I am unwilling to be educated now on the statutes of Illinois.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Referring to the section you have just read, would it not in every case, or nearly so, where an attachment was run throw a man into bankruptcy if anyone took advantage of it? Is there hardly any case where an attachment is run in which you can get relief in any court within thirty days?

Mr. CONNOLLY. A man must be insolvent first, and when he is insolvent and when a creditor comes and runs an attachment on his property and takes all he has, does not that leave all the rest of his debts hanging like a burden over him? Is it not better to have a law enacted that will divide that property between all his creditors and then give him a discharge, instead of having it pay only one debt and leaving all the rest hanging over him?

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Suppose that to be an unjust claim without opportunity or time within which to defend it?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Well, the same thing is true about the attachment, if it is an unjust claim. The term of court is three months after. The injustice of that claim can not be determined until after a hearing in that term of court, three or more months away. In the meantime his business is closed up, his property is sold by the officers of the law, and the man is effectually bankrupted, because here come all his other creditors then.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. But in this case, if it happens to be an unjust claim, there is a bond filed, is there not, to protect him against that, and also to protect his creditors?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I never knew an attachment bond to protect anybody yet.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Well, I have.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I never knew one to protect anybody.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. So have I.

Mr. CONNOLLY. This provision can not apply to anybody except a man who is insolvent. He must be insolvent to justify putting him into bankruptcy.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Well, generally, when a petition in bankruptcy is filed, it is held to be good.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Oh, well, that goes upon the theory that the law means nothing. Courts generally construe the law as it is written, to carry out its purpose. The man must be insolvent, must be in a condition where his property will not pay his debts. Then, by coming in under the bankrupt law, his debts are all discharged; but leave it as you want to leave it now, one debt is paid and all the other debts remain. The third ground of bankruptcy is that a man has—

Made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors and has not regained the ownership and possession of such property before the rights of creditors have been altered, impaired, or changed by reason of such transfer and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy.

Now, is that the case of an honest man? That is the case of a man who has made a transfer of some of his property for the specific purpose of defeating his creditors. Why should not that man be put into bankruptcy. The fourth ground is that he shall have—

Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts.

Now, if you leave him as he is now, the man files a written statement in court of his inability to pay his debts. His creditors come on him and sweep away what he has, but keep the balance of his debts to remain as a cloud to hang over him perpetually. This law lifts that cloud, and releases him from his debts.

The fifth ground is that a man shall have—

Made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property, or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference, and has not regained the ownership of such property or released same from such levy before the rights of creditors shall have been altered, changed, or impaired by reason of such transfer, taking, or levy and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy.

There is an attempt by the individual to cheat some of his creditors by paying others, taking the property of A to pay B.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. But there is no provision there that he does it fraudulently.

Mr. CONNOLLY. He does it for the purpose of giving a preference. Is not that fraudulent?

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Nearly every State in the Union provides that he may do that.

Mr. CONNOLLY. But every State in the Union, when he does that, and his property only pays a part of his debts, holds the rest of his debts over him as a club. This releases him.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. If the gentleman will permit me—

Mr. CONNOLLY. I would rather the gentleman would not interrupt me so much, because I am taking too much time. I want to get through with this section. The sixth reason for bankruptcy is that a man shall have—

Procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself with intent to defeat his creditors, and suffered same to remain unpaid until ten days before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, provided that a payment or satisfaction of such a judgment by a sale of any of the debtor's property or from the proceeds of such a sale shall not be deemed a payment of such judgment under the provisions of this section.

Now, is that the honest man that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] spoke of? The man who has gone and deliberately permitted a judgment to be entered against him so that thereby he may defraud his creditors? Certainly that man would not be held up as a model, honest business man. The seventh ground is that a man has—

Secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors, and has not surrendered such property to such legal process at least ten days before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy.

Do you want to protect that man? This seizes him if he attempts the secreting of his property. It brings it to light and applies that property to the payment of all his creditors equally.

Eighth. Suffered while insolvent an execution of $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amounts, against him to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such execution shall be paid before a petition is filed.

Now, that may happen, of course, to a man who is perfectly honest.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. If a man has honestly given a preference under the State law, and he may do it, then he is thrown into bankruptcy on that account, and he is prohibited, although doing it honestly, from being discharged under the provisions of this bill. Under the second section—

Mr. CONNOLLY. I am not discussing that section.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Is it not true that you throw him into bankruptcy for doing what he believes to be honest, and prohibit his being discharged on the same ground?

Mr. CONNOLLY. No; it is not.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I call your attention to it right here—

Mr. HENDERSON. You may throw a man into bankruptcy for his wicked acts, and you do not discharge him on account of those acts.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. You do not say that it shall be done.

Mr. HENDERSON. What the gentleman proposes is: You say that a man can not be discharged for a matter that we are moving on him for. We move on him for doing a wicked act, and under the act of 1867 we had three times the number of grounds on which discharge could be denied compared to what there are in this bill.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. That may be.

Mr. CONNOLLY. You are speaking about something that is not in this section.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. You are putting a man in bankruptcy.

Mr. CONNOLLY. It is the seventh paragraph to which I am addressing myself, where a man secretes his property to evade its being levied on by legal process and for the purpose of defeating his creditors. Now, you say that he has honestly done this.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. No; that is not the one. I am speaking of section 5, on page 6.

Mr. CONNOLLY. You are talking about a different matter. The eighth paragraph is:

Suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against him to be returned no property found.

Now, I do not claim, I do not insist and say that an honest man may not find himself in that situation. Of course he may be unfortunate and may have one or more executions amounting to $500 or more returned no property found against him, and be where he can not help himself. Now, you do not want to give that man the benefit of a discharge from his debts. You want that under the law as it is now, held in terrorem over him for his life, while this bill, more humane, comes in and says that a man in that condition may be placed in involuntary bankruptcy, that his property, whatever is subject to execution, shall go to his creditors, and he shall be discharged. Now, there is the difference between the two things. We wish to discharge a man who honestly has become insolvent, who has used his property in accordance with law, and who has tried fairly to pay his debts and failed. We say in that kind of a case that he ought to be discharged from all of his debts. You say, "No." You want your "pound of flesh" and you want "the blood to follow." A man who has—

Suspended and not resumed for thirty days, and until a petition is filed while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over.

There is another instance where a man perfectly honest may be compelled to suspend. He can not, by force of misfortune that may overwhelm him, pay his paper. He is insolvent. His creditor, as the law stands now, can come in and by execution and attachment seize everything he has and hold it. They can put him on the rack, and by inquisitorial bills filed for discovery ascertain whether he has any other property, recover it all, and divide it out to the diligent creditors, and still leave the debtor with an unpaid balance on this judgment, leaving him to struggle all the rest of his life. The bankruptcy law comes in and says when his property is all given up he is released.

I have enumerated all the causes that lead to an adjudication of bankruptcy, every one of them. There are only three wherein an honest man can be thrown into bankruptcy. A man who is honest, an unfortunate merchant, may, in three of these instances, be placed in bankruptcy under this law, but even then he is in a better condition with this law than without it. If placed in bankruptcy under this law his property is taken and goes to his creditors and he is absolutely discharged. Without this law his property is taken and goes to his creditors and the balance of his debts remain hanging over him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to say that in every section and in every particular this bill is what I would approve. I think I see several places where amendments can be made that will not change its character, that will not change its features, and yet that will make it more in accord with the best and most advanced thought upon the subject of bankruptcy laws.

Now, a word as to the general question of a bankrupt law and its necessity. We are a great trading and commercial people. The people of all these States trade interchangeably with each other without reference to State lines, and yet when it comes to collecting debts the parties are all met by the State lines and by the State laws, and the purpose of this bill is to use the power which the Constitution gives to Congress to say that in the collection of debts these State lines shall disappear and the laws governing the matter shall be the same throughout the country, except that where the States in their humanity have provided an exemption for the wife and children of the debtor those humane laws shall be respected. Differing as those State laws do, they are still to be respected and the debtor is to be given the benefit of them. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON. How much time has the gentleman from Illinois consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. An hour and eight minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, will the other side proceed?

Mr. BAILEY. My friend from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] is going to proceed, but I have asked him to let me occupy a few minutes now to clear up a little controversy which I had a moment ago with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] about the laws of his own State.

I declared that in Illinois they still allowed the imprisonment of men for debt, and my friend, contrary to his usual courtesy, accused me of being ignorant. If I am ignorant on that point, Mr. Chairman, it is because the revised statutes of Illinois have misled me.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The gentleman had better look at the constitution of 1870.

Mr. BAILEY. I have the constitution here also. In examining this question, Mr. Chairman, I had looked at the insolvent laws of the various States, and I did not think it possible that I had made a mistake as to the law of Illinois on this point. I read now from the revised statutes of Illinois, chapter 72, section 2:

When any person is arrested or imprisoned upon any process issued for the purpose of holding such person to bail upon any indebtedness, or in any civil action when malice is not the gist of the action, or when any debtor is surrendered or committed to custody by his bail in any such action, or is arrested or imprisoned upon execution in any such action, such person may be released from such arrest or imprisonment upon complying with the provisions of this act.

Now, if they do not suffer a debtor to be imprisoned in the State of Illinois for debt, I am unable to perceive the necessity for that provision.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That may be, but still they do not imprison men for debt in Illinois. They never have done so since the constitution of 1870.

Mr. BAILEY. The provision which I have just read explicitly provides for cases in which men are imprisoned for debt.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I would like to see the gentleman from Texas come up to Illinois and try to enforce that provision of the statute as he understands it.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, if I found judges who did not know any more about the law of Illinois than my friend seems to, I would succeed. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. You had better come and try it.

Mr. BAILEY. I ought not to have made that remark, Mr. Chairman, and I beg the gentleman's pardon, for I know that he is a very distinguished lawyer.

Mr. CONNOLLY. You are reading from an old statute.

Mr. BAILEY. This is Myers's authorized edition of the Revised Statutes of Illinois, published in 1895.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I understand that. It is Cothran's edition, a private edition.

Mr. BAILEY. It is Myers's edition, with Cothran's notes.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Look at the bottom of that second section and you will find the letters "R. S., 1845," meaning Revised Statutes of 1845.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly. We have revised statutes that go back as far as 1823. Now, will my friend say that this statute is not in force in Illinois?

Mr. CONNOLLY. That statute is not operative in Illinois at all, so far as imprisonment for debt is concerned. There is one instance where a capias ad respondendum or a capias ad satisfaciendum may be issued for willful personal tort, but that is the only case.

Mr. BAILEY. Here I find this provision:

Jail fees. In all cases where any person is committed to the jail of any county upon any writ of capias ad respondendum or capias ad satisfaciendum—

Mr. CONNOLLY. That is what I told you.

Mr. BAILEY. Then they do permit a man to be committed to jail upon a capias to satisfy a debt?

Mr. CONNOLLY. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Then why does it provide for jail fees in such cases?

Mr. CONNOLLY. If the gentleman will come to me privately and take lessons, and not occupy the time of the House, I will talk with him.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman publicly said that I was ignorant, and I wanted to prove in the presence of the House that if I was so it was the fault of the revised statutes of Illinois.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Either that or the fault of the man who reads them and does not understand them.

Mr. BAILEY. That would be a very serious fault; but I have never yet been accused of being unable to understand the English language; and I am willing to submit to the candid judgment of every man who has heard this colloquy whether I was not justified in saying what I did upon that language; and the gentleman himself admits it by saying that the statute is no longer operative.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I will accept the gentleman's apology. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will accept the apology of my friend from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. All right.

Mr. BAILEY. But, before we leave the question of the constitution of Illinois, I want to read from that instrument. Perhaps I had better take the precaution to examine the date of this constitution—

Mr. CONNOLLY. I think it would be well.

Mr. BAILEY. I presume, however, that they do not publish an obsolete constitution in the statutes of 1895.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Pretty nearly all our volumes of statutes publish all our constitutions.

Mr. BAILEY. This volume embraces only the one; so that I am certain to have the right one.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The gentleman had better look at the date, so as to be sure that he does not get a "back number."

Mr. BAILEY. I find that the constitution of Illinois, as here published, was "adopted in convention May 13, 1870; ratified by the people July 2, 1870; in force August 8, 1870." Is that the last?

Mr. CONNOLLY. That is good.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, I want to read section 12, which I find on page 3 of this volume:

No person shall be imprisoned for debt unless upon refusal to deliver up his estate for the benefit of his creditors in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes; he is imprisoned for his refusal to deliver up his property—not for the debt.

Mr. BAILEY. That was exactly my statement—that when a debtor was ordered to deliver up his property, and did not do it, he could be put in prison until he did so.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Does the gentleman want a certificate from me that he understands the constitution of Illinois? If he does I will give it to him.

Mr. BAILEY. Unless the gentleman were understood to possess a better knowledge of the law of Illinois than he now exhibits, his certificate would not admit me to the bar of Illinois.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I admit that it would not; you would have to pass an examination there; and I would not guarantee your admission.

Mr. BAILEY. I beg pardon of my friend from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] for having thus interrupted him.

Mr. HENDERSON. How much time has the gentleman from Texas consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Six minutes.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I will say in the outset that I believe this bill is superior to any law that has been enacted on this subject in this country. As was stated by the chairman of the committee in his opening discussion, the subcommittee who had this bill in charge gave it much consideration, and when it completed its work the bill was reported by the subcommittee to the full committee, and it held daily sessions for three or four weeks for the consideration of this measure. And I am frank to say that the committee endeavored to present to the House the best possible bill on this subject. As a member of the committee I regret to differ from the majority; yet I think this proposed measure contains some objectionable and dangerous features, and there are many other gentlemen here who take the same view, but it is not because of any fault of the committee. It is because, as I believe, of the inherent impossibility of preparing an involuntary bankruptcy law which will meet the objections that have been raised and urged against it, especially when it undertakes as much as the one before us. This bill embraces, nominally, nine grounds or acts of bankruptcy, and each of these grounds contains more than one act which would subject debtors to the penalties of the involuntary provisions.

I want to state first my objection to this feature of the bill. I am not going to attack the bankruptcy system generally. I am not opposed to all bankruptcy legislation; and this bill may be amended when reached for amendment (and I hope it will be) so that all of us who believe in such legislation may vote for it.

I know that there is some demand at this time, and has been for a few years, for some system of bankruptcy legislation. But I do not believe there is any general demand over the country for this particular measure or any stringent or harsh measure. I represent what I think is at least an average district—one of the older settled districts of the State in which I live, where there are more than forty banks and where there is a prosperous wholesale and retail business; and since this bill has been under consideration in the Judiciary Committee I have received only four letters from my district regarding it.

One of the men who wrote protested against any sort of bankruptcy legislation. Another gentleman said he was in favor of some sort of legislation on the subject, and the third man wanted some position under the law in case of its enactment. [Laughter.] I received the fourth letter the other day, asking for information and for a copy of the bill. And so I have reached the conclusion that there is no such general demand throughout the country for the passage of this bill as some gentlemen would have us imagine.

While it is true, as has been stated here, that this country has been passing through a period of great financial depression and many business people are still feeling the effects of it, and while there have been many failures within these years of honest men who either have returned or hope to reenter business, and some of whom would like to be relieved of their burdens, yet I believe if we could understand all the circumstances we would find this class is comparatively small.

Under the insolvency act of Kansas, where an assignment is made for the benefit of creditors and they are satisfied that all the property of the debtor has been delivered to the assignee in good faith, there are rare instances where the creditors do not come together and agree to a final distribution, and give full releases. I have known many such cases, and if that is the observation of the lawyers here generally who have had experience under their State insolvency laws, then it would seem that there is no urgent necessity for the enactment of these harsh provisions.

But, Mr. Chairman, as I admit, there is a small class who would like to have a voluntary law enacted; there is another small class who would like to have a statute on this subject, with involuntary provisions to aid in the collection of debts. I do not believe this class is as large as some gentlemen here seem to think. The methods of doing business are entirely different now from what they were in years past. The wholesale merchants throughout this country do not take the business risks they did thirty or forty years ago. The retail men in the Mississippi Valley no longer go to New York or elsewhere to the wholesale men to make purchases of their supplies. The country dealer no longer makes his semi-annual visit to the wholesale houses. The wholesale merchant sends his agent through the country to men who deal with him, and these agents understand their business as thoroughly as any class of business men. They know what they are doing and what they are expected to do; and when they see a dealer for the purpose of making a sale to him they know exactly what they are after. They go out to sell goods, and they make sales where it is safe to do so. It is a part of their business to inquire whether it is safe or not, and they do it. They understand the responsibility of the purchaser before the sale is made. And, in addition to this, there is the system of commercial agencies which collect and give out information and place it within the reach of every wholesale dealer. By reason of these innovations, business is not transacted as it was a few years ago, and there is no necessity for wholesale men taking such risks as they formerly had to take. They understand who they are dealing with, and if they are not satisfied with a customer no sale is made. I do not believe that there is one failure out of twenty among retail men that is not now understood and anticipated for months before the failure occurs, so perfect is the system of obtaining information in reference to the financial and business standing of merchants throughout the country. So, when we consider these conditions, I think we will agree that there is a smaller class of wholesale men who demand this legislation than we have been led to believe from newspaper publications and from the contention which has been made on the floor of this House.

But, Mr. Chairman, I said this bill might be amended so that many gentlemen who are now opposed to it would be willing to support it. If section 2, which enumerates the acts of bankruptcy, could be modified so as to allow debtors to be adjudged bankrupts only in case of actual fraud, this would be a fair bill.

Mr. RAY. What are the changes you would make?

Mr. BRODERICK. I would make a transfer of property by an insolvent debtor with intent to defraud creditors and the concealing of the debtor for the purpose of avoiding the service of summons and defrauding creditors the only grounds. If I could have these changes incorporated in the bill, instead of the nine as now written, I would be willing to support it. But I am unwilling to do so with the nine specifications that now exist. These changes, if made, will improve the bill and remove much opposition. The letters read from the Clerk's desk this morning from distinguished judges who had experience under former bankruptcy laws show the opinion of those best qualified to judge of the merits of this sort of legislation.

These judges stated what is the common knowledge of every official, lawyer, or merchant who has had any actual experience as to the practical operation and effect of these laws. If you ask the man who was registrar under the old law for his opinion, unless he again wants the office he will say that under that law there were many cases of oppression. So generally was this understood that the President of the United States recommended its repeal, and the House twice passed a repealing act before the Senate would concur, and then the sentiment against the law became so strong throughout the country that both Houses acted, and the repeal of that obnoxious measure was accomplished.

The grounds for involuntary bankruptcy in the former law are not materially changed or modified by this bill. This is the vital part, and it contains as many objectionable grounds of bankruptcy as the law of 1867. We have here nine acts for involuntary bankruptcy, and some of them double-headers, embracing more than one ground. There are nominally nine stated in the bill, but there are, as a matter of fact, many more.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does not the crying demand for a national bankruptcy law inhere in the fact that under the insolvency laws of most of our States inequitable preferences are permitted?

Mr. BRODERICK. That is probably one reason for the demand, but preferences are not permitted under the laws of all the States. They are not permitted in the State in which I live; preferences are expressly prohibited by the law of my State.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I will state a case that happened to a member on this floor, belonging to my delegation. A debtor in New York owed him $6,000. Preferences are permitted in the State of New York. He took advantage of that fact and made preferences.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Before making his assignment?

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Before making an assignment, before taking advantage of the insolvency laws of New York, he gave preferences to his mother, sister, etc. Then he took advantage of the insolvency laws and completely defrauded his New Jersey creditor out of $6,000.

Mr. BRODERICK. Your State ought not to allow preferences.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey if his friend ever attempted to set aside that assignment?

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I do not know that he did.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Then if he did not it is his own fault if he lost his debt.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does the gentleman mean to assert that no preferences are allowed in New York State?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. No; I mean no fraudulent preference can be made prior to an assignment to a man's mother, sisters, or members of his family.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I understand from the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], a member of the Judiciary Committee, that preferences are allowed in that State.

Mr. RAY. To the extent of one-third of the assigned estate.

Mr. BRODERICK. If preferences are allowed in the State of New York, then the legislature of the State ought to remedy that condition of things.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. But it is our duty to enact an equitable bankruptcy law, and to do away with these inequities.

Mr. BRODERICK. The Constitution has simply granted the power to Congress to enact bankruptcy legislation. It is not directory, but simply a grant of power which Congress may or may not exercise.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. But that implies a duty to do it when the occasion arises.

Mr. BRODERICK. Then Congress has been derelict in its duty nearly ever since the adoption of the Constitution, for the three bankruptcy laws that have been enacted in this country have only existed altogether about fourteen years.

Mr. BAILEY. Under the proposition coming from the Judiciary Committee, could any man obtain the benefit of a discharge after having given a preference to anybody?

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I understand he could not. I was talking about the insolvency laws of the State.

Mr. RAY. That is, if he had given any fraudulent preferences.

Mr. BAILEY. No; any preferences at all, as the proposition comes from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BRODERICK. That there is some demand in the country for the enactment of this legislation I have already admitted. So there has been a demand at other periods in the history of the country, and there have been laws enacted, and yet it is true that in each case as soon as the people understood the practical operation of the law there was a cry all over the country for its repeal. The last law existed longer than any other. That was on the statute book for about nine years, but within three years after that law went into operation there was a demand in nearly every State in the Union for its repeal, and this question of repeal in some localities was discussed from the rostrum by all political parties because of the demand from the business people for the repeal of that legislation. In no instance has a bankruptcy law in this country met the expectations of those who have advocated it. It has almost wholly failed of its purpose.

I have examined some of the reasons given for the repeal of former laws. There have been many objections raised, but the three principal objections to the last one were the excessive costs and expense attending the settlement of estates, the inaccessibility of the courts, and the abuses practiced under the law. It has been contended here that the costs under this proposed law will be reasonable. But it must be remembered that the costs which go to the officers are but a small portion of the actual expense in settling a bankrupt estate. The expense and loss of time in being absent from business must be taken into account.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Is it not the purpose of this bill, by appointing a referee in each county in the district, to bring the administration of the law to the door of the litigant?

Mr. BRODERICK. The referees may settle some questions, but they can not settle all questions.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Is not that the purpose of the bill?

Mr. BRODERICK. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. They will settle all the questions of fact in the counties where the litigants reside and take the law questions to the court, which will be at a very slight expense.

Mr. BRODERICK. They will not settle contested questions. These will be sent to the court.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Is it not a fact that you can not use a referee to decide a question of fact unless he is willing to withdraw from his privilege of jury trial?

Mr. BRODERICK. I understand that to be so. Where there is no jury demanded questions of fact may be settled by the referee; but questions of law and questions of fact, where a jury is required, must go to the court for adjudication.

Mr. Chairman, it was said by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee in his opening discussion that since the last bankruptcy legislation the Federal courts have been brought to the doors of all the people. This is doubtless true of his State, but all the States have not been so fortunate. In my State the Federal courts are held at four places—three in the eastern portion and one in the southern; and many of the people of that State, probably one-half, have to travel from 50 to 300 miles to reach the Federal courts. Gentlemen here know that many of the new States are large, and courts are held as yet at but few places.

There is another objection which I think is entitled to much weight. It is provided in one section of this bill that liens and judgments against the debtor, obtained within four months prior to the commencement of proceedings, shall be dissolved or abrogated upon filing the petition in bankruptcy. It is provided further that any lien taken for a debt without present consideration, any lien taken for an antecedent debt, is destroyed by this act, so that in case of failure these liabilities must be taken into the bankruptcy court and stand upon the same footing as unsecured debts. Now, I believe that in all small towns and villages of the country people have about the same business methods, where opportunities are substantially the same. The business people in these towns who have not sufficient money of their own borrow from the local banks to tide them over embarrassments, and in States where they can do so, some mortgage their goods and wares. In my State they may mortgage to secure preexisting debts, and in case of embarrassment they sometimes do so. This is no crime. Suppose I want to borrow money and go into business. I go to a home bank, secure a loan, and induce Mr. NORTHWAY to become my security. I borrow a thousand dollars. That bank carries me along for one, two, or three years, but Mr. NORTHWAY finally wants to change his business, or for some reason wants to be relieved from the responsibility, and I am willing to relieve him if I can get other security. I offer security on my stock of goods in order to relieve Mr. NORTHWAY. The bank cashier goes to the register of deeds, or whoever keeps the record of liens, and examines the record and finds nothing there against my property. The banker does not know my business in New York or Chicago, where I have been purchasing goods. He takes a mortgage on my goods and releases Mr. NORTHWAY from my obligation. Now, here is a mortgage for a preexisting debt. This banker had been helping to carry me for years; he not only helped me, but helped my creditors by enabling me to go on with my business. But after I have given this mortgage things turn against me, and I am forced into bankruptcy. Now, then, the banker, although he has used diligence in his business, and had no notice of any other liabilities against me, released the security he had and took other, a perfectly legitimate transaction, and without any intention to defraud, yet under the provisions of this bill he is to go into the bankruptcy court with his security destroyed and take his pro rata with the other creditors.

Now, I say that this provision is wrong. It is wrong to the country banks and merchants, and will embarrass the small dealers in every State in the Union. This local help that they get is what they depend upon to carry them through from year to year, and if this bill becomes a law the banks and people who have money to help along the business men in their respective localities will be unwilling to extend this help because of this law.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Do you say that a mortgage such as you have described is as good as a lien in the State of Kansas?

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes; a mortgage given any time before an assignment is good.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Upon a stock of goods?

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes; our courts have sustained such mortgages when given in good faith.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I do not know of a State where a chattel mortgage given with power to sell, retaining possession in the mortgagor, is good under such circumstances.

Mr. BRODERICK. It is good in our State, and it is good in Missouri.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Well, now, I know two States.

Mr. BRODERICK. Provided it is recorded.

Mr. NORTHWAY. In at least twenty-seven of the States such a transaction is held to be prima facie fraudulent.

Mr. BRODERICK. It has been held to be good in our State and in some others.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have just called attention to section 67. I think that should be materially changed, and I hope that the gentleman will study it and see if it is not open to objection.

There are other objections to this bill. I have not time to enumerate them all, but I will indicate one more. Corporations are exempted from its operations. There has been of late a tendency in this country to do everything through corporations. The original purpose of the State in dividing its sovereignty with a corporation was good. That object was to bring together aggregations of capital to establish and carry on enterprises that individuals were not able or willing to undertake. But for the last few years there has been a marked tendency throughout this country to do everything by corporations, and this provision of the pending bill, if enacted into law, will certainly greatly aggravate and promote this growing evil.

Mr. RAY. Do I understand the gentleman to object to the provision in this bill which denies to corporations the right to go into voluntary insolvency?

Mr. BRODERICK. I think corporations, except municipal and national banks, which are now regulated by law, ought to be included in the provisions of the act or be entirely excluded.

Mr. RAY. I want to know whether I understood the gentleman correctly. I understood him to say that there was another objection to this bill and that that objection was that it denied to corporations the right to take the benefit of this act voluntarily.

Mr. BRODERICK. I think they should come in with others or not be in it at all.

Mr. RAY. Does not the gentleman remember that in the Fifty-third Congress we put that exemption into the bill upon his own suggestion and rather against the judgment of some of the other members of the committee?

Mr. BRODERICK. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. I do not think I was present when that was considered.

Mr. RAY. Let me say to the gentleman that that was put in the bill not in accordance with my judgment, but out of deference to a sentiment which prevailed among some members of the committee that legislation generally was tending too much to the benefit of the corporations, and that, as they were created by State laws, they ought to be held responsible under the State laws.

Mr. BRODERICK. The gentleman is mistaken about this provision being put into the bill at my suggestion. I was not a member of the subcommittee that considered the bill, and I am sure that that was in the bill when it was reported to the full committee.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman disclaims it, and possibly I may be mistaken; but I do say that that provision was put in the bill in deference to the sentiment of which I have spoken, and I do not think the committee to-day would vote to retain it except in deference to that sentiment. I know of no reason why corporations should not be permitted to take the benefit of the act or should not be put into bankruptcy involuntarily except this, that in most of the States the laws creating corporations provide stringent laws for winding them up and appropriating their property to the payment of their creditors, and it was thought by the committee that the State laws could better deal with them.

Mr. BRODERICK. However that may be, I do not care especially whether corporations are in or out, but they ought to be one thing or the other.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. If the gentleman will permit me, was not the exemption of corporations from the operation of the act based upon the idea that corporations being incorporeal bodies, existing only in contemplation of law, it would be illogical to permit them to destroy themselves?

Mr. BRODERICK. That may have been one reason, and then there is the further reason that most of the States have satisfactory provisions for closing up the affairs of corporations.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Does my colleague understand that we can not put a corporation into involuntary bankruptcy?

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes; they can be forced in, but can not be discharged.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. The law prohibits a corporation from voluntarily becoming a bankrupt upon the theory that the total liability of a corporation is its capital stock subscribed and paid in; but a corporation may be put into bankruptcy by its creditors.

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes; and then it never gets out.

Mr. NOONAN. I should like to know whether the law in regard to receivers is not adequate to protect the creditors of a corporation, and to protect the company itself, without providing for either the voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy of a corporation?

Mr. BRODERICK. I believe most of the States have adequate provisions on this subject.

Mr. NORTHWAY. As the gentleman is a member of the committee that reported this bill, I will ask him whether the committee intended that the individuals composing a corporation might not file a petition in bankruptcy, and be discharged from their debts.

Mr. BRODERICK. I do not remember any discussion of that question.

Mr. NORTHWAY. They can be, I presume.

Mr. BRODERICK. I judge so. Mr. Chairman, there are two sides to this corporation question, and I have called attention to it, so that members of the House may examine and think upon it. I would like in some way to check this tendency toward doing all things through corporations, if there is any practical way of doing it.

Now, I have briefly stated my objections to the second section and to the sixty-seventh section of this bill. If these provisions are amended and improved I expect to vote for the bill, but I am unwilling to vote for a bill which declares so many acts not criminal within themselves grounds for forcing men into bankruptcy and wrecking their business. I am willing that there should be involuntary provisions to reach cases of actual fraud against creditors, but am not persuaded to go further.

I am convinced that the necessity for the proposed legislation is very much overestimated. State insolvency acts may be imperfect, but in my judgment there is less embarrassment and less litigation for business people under these State enactments than there would be under this bankruptcy bill should it become law, unless it should be materially amended. The old arguments against the law would be renewed, and in a short time there would be a universal demand for its repeal. It would relieve a few individuals; it would distress many. Unless the bill is amended, at the close of the debate I shall offer a substitute containing more moderate provisions, and if this substitute should be defeated I will vote against the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] is absent, momentarily, from the Hall. If it agrees with his arrangements, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. The chairman of the committee, General HENDERSON, stated that he was going to withdraw, and he asked me to watch the proceedings on behalf of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I shall be glad if the gentleman will move that the committee rise.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Very well; I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bankruptcy bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PENSIONS.

Mr. POOLE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8494) to amend section 3 of the act approved June 27, 1890, entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents"; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

REPRINTING OF REPORTS, ETC.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the House document embracing the report of the board appointed by the President to report upon the Nicaragua Canal. The previous edition is exhausted.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I ask the present consideration of a resolution for reprinting Senate Executive Document No. 51, first session Fiftieth Congress. This document is the report of the Pacific Railway Commission. The Committee on the Pacific Railroads and the Committee on Printing agree that the document should be reprinted, as the previous edition is exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be reprinted the usual number of Senate Executive Document No. 51 of first session of Fiftieth Congress.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and adopted.

On motion of Mr. MILLER of Kansas, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That House bill No. 4176 be reprinted as amended, the previous print having been exhausted.

RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows: Concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the thanks of Congress be given to the people of Wisconsin for the statue of James Marquette, the renowned missionary, explorer, and discoverer of the Mississippi River.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted to remain in the National Statuary Hall, and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, be forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Wisconsin—

To the Committee on the Library.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 67) for the relief of E. R. Shipley;

A bill (S. 1176) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Oregon and Washington Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington, and to establish it as a post road";

A bill (H. R. 7905) to establish and provide for the government of Greer County, Okla., and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 4781) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River," approved February 18, 1893; and

A bill (H. R. 3112) granting a pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. MILES, for two days, on account of important business. To Mr. WASHINGTON, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. BROSIUS, for four days, on account of sickness.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. PICKLER. Pending that, I should like to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. A resolution can not be offered pending a motion to adjourn.

The motion of Mr. HENDERSON was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8413) to confirm certain cash entries of public lands, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1526); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 30, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a letter in the form of a memorial from the National Academy of Sciences in opposition to the enactment of legislation on the subject of vivisection.

I also present a memorial of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia in opposition to legislation on the same subject.

I present also a petition signed by several hundred citizens of the District of Columbia, at the head of which is the name of Rev. Randolph H. McKim, on the same subject, the petitioners favoring legislation that will restrict and regulate vivisection in the District of Columbia. The petitioners say, first, that animals used for painful scientific experiments should be rendered insensible by the use of anesthetics; second, that such experiments should be performed only by licensed persons at registered places and subject to official inspection; and third, that no such experiments should be allowed before classes of children in the public schools.

I desire to call attention to the names on this petition, which is one of the most remarkable in point of influence and strength ever presented to the Congress of the United States:

Justices John M. Harlan, H. B. Brown, David J. Brewer, E. D. White, R. W. Peckham, and George Shiras, jr., of the Supreme Court of the United States; Justices Walter S. Cox, A. B. Hagner, and C. C. Cole, of the supreme court of the District of Columbia; Chief Justice W. A. Richardson and Justices C. C. Nott and Lawrence Weldon, of the United States Court of Claims; Bishop John J. Keane, rector of the Catholic University of America; Bishop Henry Y. Satterlee, Bishop John F. Hurst, Archdeacon Thomas S. Childs, Rev. Dr. Alexander Mackay-Smith, rector of St. Johns; Rev. Dr. Randolph H. McKim, rector of Epiphany; Rev. Dr. John H. Elliott, rector Church of the Ascension; Rev. Dr. J. A. Aspinwall, rector of St. Thomas Church; Rev. Dr. Tenuis S. Hamlin, pastor Church of the Covenant; Rev. Byron Sunderland, pastor First Presbyterian Church; Rev. Thomas C. Easton, pastor Eastern Presbyterian Church; Rev. Dr. Frederick D. Power, pastor Vermont Avenue Christian Church; Rev. Dr. Oliver A. Brown, pastor Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church; Rev. Dr. Frank Sewall, pastor New Church; Rev. Dr. J. G. Butler, pastor Lutheran Memorial Church; Rev. Dr. Alexander Kent, pastor People's Church; Gen. and Mrs. Nelson A. Miles, Mrs. U. S. Grant, Mrs. George Hearst, Mrs. John Davis, Mrs. A. W. Greely, Mrs. L. Z. Leiter, Mrs. Madeleine Vinton Dahlgren, Mrs. W. M. Stewart, Mrs. S. Powhatan Carter, Mrs. Florence Murray, Mrs. Robert Anderson, Mrs. George Shiras, jr., Mrs. H. B. Brown, Mrs. Emma Morton, Mrs. Henry M. Teller, Miss Olive Risley Seward, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Barber, Mr. and Mrs. Henry F. Blount, Mrs. Benaiah J. Whitman, Gen. and Mrs. Rufus Saxton, Gen. John G. Parke, Gen. D. S. Stanley, Gen. J. S. Fullerton, Gen. H. V. Boynton, Gen. James H. Wadsworth, ex-Senator Charles F. Manderson, ex-Senator John B. Henderson, Representative CHARLES L. HENRY, ex-Commissioner John W. Douglass, Mr. Crosby S. Noyes, Mr. Theodore W. Noyes, Mr. S. H. Kauffmann, Mr. John R. McLean, Mr. John Joy Edson, Mr. B. H. Warner, Mr. Charles J. Bell, Mr. Samuel M. Bryan, Mr. James E. Fitch, Mr. John B. Wight, Comptroller James H. Eckels, Mr. R. Ross Perry, Mr. Enoch Totten, Mr. W. D. Davidge, Mr. Jere M. Wilson, Mr. Mahlon Ashford, Mr. J. Hubley Ashton, Mr. Nathaniel Wilson, Mr. Anthony Pollok, Mr. Calderon Carlisle, Mr. Halbert E. Paine, Mr. Reginald Fendall, Mr. Benjamin Butterworth, Mr. Samuel Maddox, Mr. J. J. Darlington, Mr. A. G. Riddle, Mr. Henry E. Davis, Mr. Chapin Brown, Mr. H. Randall Webb, Mr. John Sidney Webb, Mr. William A. Gordon, Mr. J. Holdsworth Gordon, Mr. William Henry Dennis, Mr. Leigh Robinson, Mr. R. E. Lee, jr., Mr. Montgomery Blair, Mr. Frank T. Browning, Mr. William Stone Abert, Mr. William Redin Woodward, Mr. Story B. Ladd, Judge Thomas F. Miller, Mr. Crammond Kennedy, Mr. John Cassels, Mr. and Mrs. Charles M. Ffoulke, Mr. and Mrs. Horace S. Cummings, Mr. W. M. Poindexter, Mr. Maxwell Woodhull, Mr. and Mrs. Horace S. Cummings, Elliott Coues, A. M., M. D., etc., late professor of anatomy National Medical College; Dr. F. A. Gardner, Dr. S. S. Stearns, Dr. James A. Freer, Dr. Reginald Munson, Dr. L. E. Rauterberg, Dr. S. I. Groot, Dr. Leigh Yerkes Baker, Dr. Waterman F. Corey, Dr. Charles B. Gilbert, Mr. A. S. Pratt, Mr. William B. Cabell, Maj. R. H. Montgomery, U. S. A.; Maj. Robert Craig, U. S. A.; James A. Bates, U. S. A.; David A. Irwin, U. S. A.; Theodore Mosher, U. S. A., and Frank G. Smith, U. S. A.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask my colleague whether the Committee on the District of Columbia has reported or intends to report a bill prohibiting vivisection in the District of Columbia?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Committee on the District of Columbia, I will say to my colleague, will probably not report a bill absolutely prohibiting vivisection in the District of Columbia; and while I can not speak for the committee as to their action on this very important subject, I will venture to say that the committee have had under consideration a bill which proposes to limit and control vivisection in this District, which I think is being very favorably considered. In due time the committee will undoubtedly make a report, which I trust will be made before the present session of Congress expires.

I move that the memorials and the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS presented a petition of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Sturgis, Mich., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by Union Lodge, No. 7, American Association of Iron and Steel Workers, of Cleveland, Ohio, praying for the Government ownership and control of telegraph lines; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 2410, providing for the encouragement of American shipping in the foreign trade; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 2447, establishing a department of commerce and manufactures, and remonstrating against the provision in the bill which provides for the partial transfer of the United States consular service to this department; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRITCHARD presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Raleigh, N. C., praying that an increased appropriation be made for gauging the streams and determining the water supply of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. QUAY presented memorials of 35 citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., of 43 citizens of Pennsylvania, and of 63 citizens of Allegheny County, Pa., remonstrating against placing the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of the so-called Loud bill, relating to postage on second-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of Philadelphia Union, No. 8, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present a petition of the board of directors of the Merchants' Association of Boston, Mass., praying for the passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill. I move that the petition lie on the table, the bankruptcy bill having already been reported, and that it be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH presented a resolution of the general assembly of Rhode Island, favoring an increase of compensation to letter carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[State of Rhode Island, etc., in General Assembly, January session, A. D. 1896.]

Resolution recommending to Congress the passage of the bill now pending in the National House of Representatives to increase the pay of letter carriers.

Whereas there is now pending in Congress a bill H. R. 200, which has been favorably reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives, entitled "A bill to increase the pay of letter carriers," by the provisions of which the compensation would range from $600 for the first year of regular service, with $200 annually added, to a maximum of $1,000 a year in cities of a population of less than 75,000 and a maximum of $1,200 in larger cities; and

Whereas granting the proposed increase the free-delivery service of the Post-Office Department would still be not only self-supporting, but the source of a large revenue to the Government; and

Whereas the duties of a letter carrier are of an arduous, responsible character, requiring for their best discharge the services of faithful and capable men, permanently employed: Now, therefore, it is

Resolved, That in the judgment of the general assembly of the State of Rhode Island the bill aforesaid, to increase the pay of letter carriers, should be promptly passed by Congress; that the Senators and Representatives of this State at Washington be, and they are hereby, requested to urge the passage of said bill at the present session of Congress, and that the secretary of state of Rhode Island be, and he hereby is, instructed to send a copy of this resolution to each of our said Senators and Representatives in Congress, as well as to the Hon. THOMAS B. REED, Speaker of the National House of Representatives.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Providence, April 27, 1896.

I certify the foregoing to be a true copy of a resolution passed by the general assembly of said State on the 24th day of April, A. D. 1896.
In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State aforesaid the date and year first above written.

CHARLES P. BENNETT,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BRICE presented a petition of the Trades and Labor Assembly of Massillon, Ohio, praying for the appointment of a non-partisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the ex-Prisoners of War Association of Hamilton County, Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 306, granting pensions to soldiers and sailors confined in so-called Confederate prisons; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Charles O. Heggem, superintendent of Russell & Co., manufacturers, of Massillon, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation reorganizing and increasing the Engineer Corps of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Cheney Medicine Company, of Toledo, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation taking the jurisdiction of the courts away from alcohol claimants; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of John D. Park & Sons Company, chemists, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and a memorial of Schaber, Reinthal & Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation tending to repudiate claims for a rebate on alcohol; which were ordered to lie on the table.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of all amounts allowed in the name of the Southern Pacific Company, its branches and leased lines, on account of nonbond-aided services, and which remain unpaid, amounting to $1,542,979.44. I move that the letter and accompanying statement be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment providing for the payment of expenses incurred under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed at Washington, February 8, 1896, and for the procurement and enforcement of testimony under Article III of that treaty, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2396) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Niagara River, in the town of Lewiston, in the county of Niagara, State of New York, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (H. R. 7140) granting to A. L. Robeson Post, No. 42, Grand Army of the Republic, of Bridgeton, N. J., 4 condemned cannon and 20 cannon balls;

A bill (H. R. 8013) donating one condemned cannon and cannon balls to Grand Army of the Republic, L. W. Cooper Post, Department of Missouri, No. 81, of Lathrop, Mo.;

A bill (H. R. 7671) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate one condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls to U. S. Grant Post, No. 72, Grand Army of the Republic, of Washington, Ind., Department of Indiana;

A bill (H. R. 8077) granting to Budlong Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Westerly, R. I., two condemned mounted brass cannon;

A bill (H. R. 7100) to donate 8 condemned cannon and 100 cannon shot to the Grand Army of the Republic Cemetery Association of Colorado; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 122) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to deliver condemned cannon to Chamberlain Post, Grand Army of the Republic, to be posted by the soldiers' monument at St. Johnsbury, Vt.

Mr. ELKINS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3046) for the relief of Frederick Van Guilder, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1743) for the relief of the widow of Thomas L. Young, reported it without amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2906) for the establishment of a light-house at the pitch of Cape Fear River, near Wilmington, N. C., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McBRIDE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2628) to amend the act approved February 9, 1881, to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through certain lands of the United States in Richmond County, N. Y., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2058) to execute the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of William B. Isaacs & Co., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CHILTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2488) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Denison and Northern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment.

Mr. BATE. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the bill (S. 1950) for the relief of Enoch Davis, and the bill (S. 1986) for the relief of Enoch Davis, the former introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the latter introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], neither of them knowing, I suppose, that the other had introduced such a bill, to report them adversely, and to substitute therefor a similar House bill, which I shall report favorably. I move that the two Senate bills be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2735) for the relief of Enoch Davis, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. PERKINS on the 23d instant, providing for the payment of certain claims reported favorably by the Court of Claims and reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress in House Executive Document No. 151, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, page 27, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, reported it favorably, with an amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2984) in relation to contempt of court; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. QUAY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1827) to increase and limit the appropriation for a public building at Portland, Oreg., and to designate its uses, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1785) for the correction of muster of Adolph von Haake, late major Sixty-eighth Regiment Veteran Volunteer Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

JOHN FOX.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 506) to correct the military record of John Fox, of Albany, Oreg., to report it favorably, without amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I hope to have the consent of the Senate to place the bill on its passage. It is a private bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to remove the charge of desertion now standing on the records of the War Department against John Fox, who was enrolled December 20, 1861, and mustered into the service March 5, 1862, as a private in Company G, Twenty-sixth Kentucky Infantry, to serve for three years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2985) to incorporate the Anti-Saloon League of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2986) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to accept the bequest of the late Peter Von Essen for the use of the public white schools of that portion of said District formerly known as Georgetown; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2987) to establish certain harbor regulations for the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 2988) for the relief of W. J. Tapp & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 2989) to increase the pension of Caroline S. Baker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLANCHARD introduced a bill (S. 2990) for the relief of Charles M. Wells; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BRICE introduced a bill (S. 2991) granting a pension to George G. Eakins; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2992) granting a pension to Ellen O'Hara; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2993) granting a pension to Rebecca Gilbert; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2994) granting a pension to William G. Alspach; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2995) granting a pension to James M. Dennison; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 2996) granting a pension to Laura Moore, the widow of a soldier of the Florida Seminole Indian war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CARTER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLANCHARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALDRICH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BATE submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN MELLIFONT AND ELLEN RIORDON.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1336) for the relief of John Mellifont and Ellen Riordon.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Texas will let me get up the appropriation bill first.

Mr. MILLS. Very well.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. The Senator from Maine yields to me to call up the bill which I have indicated.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill indicated by the Senator from Texas will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 4 to strike out "determine" and insert "find the law and facts respecting," and at the end of the bill to add "and that the testimony and evidence now on file in the Senate may be used in said cause in the Court of Claims: Provided, That the bar of the statute of limitation is hereby removed"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc. That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and find the law and facts respecting the claims of John Mellifont and Ellen Riordon for damages sustained by them in consequence of the illegal acts of the officers and soldiers of the United States in taking and killing and ordering off the stock of the above-named parties, destroying their fences and buildings, and for other injuries committed by the said officers and soldiers on the farm of the above-named parties near Fort Clark, in the county of Kinney and State of Texas, between the years 1866 and 1870, both inclusive, and that the testimony and evidence now on file in the Senate may be used in said cause in the Court of Claims: Provided, That the bar of the statute of limitation is hereby removed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the following bills, having been presented to the President on the 15th instant, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, have become laws without his approval:

An act (S. 100) for the relief of the estate of John R. Bigelow; and

An act (S. 1203) granting an increase of pension to Mary Doubleday, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Abner Doubleday.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. QUAY to the amendment of Mr. GORMAN.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the pending question be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 19, page 50, after the word "contract," Mr. GORMAN proposes to amend the bill by striking out the word "four" and inserting "two"; so as to read:

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract two seagoing coast-line battle ships designed to carry the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance upon a displacement of about 11,000 tons, to have the highest practicable speed for vessels of their class, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $3,750,000 each.

Mr. QUAY moves to amend the amendment by striking out "two" and inserting "six"; so as to read:

Six seagoing coast-line battle ships.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. HALE. I do not desire at present to submit any remarks upon the pending amendment. The Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] has indicated a disposition to submit some remarks on the bill, and I yield to him.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to make a few suggestions in reference to the further construction of a Navy and as to the desirability of coast defenses.

I concede the necessity for an adequate Navy ample to protect us in case of exigency, but when we are considering the question of appropriating money for naval purposes we ought not to forget the situation of the country with regard to the matter of coast defenses.

OUR DEFENSELESS CONDITION.

While it is universally admitted that the United States is not in a position for successful defense against any leading nation, I do not believe that the public appreciate the utter ineffectiveness of the means heretofore taken to guard our coasts and property. The situation can hardly be exaggerated. In the event of armed contest with such powers as England or France we could not make even a respectable showing. General Miles, in a statement given by him before the Committee on Coast Defenses during the present Congress, sums up the situation thus:

In my judgment, legislation is required to put the principal ports of the country in a proper condition of safety and in order to give them suitable protection.

Senator SQUIRE. Have you examined the condition of the fortifications that have been erected at any of the seaports?

General MILES. Yes, sir; I have made it a question of study for many years. My attention was first called to it when in command of the Department of the Columbia in the Northwest some fifteen years ago, and later when in command of the Division of the Pacific. In my reports eleven and six years ago I called attention to the subject and urged the importance of protecting the principal harbors of the Pacific coast, especially at the entrance of Puget Sound, thereby protecting Port Townsend, Seattle, Tacoma, Olympia, and other important places on Puget Sound; also the defense of the Columbia River, giving protection to Astoria and Portland, Oreg., and the entrance to the harbor at San Francisco and that of San Diego, Cal.

Senator SQUIRE. Would the guns now at these places be of any use; are they serviceable?

General MILES. While there are guns mounted at Fort Canby, at the mouth of the Columbia, and in the harbor of San Francisco, they are mostly obsolete guns mounted on old and rotten carriages, and as far as the guns are concerned I believe that they could not be sold for enough to pay the purchaser for taking them down and using them for old iron.

General Craighill, Chief of Engineers, in his statement to be found on page 1 of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Coast Defenses, said:

I assume that nobody doubts the need of coast defenses. Our coasts are utterly unprotected and should be put in proper condition as soon as possible, and what we need now is money.

No one denies that New York, Boston, Philadelphia, San Francisco, and all our seacoast cities will, in the event of war, be destroyed unless some provision is made for their protection. Recently work has been done at San Francisco and at New York, but the defenses even of those places are yet inadequate. Admiral Walker, who takes a very broad view of the situation and does not consider that the Navy alone can do the work, made the following statement concerning the defense of San Francisco:

It is a very difficult place to fortify properly, because of its wide, easy entrance, deep water, and strong currents—

And continuing—

Very many places on our eastern shore where our channels are shoal are easy of defense. They could be defended. It is impracticable to fortify any but the most important places on our coasts, but we do not want an enemy to come and keep out of range of the defenses of Boston, New York, etc., and ravage all the coast, as they could do if we did not have a Navy to protect it.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] thereupon interrogated Admiral Walker as follows:

The British do not neglect their defenses, do they?

Admiral WALKER. No, sir.

Senator HAWLEY. How about their fortifications here on this continent?

Admiral WALKER. They hold Halifax, Esquimaux, and Bermuda as bases for operations against the United States; in the West Indies, Santa Lucia and Jamaica.

Senator HAWLEY. In Kingston there is a fortification of some importance, is there not?

Admiral WALKER. Yes, sir.

The committee took testimony with reference to the various means of defense now available. I quote from Admiral Walker:

Senator PROCTOR. Do you consider that on the whole the plan outlined in the report of the Endicott Board—you are somewhat familiar with it—is a good plan for the defense of our coasts?

Admiral WALKER. Yes; I consider it so.

Senator PROCTOR. The board was composed of very able men, who made a thorough study of the subject?

Senator SQUIRE. And two members of the Endicott Board were officers of the Navy?

Admiral WALKER. Yes. I have thought, however, for some years that the engineers of the Army gave too much importance to their mortars. I believe in direct-fire guns.

Senator PROCTOR. How much fire from a direct-fire gun could a vessel stand?

Admiral WALKER. A modern battle ship would stand a good many shots at a reasonable range, but would of course be injured to a greater or less extent.

Thereupon the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] inquired:

Would not a few torpedoes either cripple a ship or destroy her if placed at the entrance of the harbor?

Admiral WALKER. Ships would not attempt to come in without first destroying the torpedoes.

Senator SQUIRE. We want you to give us some idea of the importance of the land defenses, and the proper relation of the Navy to the land defenses.

Admiral WALKER. I think there is some confusion of terms with our people. What we want are harbor defenses. You can not protect the whole coast by fortifications, but you can fortify the cities and important strategic points, and they should be firmly held by means of fortifications, torpedo boats, mines, and battle ships. We ought to hold these points firmly, but it would not be important to fortify minor points. The important points should be held for many reasons. For instance, the capture of New York would cause enormous loss from a financial and moral point of view. Again, from a naval officer's point of view, our cities are necessary as points to which our ships, if injured or defeated in action can withdraw under cover of the fortifications, and dock, repair, and receive supplies and coal. They must serve as bases for naval operations.

The admiral thereupon continued, showing that while with ample protection and strong fortification and abundance of direct-fire guns it will be impossible for a hostile fleet to enter our harbors, nevertheless unless much more generous provision is made than is now contemplated by Congress it is unreasonable to claim that our country is even tolerably protected.

I will again cite Admiral Walker:

Admiral WALKER. The plan of the English is to keep their navy equal (in strength) to that of any other two nations.

Senator PROCTOR. What would be our fate if they sent their whole naval force against us?

Admiral WALKER. If they were at this time to send over such a naval force as they could spare from Europe they would have their own way upon our coast.

Senator HAWLEY. They could take Portland and Boston in twenty-four hours.

Admiral WALKER. Yes, sir; there is nothing that could stop them for any great length of time.

Senator GORDON. How many guns have they for the protection of New York?

Admiral WALKER. We now have at Sandy Hook, in position, 2 guns and 16 mortars.

Senator GORDON. Under the conditions existing now, what would be the effect if the English navy should engage ours?

Admiral WALKER. They would probably capture or destroy our whole Navy.

Senator PROCTOR. Would there not be some chance if we made a proper defense at Sandy Hook to successfully defend New York?

Admiral WALKER. By putting all our vessels behind Sandy Hook we could make them something of a fight for that place, but nothing would prevent them from raiding the whole coast.

Lieut. James A. Frye, of Massachusetts, treats this subject in a most interesting manner. He says:

It safely may be assumed that a large portion of our people would be found to hold the same sanguine views of the outcome of a foreign war. Further than that, newspapers and individuals are not lacking that brand as traitorous any words of warning, from whomsoever they may come, or with however much of earnestness they may be uttered. Yet if the simple, stern setting forth of unpalatable facts is to be considered a mark of disloyalty the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the officers of both regular establishments, and the thinking men in civil life must come in together for censure from their country. "It is embarrassing for a military officer to acknowledge this condition of affairs and to record these facts," said the general who now commands our Army, after calling attention to our defenseless coast. Yet he would do less than his duty to his country did he not endeavor to bring the truth before the Government, in order that it should be fully apprised of the true condition of affairs.

The Secretary of War sums up the situation thus:

If future appropriations for the manufacture of guns, mortars, and carriages be no larger than the average authorized for the purpose since 1888, it will require twenty-two years more to supply the armament for the eighteen important ports for which complete projects are approved. If the appropriations for the engineer work are to continue at the rate of the annual appropriations since 1890, it will require seventy years to complete the emplacements and platforms for the ports referred to. * * * It rests with Congress to determine by its appropriations the period which shall elapse before our coasts shall be put in a satisfactory condition of defense. The amount required for the eighteen ports is about $82,000,000, and the entire work can be completed within ten years. The rate of progress will be slower in proportion as appropriations are kept below the amount which can be advantageously expended.

Mr. President, the sum and substance of the situation in this regard is as follows: If we continue to make appropriations as we have done for the purpose of fortifying our harbors, it will take seventy years to complete the scheme outlined by the Endicott Board, and since modified by the officers in charge. Manifestly, therefore, no appropriations whatever should be made or adequate appropriations should be made. It is absolute waste of money to enter upon a work which can not be utilized until the expiration of seventy years. But what will be thought of our coast defenses when completed seventy years hence? The improvements which the future has in store can not be foretold. Obviously a plan for fortifications, or, indeed, for anything else, which can not be realized for generations should not be countenanced by intelligent men.

Fortification work is not only in an unfinished state, but it has, as General Craighill says, barely been entered upon. We have but few guns of modern type. I have heard it remarked that the smoothbores now owned by the Government may be of avail. Admiral Walker tells us (Hearings, page 158) that these might be used as auxiliaries for the defense of small harbors. General Miles, however, states that in his opinion they are entirely useless, and might be sold for old iron.

The information furnished by General Flagler is interesting. The following is an extract from his examination before the Committee on Coast Defenses, page 31:

The change in our guns, carriages, projectiles, and powder within the last twenty-five years has been as wide and as great as that which took place from Napoleon's wars, or from 1815, to the period I mentioned, twenty-four or twenty-five years ago.

Senator SQUIRE. Up to 1870.

General FLAGLER. Consequently the whole coast defense which we have considered so far includes nothing that was found in our coast defense twenty-five years ago. It is all entirely new; and it must be new to be of any use against the modern armored vessels or for any modern ordnance, everything being entirely new.

The same statement holds good, and in some respects the changes are even more radical, in our field and siege material. All of the field and siege guns, ammunition, and material are entirely new. The Ordnance Department has been closely occupied on perfecting this material for many years. We had no money for manufactures and could accomplish little in the way of manufactures up to about six years ago; but investigations and experiments have been in progress for many years, and I feel authorized to state that our siege and field material at the present time is as good as or better than that of any other nation in the world.

All I wish to say, then, is that these field and siege guns and all material that goes with them are new, and we could not in any war against a foreign nation use any one of the guns or any of the material that was used during our civil war that is now on hand. New guns and new material must be provided throughout.

We have but a limited number of these guns with carriages and ammunition for them on hand. In any emergency this field and siege material would probably be as important and might be much more important than the sea-coast defense, or might form a part of it.

Therefore, in reply to your request as to what appropriations, in addition to the estimates now before Congress, should be made for the next fiscal year, I feel it my duty, and it is very important, that there should be added to the estimates I "have given to you another estimate for this field and siege artillery."

If trouble comes it will be impossible to make even fair defensive preparations. The enemy will have everything his own way. We are prone to be overconfident. Many of our people think that they can prepare for war within a few months. That such ignorance should prevail to any extent is remarkable. Nevertheless we must treat facts as we find them. The 12-inch gun is our main reliance as far as fortifications are concerned. We have no 16-inch guns, and there is some controversy as to their effectiveness.

General Flagler says (Hearings, page 28) we have a contract with the Bethlehem Company for guns under which they are delivered slowly. We can procure in addition to that number no guns which the Department is willing to put into fortifications except those we manufacture at the gun factory. You will see, then, that the gun manufactory measures the rate at which we can go on with coast defenses.

General Flagler made the following statement with reference to the length of time necessarily consumed in making a 12-inch gun, and his opinion is, of course, most valuable:

What length of time—

He was asked—

would be consumed in making one of the large guns, such as there are in the harbor at San Francisco, if you had everything just as you want it?

I will state that the gun named is a 12-inch gun.

General FLAGLER. After the date of the contract we would not have the forgings in less than eight months. We could then finish the gun in about six months.

Senator WHITE. It would take a little over a year to complete the gun?

General FLAGLER. Yes; it would be about that length of time from the date of the appropriation before the gun would be completed. For an 8-inch gun it would take about seven months and for a 10-inch gun about ten months.

The statement made by General Craighill, and also contained in the report of the Committee on Coast Defenses, with reference to the difficulty of rapid work and the impossibility of immediate accomplishment, is alike instructive and interesting.

General Flagler insists with much force that we should not be without some 16-inch guns. In that respect, as I have before remarked, there has been some controversy among our military men, but he declares that he is willing to assert that we can manufacture a successful 16-inch gun. He argues that there is necessity for such a weapon, because a 12-inch gun would not necessarily be certainly effective when brought to bear upon one of the largest vessels that might be sent against us, but that one shot well directed from a 16-inch gun will put any vessel in the world out of action; and he tells us that it would take about three years to make the first or type 16-inch gun. I quote from his report as Chief of Ordnance:

The Board on Fortifications or Other Defenses of 1886, appointed under the act of Congress of March 3, 1885, adopted forty-four 16-inch guns as a part of our coast defenses, and designated the harbors for the defense of which these guns were to be used. For carrying out the provisions of this report this Department has several times submitted to Congress an estimate for funds for the construction of a type 16-inch gun, but the necessary appropriation therefor has not yet been made. It is believed that this failure of Congress to make the necessary appropriation is partly due to opinions expressed by persons who are opposed to the adoption and use of the 16-inch gun, and who profess to believe that the 12-inch gun has sufficient power for our needs. I do not know what arguments have been used to enforce this opinion, and can not, therefore, combat such arguments. The refusal of the necessary appropriation does not, however, relieve this Department from responsibility in the matter, and I deem it a plain duty to submit here some of the more important reasons for urging immediate preparation for producing guns of this caliber.

The question of the comparative advantage of guns of the largest or of a smaller caliber for the coast defense has sometimes been confused with the same question applied to naval guns, and the opinion formed against them for naval use has been, without sufficient thought, improperly extended to coast-defense use. The cases are so totally different that arguments applicable to the one case are not applicable to the other. The Navy is limited by the weight which can be conveniently carried or economically provided for, by the length which is admissible, by convenient provision for handling and protecting, and by provision which can be conveniently or economically made for strains due to recoil. Our coast defenses are not so limited in regard to any of these provisions. The naval gun is on a movable support, and can be placed in such proximity to the enemy for fighting purposes as the caliber of the gun and the circumstances of the case demand and will give the best results. The army gun is on a fixed platform, and must fight the enemy at such long ranges as the latter may select within the limits of water that will float his vessel. Many foreign governments carry the large caliber guns on their vessels, and could sometimes select positions and long ranges at which their large guns would be effective but at which our smaller guns would not be sufficiently effective.

The Army will, therefore, sometimes require the power of the larger gun, while there is not such necessity therefor for the Navy. The objections to the gun which are important to the Navy do not exist or are comparatively unimportant in its use by the Army.

The principal foreign powers have guns of 16-inch or larger caliber in their coast defenses, navies, or in both. The fact that they have them in their defenses shows their opinion on this subject. The fact that they have them in their navies shows that it is important that we be prepared to compete with their fire for the reason stated above.

This Department has never had any doubt of the necessity for the 16-inch gun, nor of the wisdom of its adoption by the Board on Fortifications or Other Defenses in 1886. Since the date of the report of that Board the history of Gun vs. Armor has steadily shown an increased necessity for a gun of as high power as that of the 16-inch caliber. Granting what was perhaps true nine years ago, that the 12-inch gun could, under favorable circumstances—that is, at close range and with the vessel's side normal to the trajectory—penetrate any armor then in existence, or under less favorable circumstances and at longer ranges, destroy any vessel by continued hammering; later experience shows that this is not the case with modern armor now. Moreover, the enemy will not place his vessel exactly in the position desired, as we place a plate for experimental firing, and the problem in most cases is to destroy a vessel which is doing its best to run past our batteries. Only a small number of shots can be fired from any one gun at a passing vessel, and to accomplish the required amount of hammering a great many 12-inch guns would be required. Not more than one moderately fair hit would be required from the proposed 16-inch gun to destroy or stop any vessel known at the present time. There are sites for our fortifications where one 16-inch gun should be the equivalent of a dozen 12-inch guns, and as the question reduces itself to one of dollars and cents, the 16-inch gun is the more economic gun for the work in hand.

Some of the latest experiments indicate that even with continued hammering with the 12-inch gun we can not expect to penetrate the best modern armor, and could not destroy or stop certain vessels, except by a rare and exceptionally lucky hit in some weak spot. The report of the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy for this year will show that in some late experiments at Indian Head it was utterly impossible to penetrate modern heavy armor with a 12-inch projectile, fired under the most favorable circumstances at a range of only 130 yards and with the plate held normal to the trajectory. In some cases a 13-inch projectile barely got through the plate under the same favorable circumstances. In some later experiments with a modern plate the 13-inch projectile passed through, while the 12-inch produced little effect.

This Department again submits in its estimates for this year an item for the manufacture of a type 16-inch gun. After an appropriation is made it will require about three years to procure the forgings (forgings of a magnitude not heretofore made), to finish and assemble the gun, and to subject it to the tests required by law for a gun of new type. No 16-inch guns can be adopted and manufactured for service until the preparation and test of this type gun is completed. This action does not commit the Government to the adoption and manufacture of 16-inch guns for the service at the expiration of the three years if they are not then wanted. It is deemed certain that they will not only be wanted, but that they will become an imperative necessity. It would be an act of plain wisdom and forethought to advance by three years our condition of preparation for producing the guns, if wanted, by commencing, as soon as possible the manufacture of the single type gun required for this purpose.

It is not easy to regard with patience the conduct of Congress in making appropriations so meager as those heretofore provided for coast defenses. No business man would pursue such a course, and no prudent nation can afford to rest under such a menace.

Admiral Walker thus speaks of the necessity of coast as well as naval defenses:

If an enemy comes on our coast and we think we are strong enough to engage him we fight. But great injuries and many accidents occur to ships in action even if successful, and we must have a place of retreat where we have supplies and dry docks, and they must be protected by fortifications. We could not protect all the ports with the Navy, because it is impracticable to have a fleet for each seaport, or of sufficient size to cover our enormous seacoast, but it would be equally impracticable to protect our coast and large seaports without the assistance of the Navy. * * * In the present condition of our fortifications and Navy I would spend, say, $80,000,000 on coast defenses and $40,000,000 on the Navy, but as the total amount to be expended for the two purposes is increased, the percentage which should go to building up the Navy would be relatively less. If I could have my way I would spend for increase of the Navy during the next five or six years, say, $80,000,000, and for fortifying our cities and harbors all that may be found necessary, working upon the general line of the report of the Endicott Board.

Although we are thus helpless, we discuss the propriety of engaging in wars with almost all nations. We have not perhaps been as bellicose within the past two or three weeks as we were some months ago, but still we have been and are seemingly ready and anxious to fight. But we have made absolutely no preparation; we are not making any preparation; we are not in a condition for aggressiveness, and yet we talk as though we are confident of glorious results when called on to meet the world. I fear that our pleasant anticipations are fanciful.

Mr. President, it is universally conceded that a gun well located upon the shore is of much more value than the same weapon upon shipboard. The reason for this is obvious. The expert gentlemen who testified before the committee differed somewhat in their estimates of this comparative efficiency. Some thought that a gun upon shore was worth three upon the ship; others said five. But the apparent discrepancy was perhaps explained by the suggestion that the conditions of sea and weather affect the steadiness of the vessel. However, it is evident that it is possible for us to guard the principal harbors and cities of the United States so that those points at least will be free from serious danger.

Lieutenant Frye makes a computation of the property which will be subject to destruction on the seacoast as matters are now situated. He says that there are 75 cities on navigable waters of the Atlantic coast. I will read the exact language used by him:

Tracing the broken coast line of the Atlantic, it will be found that 75 cities are situated on navigable waters, whose population reaches the aggregate of 6,640,532 and whose wealth may be estimated at $6,899,512,748. In the region of the Gulf lie 8 cities, with 354,182 of population and $367,995,008 in wealth. On the Pacific coast 11 cities show a population of 527,223, with a wealth of $547,784,697. Along the shores of the Great Lakes are scattered 37 cities, with a population of 2,525,898 and $2,624,408,022 in property. It should be stated that these figures, enormous and almost beyond the powers of comprehension as they are, yet fall short of the actual conditions of to-day, since the six years that have passed since the taking of the census have been years of expansion and not of contraction. This may be shown by a single illustration. The population and wealth of Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, New Orleans, San Francisco, Milwaukee, Detroit, Chicago, Cleveland, and Buffalo, as included in the above aggregates, were, respectively, 7,050,163 and $7,325,119,357. By the latest obtainable estimates (January 1, 1896) the same cities should be credited with an aggregate population of 8,400,000 and with an aggregate wealth of $10,369,452,574.

He then proceeds to show, and, indeed, we all know the fact without any argument, that these cities and this extensive population and vast wealth are all endangered by the policy which we have pursued and are pursuing.

But it is said, by some that the Navy affords adequate protection. Mr. President, if we construct a navy in accordance with the prevailing plan, it will be utterly impossible to meet any such exigency as will necessarily attend war. This very year Great Britain has appropriated sufficient money for the construction of war vessels superior in number and power to our entire Navy. Says the same authority from which I have already quoted, Mr. Frye:

The most elementary maxims warn us that if it be worth while to maintain a Navy at all we must also have a reserve supply of ordnance and ordnance stores, and certainly we need not call on military science to tell us that our reserve of naval vessels is of no value without guns. Congress should give careful attention to the ordnance requirements of vessels that are liable to be called into service as auxiliaries in time of war, in accordance with the acts of Congress approved March 3, 1891, and May 10, 1892, providing that steamers registered under the provisions of said acts can be used by the United States as transports and cruisers. To mention no others, the Paris and New York of the American Line are now receiving large sums of money annually on condition that they hold themselves in readiness to serve the Government whenever demanded. When they hauled down the English to hoist the American flag they were receiving pay from the British Government to hold themselves in readiness to serve that nation, and the English had guns and gun-mounts ready to be put upon them at a moment's notice. We now have been paying subsidies to these ships for months, and have not a gun to put upon them.

With a war upon us our naval authorities would indeed find the situation disagreeable. In order to avoid capture, in order to avoid our ships falling into the hands of the enemy—assuming our contention to be with one of the great powers—we would find it policy to beach our Navy. We possess no protected port to which they could resort. Flight would be impossible. We have no properly defended coaling stations. As already shown, it is admitted by those who are more partial perhaps to the Navy than to the coast-defense idea that in the event of a war with Great Britain our Navy would necessarily be utterly destroyed, whereas if our great ports—New York, Philadelphia, Boston, etc.—were properly fortified it would be possible to afford protection. No one denies, none of the officers who are connected with the Navy disputes that there is grave necessity for immediate and thorough work in the direction of fortifications.

Admiral Walker's statements are clear and to the point:

If an enemy comes on our coast and we think we are strong enough to engage him we would fight, but great injuries and many accidents occur to ships in action, even if successful, and we must have a place to repair where we have supplies and dry docks, and they must be protected by fortifications. We could not protect all ports with the Navy, because it is impracticable to have a fleet for each seaport or of sufficient size to cover our enormous seacoast; but it would be equally impracticable to protect our coast and large seaports without the assistance of the Navy.

This testimony of Admiral Walker is exceedingly interesting as showing, first, the weakness of our Navy, and, secondly, the comparative inefficiency of our so-called commerce destroyers. These vessels are not as swift as the Cunarders, White Star, and other liners. The latter can be armed with 5 and 6 inch rapid-fire guns and would then be altogether more useful as commerce destroyers than our cruisers. The cruisers can not engage a battle ship or a fort, and can not catch the more rapid liners of the enemy, and are, therefore, of less value than is commonly supposed.

To put ourselves in a position to defend our seacoasts without fortifications we must expend two or three hundred millions of dollars.

In other words, it is his testimony that if we are to have a navy adequate to obviate coast defenses we must invest that enormous sum.

We have manufactured some fine guns and carriages and have partially fortified New York and San Francisco.

Congress is to blame. Our officers having the matter in charge have done everything that skill and patriotism could accomplish.

It is said by competent authority that the utmost emphasis of experience teaches that ports properly defended by powerful batteries, reinforced by suitable auxiliaries in the form of submarine mines, torpedo boats, etc., can not be successfully attacked by even the most formidable fleet. With this view all authorities, military and naval, are in thorough accord.

We have, I might say, indisputable proof that in case of a war with England, circumstance as we are, it would be necessary for us, as I have before remarked, to destroy our own vessels.

I fully recognize the necessity of a strong navy. Fortifications are only of value for defense. It is necessary to have a navy, not only to guard unfortified points but likewise to enable us to attack our opponents. But it is clear that we ought not to proceed one step further without providing for coast defense. We might spend ten or twelve million dollars more on our Navy and yet we will be devoid of protection.

Lieutenant Frye, in the April number of The Bostonian, gives the following significant appropriations from 1889 to 1896; in other words, to date:

Pensions.....	$1,003,421,486
Navy.....	196,721,568
Army.....	192,990,960
Rivers and harbors.....	118,214,777
Fortifications*.....	22,489,225
Miscellaneous.....	759,371,134

I quote from Wilson on ironclads in action:

Artillery has progressed so much that cannon can be mounted on land which can pierce armor thicker than any ship can hope to carry. Considerations of weight and displacement limit the protection which can be given to the ship, while they have no such determining influence on the fort. The ironclad's armor and ordnance are limited; the fort's unlimited. How can the two fight on an equal footing? There are these further considerations, too, to be taken into account. The guns must be crowded into a limited space on board ship, where several may be silenced by a single lucky shot. In the fort a wide space can intervene between weapons, and if properly mounted each gun must be actually struck before it can be put out of action. Then, too, the fort's fire can be directed upon the ship's water line; hits here will be every whit as efficacious as upon her battery, and she can be driven off without a single one of her guns being struck. Thus, a close attack by ships upon forts has become almost impossible, though it is, beyond doubt, perfectly feasible for war vessels to run through an unobstructed channel commanded by forts, however numerous.

Mr. President, it has often been said that it is dangerous to provide fortifications and also to equip our Army properly because we may be tempted to engage in war. To this I do not assent. Says Admiral Walker:

In the interest of peace the best thing that could be done at this time by Congress would be to appropriate liberally for the defense of the important seaports and to make liberal appropriations for the Navy.

It is clear that self-respect, to say nothing of the demands of patriotism, requires that we shall be in a position to guard our honor and our families, our lives and our property. We wish to engage, I assume, in no unjustifiable struggle, but we do not care to be trampled under foot. Our cities must not be destroyed or placed under contribution. But if we continue the do-nothing programme of the present we must avoid all attempts to vindicate private or public right as against better equipped nations.

When General Miles was examined by the committee he was asked the following question:

Senator MILLS. But what would prevent a fleet from setting fire to and burning a city?

General MILES. They should be sunk before coming within reach of the city.

We all concur, I presume, in the wisdom of that remark.

Besides, I think it would be regarded as a violation of the rules of civilized warfare, if a fleet should get near enough to do so, to turn their batteries on a city when they were unable to silence the batteries defending it. (Hearings, page 50.)

The difficulty about this statement is twofold. In the first place, as General Miles correctly says:

A hostile fleet can not come within 24 miles of New York without coming under the guns at Sandy Hook, now Fort Hancock. When the fortifications are completed they could not enter Long Island Sound without encountering the land batteries. (Hearings, page 50.)

Therefore, if a hostile fleet were within the range of New York it is pretty certain that its proximity could be accounted for only because it had silenced or at least successfully passed the fortifications. It would, indeed, be a fearful exercise of power to destroy such a city as New York; but war is cruel, an irate enemy, determined upon conquest or vengeance, and panting for blood, might, notwithstanding the rules of civilized warfare, which are only binding in a moral sense, submit to the city of New York the alternative of the payment of an enormous ransom or obliteration and destruction. No nation can afford to rest in security upon the theory that the civilized rules of warfare inhibit the bombardment of a great metropolis. The desperate conflicts which have sullied the pages of history evidence the futility of such theoretical defenses. A war between the United States and either of the great European powers would mean ruin unexampled, and in such exigency our cities will be safe only if they are well guarded by not only skillful and brave men, who may be found easily and daily, but also by powerful guns, which can be built solely in expensive factories by complicated instrumentality slow of creation and easy of destruction. These great weapons can not be made by the best and most extensive mechanism save after months and even years of discipline and toil. To be safe our coast must be defended. To be defended we must provide weapons. To provide weapons we need years and money. At the present rate, according to the testimony of the Secretary of War, it will be necessary to wait for seventy years. This Congress should provide the means suggested by the War and Navy Departments, involving a decade of workmanship, for it must be recollected that if we adopt the plan submitted to us by our military authorities it will still take ten years to complete the armament. This is not very rapid work. It is slow enough, surely. If we decline to so legislate we should plainly announce that we do not intend to defend ourselves, and are seeking mercy, not demanding justice. Certainly, the present system is absurd. To appropriate a small sum which can eventuate in nothing, to postpone effective defense until the expiration of three-quarters of a century—approximates dementia. Long before our plan will have been completed the weapons created in inaugurating it will have become old-fashioned and useless. Our present system is burlesque and its continuance is a misappropriation of public funds.

IS THERE ANY DANGER OF WAR WITH A FORMIDABLE POWER?

While it is palpable that we can not justify our failure to provide adequate defenses if it be true that there is danger of serious complications with great powers, it must, nevertheless, be admitted that if such conflict is forever and certainly impossible then there is no necessity for any expenditure, and in that event we are not warranted in making any outlay whatever for our Navy or for coast defenses. While I do not think it at all probable that this country will be subject to the horrors incident to armed contests, nevertheless I see no impossibility of such an occurrence.

* Of this sum only $10,631,000, or four-tenths of 1 per cent of the grand aggregate, has been available for expenditure upon modern forts and guns.

The experiences of the past necessitate these conclusions. Take the case of Great Britain. It is but little more than a century since we separated from the mother country, not peaceably, but after the disbursement of a large amount of money and the sacrifice of many valuable lives. But a few years afterwards the war of 1812 challenged the utmost exertions of our people. Upon several occasions later on our relations were further strained. During our civil contest we were upon the verge of war with England, and had it not been for the good sense of Mr. Lincoln it is probable that she would have found occasion to engage us. The theory advanced in this Chamber that the warm fellowship existing between England and America assures peace is utterly negated by familiar history. In the Venezuelan case the press and people of both countries manifested warlike symptoms. In this Chamber a demonstration the like of which has not been seen for many years greeted the somewhat belligerent phraseology of the Presidential message. The Cuban incident developed sentiments of an even more acrid character toward Spain, and while a contest with that nation would not be so serious, nevertheless other parties would likely intervene. Not very long ago, during Mr. Harrison's Administration, it was currently believed that a conflict with Chile was inevitable. The Nicaragua Canal project now pending before Congress will, if carried out, be followed by hostile protestations from Great Britain and probably from other powers.

In 1817 our Government and that of Great Britain entered into an agreement by which it was covenanted that on Lake Ontario neither Government should have any armed vessels except the following:

On Lake Ontario one vessel not exceeding 100 tons burden, armed with one 18-pound cannon. On the Upper Lakes two vessels not exceeding like burden, each armed with like force. On the waters of Lake Champlain one vessel not exceeding like burden and armed with like force. (Treaties, etc., page 414, 415.)

Of this agreement Secretary Herbert speaks in his late report. Thus both Great Britain and the United States concede the necessity of excluding all considerable armed force from the Great Lakes. In other words, we have mutually agreed not to carry deadly weapons, because of the apprehension that the same might be used with fatal effect. We can not trust ourselves in each other's company. We have conceded this fact by the solemn obligations above referred to. Moreover, there is in this country a warlike spirit. The men who were engaged in the civil war and who personally witnessed its horrors are not anxious for hostilities of any kind. That they are brave and patriotic passes without saying. They have been tried in a fiery and terrible ordeal. Another generation appears upon the scene. The national spirit has been properly cultivated, and there is much desire to whip somebody. Gentlemen who were well and old enough to fight during the civil war, but who did not fight, doubtless because they knew their country could get along without them, and gentlemen who think they would have fought had they been old enough, vie with each other in criticising and often insulting foreign nations. We are traveling around, figuratively speaking, with a chip on our shoulder. Some of us perhaps hope that no one will take us up. But we can not be certain as to this.

If we possessed proper coast defenses and reasonable naval strength, it is unlikely that any power would care to attack us; but if Great Britain or France, or even Germany, were to declare war against the United States to-day and at the same time draw upon Boston and New York for a few hundred millions, there would be nothing for those cities to do but to put up the money. If this were not done immediately the appearance of a fleet in the neighborhood would compel compliance. And if the enemy felt so disposed, our Navy, so called, would be either captured or sunk. This is not pleasant to contemplate. This condition makes one unduly conservative. However patriotic we may be, it is questionable whether under these conditions we are justified in trying to resent insults. Probably we should make an effort to resist. When a weak person of spirit is grossly insulted by one who is strong he may be expected to act, and if he is defeated he at least has the satisfaction of knowing that he was brave, though indiscreet. This makes him feel better while he is undergoing repairs.

We all observed that the New York newspapers did not take kindly to Mr. Cleveland's Venezuelan message. We can not wonder at this. Some of those newspapers possess very fine buildings. If the anticipated war with England had taken place many of these edifices might have been destroyed. The English admiral would have trained his guns by way of experiment upon these massive, elegant structures. The same journals have been, it is true, disposed to fight Spain, but that is because they feel safe as to Spain, having faith in our ability to better that nation on either land or sea. The circumstance that powerful governments have heretofore treated our bantering goodnaturedly or at least have declined to invite us to the field is no evidence of what may be done. A nation as well as a man may have, as Cervantes says, "a face like a benediction," and yet there may be savage preparation in progress. We can not give a good account of ourselves without modern arms, vessels, and fortifications.

Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] with reference to the battle-ship question has suggested to me the propriety of making these remarks, not because I am opposed to the navy idea, but because I wish to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the manifest necessity for the adoption of a different policy in the matter of national defense.

I have referred to the circumstance that Great Britain, with her powerful naval force, does not ignore land defenses. She has taken pains at all times to provide adequate fortifications for the protection not only of her cities, but also for her navy and merchant marine. Her navy has been constantly increased and her land defenses augmented and multiplied.

She has not ignored her cities, harbors, and coaling stations. Nor has she in any respect followed the unreasonable plan adopted here. We declare our willingness to rely upon our Navy, and also assert that we are a brave people prepared at any moment to meet any exigency that may be thrust upon us. But we do not possess supernal power. Perhaps if we were compelled to face a foe in hand-to-hand combat as in the olden time, or if we could successfully use weapons of easy manufacture, the case would be different. But when we reflect that it takes months and even years to manufacture a single gun, when we remember that while the process is going on widespread destruction will have overtaken us, we begin to appreciate that our conduct is essentially unbusinesslike.

It appears to me that the committees having these matters in charge should either abandon all effort for coast defense or provide sufficient money to permit the adoption of a course suggested by common sense.

[Mr. ALLEN addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. GORMAN. Let the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, line 19, after the word "contract," it is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the word "two" and inserting "six"; so as to read:

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract six seagoing coast-line battle ships, etc.

Mr. GORMAN. I make the point of order that six battle ships are not estimated for, and therefore the amendment to the amendment is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland makes the point of order that there is no estimate for the proposition embraced in the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, of course I recognize the fact that if the Senator from Maryland and the Senate gag at four battle ships it is not likely they will swallow six. But believing, as I do, that the naval armament of the country will not be complete without these six battle ships, believing that the Republican party long before the fulfillment of the contract for their construction will be in possession of the Government and that there will be plenty of money to construct them and a surplus in the Treasury, I should like to have a vote directly upon the proposition. I trust the Senator from Maryland will withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the point of order insisted on?

Mr. GORMAN. I shall have to insist upon the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. GORMAN. The amendment had better be stated.

Mr. VEST. Let the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 19, page 50, after the word "contract," it is proposed to strike out the word "four" and insert "two"; so as to read:

Two seagoing coast-line battle ships.

Mr. GORMAN. Of course the Senate understands perfectly, after the debate we have had, although the real point under consideration may have been lost sight of in the long discussion, that if the amendment which I have offered to strike out "four" and insert "two" prevails it will decrease the appropriation about $16,000,000.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Maryland please state about what the cost of each battle ship will be?

Mr. GORMAN. The bill provides that the construction of each one of the vessels shall cost not to exceed $3,750,000. The armament and armor will cost about an equal amount; so each vessel will cost not quite $8,000,000—seven million and a half; and if the amendment which I have offered—

Mr. CHANDLER. The armor is included. It is only the armament which has to be provided in addition.

Mr. GORMAN. The armor is included.

Mr. CHANDLER. The limit is $3,750,000 for each, and that includes armor. The armament is additional.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; the armament is additional.

Mr. MILLS. The guns.

Mr. CHANDLER. The armament might cost half a million dollars.

Mr. GORMAN. If the amendment I have proposed is adopted it will give to the Navy two of these immense battle ships, which is the same number that we ordered two years ago. Those are only now being constructed at Newport News, and the armor for them has not yet been contracted for. Bids are in and are pending before the Navy Department. The armament as a matter of course has not yet been provided for. It will give a natural and a very large increase to the Navy if we make provision for two. I trust the amendment will be adopted. On that question I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Senator from Maryland intended to leave the impression, but he certainly has left the impression, that these ships will cost complete between seven and eight million dollars.

Mr. GORMAN. Six or seven million dollars.

Mr. LODGE. They will cost complete between four and five million dollars each.

Mr. GORMAN. I have the exact amount.

Mr. HALE. The figures, if the Senator from Maryland will allow me, were given in the debate in the other House.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. The four ships complete, including their armament and everything, will cost between twenty-five and twenty-six million dollars.

Mr. SQUIRE. Including the armament?

Mr. HALE. Including everything. They will cost either between twenty-four and twenty-five million dollars or between twenty-five and twenty-six million dollars. I have the figures here.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will notice that the cost of each ship is limited to $3,750,000.

Mr. PLATT. What does the armament cost?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know, but say half a million dollars.

Mr. HALE. Oh, more than that; much more than that sum.

Mr. CHANDLER. Add a million and a quarter, and it is only $5,000,000.

Mr. LODGE. These ships cost about $5,000,000 each.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the bill had better be recommitted to the committee or to somebody who can tell us within a few million dollars what the ships will cost.

Mr. HALE. We are not all possessed of the great information on every subject that the Senator from Colorado is.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not profess it; it is not my duty to be charged with it, and I go to the fountain head of information, where I went courteously and had a right to go. I asked the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and he gave me one figure; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who is upon the Naval Affairs Committee, gave another figure. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] gives another figure, and I am asking for information in the utmost good faith.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Colorado can take his choice.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Not claiming myself to have unusual information, I suggest that the bill ought to be uncommitted or referred to somebody who can tell us within a few million dollars what the ships will cost.

Mr. HALE. I can tell the Senator within very much less than a few million dollars. When the matter was up in the other House the figures were given, and I have the debate here before me. I do not quite remember whether it is between twenty-four and twenty-five million or between twenty-five and twenty-six million dollars, but my recollection is that it is between twenty-four and twenty-five million dollars complete. I may be wrong about it. It may be a little less than that.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Maine is right about it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] says the armament will cost $500,000. I understand. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] says the cost is $3,750,000.

Mr. HALE. That is for all.

Mr. WOLCOTT. No, no. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. MILLS. For each one.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Both Senators stated the cost of the armament for each vessel. The Senator from Maryland stated that it is about $3,750,000 and the Senator from New Hampshire—I hope I do not misquote him—said it is about $500,000. He is fresh from Bethlehem, having just returned from an investigation there.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am under pretty good discipline in one committee of this body, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, where there is absolute accuracy of knowledge as to postoffice and post-road subjects. I have been occupying so much of my time this session in trying to keep up with the Senator from Colorado, that I have not kept myself fully informed as to the figures in connection with the naval appropriations. The Senator will understand that I can not remember down to a dollar, and we do rely nevertheless upon the vote of the Senator from Colorado being in favor of an increase in the Navy, although we can not give him the figures precisely—

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

Mr. CHANDLER. I presume the Senator from Maine now has a table which will enlighten the Senator from Colorado so that he will allow the consideration of the bill to proceed without moving to recommit it.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose the Senator from Colorado is very serious about recommitting the bill. We are entirely content with his mild sally at the expense of the committee. The committee is not so very far wrong after all. The same question was asked in the House of Representatives, and the estimates of the cost of the four ships, upon different figures, ranged between twenty-three and twenty-four million dollars up to $26,000,000. Mr. DINGLEY said:

That is the statement in the report; and that the cost of the armament exclusive of that sum, about $2,405,000 for each battle ship, which would be $9,600,000 for the four battle ships; and that added together carries the whole amount up to $26,275,000.

That is larger than I stated. It was afterwards stated that, reckoning the cheapness of material, the four ships could be builded for between twenty-four and twenty-five million dollars, or twenty-three and twenty-four million dollars.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Twenty-four million nine hundred and eighty thousand dollars is the amount, as I understand, according to the estimates which have been given.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt that the four ships, fully completed and ready for service, with everything to make complete battle ships, will cost anywhere in the neighborhood of—not far either way—$25,000,000.

Mr. SQUIRE. May I ask the Senator from Maine a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SQUIRE. By referring to a table which I received from the Navy Department, I observe that the Iowa has a displacement of 11,410 tons, with an indicated horsepower of 11,000, and that the cost of the hull and machinery of the Iowa is exactly $3,010,000. The act authorizing the construction was passed July 19, 1892. This, we all know, is the most recently launched of the battle ships; in fact, the only one except the Massachusetts, the Indiana, and the Oregon.

As to the armament, I have been informed by those who are connected with the Department of the Navy that the cost of the armament and armor together will be about equal to the cost of the hull and machinery of one of these great battle ships. Of course, in that case the total cost of the hull and machinery and the armor and armament altogether would be a little over $6,000,000 for each battle ship.

The point to which I was about to call attention is this: I should like to know what is the reason that the proposed appropriation for battle ships is to be $3,750,000 for each, one to have a displacement of about 11,000 tons, when I see that the Iowa, which has just been launched, and having an equal displacement of 11,000 tons, cost for hull and machinery only $3,010,000. There seems to be a difference of $740,000; that is, $740,000 more to be paid for each of these ships, or not to exceed that. I do not know but that there may be a reason that can be alleged for this increase in the price of the limit. What is the reason for this increase? Is it necessary? If so, why? Is it owing to a proposed increase in speed?

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SQUIRE. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There is a good deal of noise in the Chamber and I do not know that I understood him. Do I understand the Senator from Washington to say that for a battle ship of the same size as the Iowa the Government is to be committed now to the building of a ship which is to cost for the hull and machinery $750,000 more?

Mr. SQUIRE. Seven hundred and forty thousand dollars.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Well, $740,000.

Mr. SQUIRE. Yes; that is the limit. I was about to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if there were some reasons for the increase of the price beyond the price named for the Iowa. There is about the same amount of displacement and the same indicated horsepower, so far as I am able to learn.

Mr. BACON. I take the liberty of suggesting to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] the fact that the amendment which has been reported by me to the Senate from the Committee on Naval Affairs limiting the price of the armor for these battle ships will very materially reduce the cost of the ships if it shall be adopted. So that element must not be lost sight of in suggesting to the Senate what will be the probable cost of the battle ships.

The amendment which has been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs would contemplate the reduction of about 25 per cent in the cost of the armor for these four battle ships. Of course that has not yet been adopted by the Senate, and may not be; but it is proper that it should be considered in this connection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask the Senator, while he is on his feet, if he can explain the discrepancy to which the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] has called our attention, that the battle ships of a year ago cost for hull and machinery some $750,000 less than those proposed to be built by this bill?

Mr. BACON. I understand that the amount authorized to be paid is not an arbitrary amount which the ships are to cost, but that it is the outside limit which is specified.

Mr. HALE. There is no actual discrepancy, as indicated by the statement of the Senator from Washington. I have here the figures, so far as they can be got, of the two ships that are now being completed, the Kearsarge and the Kentucky, and it is thought that they will be completed at an expense of $5,297,000 each, or, in round numbers, $5,300,000 for each. That includes armor and armament. That would make the amount for the four ships about $21,000,000. I think they will cost more. Part of the discrepancy arises from the fact that in making the estimates they did not include the three classes of cost making up the total of the hull, the machinery, and the armament. They are all expensive, and they make a battle ship cost ranging from five to six million dollars; and the Senate should consider that those figures varying from five to six million dollars each, including everything, will be the cost. One ship will cost more than another. If they were built at a navy-yard, they would cost 30 per cent more than that. It is true, if the cost of the armor is cut down—but that is not reckoned in these estimates and the present prices are reckoned—it will reduce the cost somewhat.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have had some hesitation in regard to the vote I shall give on the amendment. The considerations that seemed to me to be proper to influence the votes of Senators upon this subject are not altogether those which are related to the financial view of the situation, nor entirely to the condition of the public defense. If I had my way, I am inclined to think that, in the condition of the present depression of business, the vast number of unemployed people, according to the best statistics I have been enabled to obtain, the use of the public credit of the country in the most available form to give employment in useful and necessary public works is an object of public policy not to be disregarded. If I am right in my conviction, in no past period of the history of this country, nor indeed of Europe, has there been such vast numbers of unemployed people able and willing to work—men and women—but in vain seeking for that employment which is absolutely necessary for the preservation of life.

It is not my purpose here to discuss what would seem to me to be the causes of this condition, but unquestionably in our own country it is widespread. There is no sale for property; there is but little employment for the people; great discouragement exists in all agricultural pursuits. In that condition of things it seems to me that the credit of the Government, employed in the most harmless and least oppressive way, may be advantageously used for the purpose of starting the wheels of industry and giving employment and subsistence to the people in every path and pursuit of life. Connected with that, the public defense is certainly not to be disregarded. Nor do I see how it is that ships built in the proper degree of art, capable of defense and offense, would not be a protection against vessels of the same kind coming from a great distance and appearing upon our coasts. I do not perceive that this question of coast defenses can supply the place of naval armament; nor do I perceive that the question of the public dignity and the consideration which this country should have amongst the nations of the earth ought to be disregarded. In my judgment, like a man who does not preserve his character and the respect due to him, a great nation amongst the peoples of the earth which is indifferent to the questions of humanity, to the questions of great public policy affecting not only themselves but other nations, will fall in the scale of public appreciation.

For these reasons it seems to me that an appropriation, even if it be of the public credit, should be made. I do not favor the selling of bonds of the United States, because, in my judgment, that is not necessary. I believe that contractors will be glad to take these contracts, payable in gold or silver coin, or in the Treasury notes of the United States, made redeemable at the option of the Government. I have no fears upon that subject.

But, paramount to all these questions, considering this to be a useful public work, comes the consideration of giving work and employment and using the public credit of the country in such shape and form as will create work, employment, prosperity, business.

I do not see that the imposition of taxes and the hoarding of money in the Treasury will start any enterprises which will give employment. Those things must be combined; and therefore we can not regard this from a purely financial point of view, nor can we consider it as a question entirely foreign to the public defense of our coast, viewed in that aspect alone.

So it seems to me that, if this be not an excessive amount, considering the character of this country, its financial resources, and its future prosperity, conceding, as I do, the great oppression that comes from the form of public and private debts in this country and the manner in which they are being enforced, I am inclined to the opinion that it would not be wise in us to substitute in place of coast defenses, to a very considerable extent, a naval armament.

Having that judgment and that opinion, while it was my intention to have gone more elaborately into this view of the subject and have indicated by figures and the best statistics that could be obtained, the condition of paralysis of trade, of business, of the poverty and want which are to be found in almost every household of the great majority of the people of this country, and of the necessity of such public policies as would give employment the most widespread and universal—if it were in my power I would to-day engage in every public enterprise which was of utility or of necessity, even though it might be a little in the future, in order that prosperity might come to the great masses of the people and we should again have enterprise and activity and energy in all branches of private and public employment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I desire simply to say a word, without entering into any elaborate discussion.

Of course I am not indifferent to the appropriation of the large expenditures which would necessarily be involved in the construction of these battle ships. If the condition of the Treasury were in fact such as has been suggested here, and it would be necessary for the Government to go into debt for the purpose of constructing these ships, nothing but very urgent necessity for the ships would induce me to vote for these four; but the fact is that, however it happens, it is true that there is a very large surplus to-day in the Treasury which will be subject to expenditure for this very purpose. As the money is there, as it is represented by a bonded indebtedness which is bearing interest, and as that money is necessarily idle, it seems to me if these ships are needed—and upon that question there does not seem to be any dissent or difference of opinion—it is much better that we should use that money and put it again into circulation. I should not, of course, advocate that it should be put into circulation for a needless purpose; but if these ships are needed a double purpose will be subserved in the construction of needed ships, and, at the same time, in again putting into circulation money which I think has been very improperly locked up in the Treasury. For that reason I shall vote for the four battle ships.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, it is true, as stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], that there is a very large amount of money in the Treasury.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me to ask is not that money now being anticipated in other appropriations also?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly. I tried to show that the day before yesterday, when I discussed this particular question. Against the $150,000,000 now in the Treasury, not including fractional currency nor the $100,000,000 reserved for the redemption of greenbacks, there stands a charge of $116,000,000 which Congress has appropriated prior to this session which has not been disbursed. There was that much owing at the beginning of this fiscal year. Those appropriations are as follows:

For the civil establishment.....	$26,655,142.12
For the military establishment.....	39,208,700.23
On account of the Navy, which has been appropriated and not expended.....	9,123,145.89
On account of the Indians.....	5,311,618.29
On account of pensions.....	35,986,519.71
Total.....	116,285,126.23

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask if in this statement transmitted from the Treasury Department which I hold in my hand, which is the same the Senator has, the amounts stated by him do not include the several amounts which are stated by the Treasurer in this report in these items:

Outstanding checks and drafts.....	$3,332,504.56
Disbursing officers' balances.....	22,706,507.21
Post-Office Department account.....	3,673,176.36

Are not those amounts to be subtracted from the $116,285,126.23 to which the Senator has alluded?

Mr. GORMAN. I do not recall the statement from which the Senator is reading.

Mr. BACON. I will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. GORMAN. The figures which I have given are from the books of the Treasury Department on the 1st day of July last, being the amount which has heretofore been appropriated and has not been paid out by the Department.

The present Secretary of the Treasury and his predecessor, Secretary Foster, under the Administration of President Harrison, were compelled to pursue the policy which the Senator from Ohio has said on this floor more than once any Secretary ought to pursue; that when Congress makes appropriations exceeding the revenues he should refuse to go on with the public work. The present Secretary of the Treasury has been compelled to do this. He has said, however, and I have read his statement in his annual report to Congress, that if you continue to make these appropriations he would continue to spend the money. He has absolutely suspended putting any amount to the sinking fund to pay for the debt which we have already created because he has not had the money to do it.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs Congress now at this session that he does not desire additional taxation, and that, with the proceeds of the bonds which he has been compelled to sell, he can manage to pay all the current expenses of the Government, provided Congress is economical. The answer which will go back to him after that declaration when this bill passes is what? That we have appropriated $51,000,000 for the Navy, when his estimate is $29,000,000. There is not a Senator or Member of either House of Congress who does not know, if he has examined these figures carefully, that it will take every dollar which is now in the Treasury to meet the current expenses and these extraordinary appropriations. Then will occur before December next, in my judgment, precisely what occurred this year. The moment that the Treasury has not enough money, has not a working balance, the money sharks, men who want to invest in United States bonds, they being the best securities on the face of the earth, will make another raid upon the Treasury gold, and it will be run down below the hundred-million limit. Then will follow the sale of bonds again.

It will not do for Senators to ignore the fact—for it is a fact—that whenever the Treasury has had a large balance in current funds it has been able to secure gold not by issuing bonds, but in exchange for the greenbacks and Treasury notes which are in the Treasury. A hundred million dollars and more of gold have been so obtained by Secretary Carlisle since he has occupied the position of Secretary of the Treasury at a time when he had a surplus and a working balance on hand; and Senators will remember that the moment the current report showed the fact that he had this large balance there was no raid upon the Treasury. But we are laying here, in my judgment, the foundation for another movement for the issue of more bonds.

Mr. President, who can doubt the unwisdom of the proposition to make appropriations which are desirable but not necessary for the conduct of the Government, when your revenues are confessedly short $40,000,000 a year—$50,000,000 a year as it stands on the face of the report, and probably nearer $60,000,000. The Treasury statement which is presented to Congress every day and every month shows that the expenditures have exceeded the receipts $25,000,000 a year, in round numbers—I have not the exact figures before me, but it is about $26,000,000. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] says about $24,000,000. The Senator from Texas, however, will observe that it fluctuates regularly; that the last four days of every month the payments are reduced, and of course the receipts, whatever they happen to be for the same time, and the balance against the Treasury is not so great, because they are closing up their accounts and do not pay out so much money during the last three or four days of a month. The first three days of every month the expenses begin to increase.

Mr. MILLS. They run up.

Mr. GORMAN. They run up. Twenty-five million dollars is about the amount as it stands to-day; but that does not represent all the charges against the Treasury. On the 1st day of July I have shown you that there was $116,000,000 that had not been paid out which had been appropriated for. From July up to this present date the exact amount I do not know, but it is safe to say it is fifty or sixty million dollars more.

I said a moment ago that my deliberate judgment is that we have appropriated enough; that there are charges against the Treasury to-day which would consume all of the $160,000,000 or $165,000,000 in the Treasury. That does not include $100,000,000 for the redemption of greenbacks.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The point to which I called the attention of the Senator from Maryland was that in the account of the Treasurer, which I handed to him, there was some $29,000,000 which was not accounted for as being to the credit of the Government, because there are charges against it. Certainly that $29,000,000 should be deducted from the $116,000,000 of unpaid accounts to which the Senator alludes.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I would say that a part of this amount has been appropriated by Congress in the last appropriation on account of pensions. There had been a great deal of anxiety, and very proper anxiety, on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury and all the heads of Departments to cut down and to prevent the final expenditure of a part of the money which has been appropriated for by Congress. There is scarcely a public building going on in the country where they have not refused to expend the amount necessary to complete it. There is not an improvement which has been made anywhere as to which they have not labored in the same way to prevent the money going out of the Treasury. Why? Because they do not desire to issue more bonds.

Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, calls the attention of Congress, very properly, I think, to the fact that he will expend the money if you continue to appropriate it. I will read his exact language, so that there may be no mistake as to what he means. He says:

While the situation does not require any legislation for raising additional revenue by taxation at this time, it is such as to require the strictest economy in appropriations and public expenditures. At a time when the people, upon whom the expense of sustaining the Government is imposed, are compelled to practice the closest economy in their business and domestic affairs in order to meet their obligations and reestablish their trade and industries, it is more than ever the duty of the public authorities to avoid waste and extravagance in the appropriation and disbursement of the revenues. Nearly every appropriation is in terms, or by necessary implication, a direction to the executive authorities to expend the money, and therefore the responsibility for an increase or reduction of expenditures rests primarily and mainly upon Congress. It is certain that if appropriations are not made the money will not be expended, and, for the reason just stated, it is almost equally certain that if appropriations are made the money must be expended.

In connection with that statement the Secretary of the Treasury furnishes an estimate of what the revenues will be during the year for which we are now appropriating, and here is his estimate—so far as he has gone he has overestimated the revenues: From customs, $190,000,000; from internal revenue, $170,000,000; from miscellaneous sources, $15,000,000, and from the postal service, $89,793,120.75, making the total receipts, as he estimates for the year ending 1897, $464,793,120.75. He estimates the appropriations that are likely to be made, exclusive of the sinking fund, at $457,884,193.92. For the Navy Department his estimate is about $29,000,000. By this bill it is proposed to appropriate $31,000,000 of direct appropriations, and there is a sufficient number of contracts to run up the amount to $52,000,000.

Mr. PLATT. But all the money to be expended during the year is $31,000,000 and a little over. Is not that true?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; all the money to be expended during the year is $31,000,000; and that is a greater amount than the Secretary of the Navy has estimated for.

Mr. PLATT. Some $2,000,000.

Mr. GORMAN. A few million dollars greater. But taking the aggregate of the appropriations now being made, as the bill has come from the other House, as I showed a day or two since, with the additions in the Senate, it will swell the appropriations to the amount of forty or fifty million dollars.

Now, the question arises, where is this money to come from? There is but one answer, Mr. President. It is to come by issuing additional obligations of the Government. Hence it is that I said when I had the honor of occupying the floor upon this proposition, if you make these appropriations you do it with the full knowledge that it means more bonds of a long term or else the authority to issue certificates of indebtedness bearing a less rate of interest. But it means more for those of us on this side who happen to differ with our distinguished friends on the other side. It means fastening upon the country largely increased taxation when the next Congress assembles, and we shall be held responsible for it, just as the Fifty-first Congress was held responsible for the great appropriation of a billion dollars during that Congress, which made increased taxation absolutely necessary. The country held you responsible for those appropriations, and it was one of the main reasons why your party went out of power. Pass these bills as they came here and as they are proposed to be amended, and it is $520,000,000 for this year of money directly appropriated—$600,000,000, including the contracts which they contain.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Maryland pardon an inquiry?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Maryland speaks of the necessity for the issuance of bonds which these appropriations will necessarily entail. Does the Senator hold that there is any law now under which any bonds can be issued for the purpose indicated by him? Is there any law upon the statute book now which would authorize the issuance of any bonds to meet any deficiency of that kind? If so, what is it?

Mr. GORMAN. The Secretary of the Treasury is an exceedingly able man, who has had large and long experience in Congress, and who I believe, from my personal knowledge and from his public declarations, was as honestly opposed to the issuing of bonds as any man in public life, not only while he occupied a seat upon this floor but after he had control of the great Department over which he now presides. He, I think at great risk as to his standing with those with whom he is associated, insisted, when the revenue bill was before the last Congress, that we should raise revenue enough to pay the current expenses of the Government. I do not know a more courageous act than that which he did when he wrote the letter to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, insisting upon revenue enough to run the Government at a time when there was a widespread and terrific cyclone in Democratic quarters to cut the revenue down too close. I know from my personal knowledge that he never desired to use a dollar of the proceeds of the sale of bonds to pay the expenses of the Government, but he has acted precisely as all his predecessors have acted. He adopted the rule established by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] when Secretary of the Treasury, that the moment a greenback or a Treasury note was redeemed in gold the note was immediately turned in to the general cash in the Treasury; and then, under the act of 1878, he was required to pay it out whenever the Government had a payment to make. The attention of Congress had been called to it: Congress had failed to act. Let me read what Secretary Carlisle says in his last annual report:

The total excess of expenditures over receipts from July 1, 1893, to December 1, 1895, was $130,221,623; and of this sum $22,462,290.38 was paid out of the balance on hand at this date in excess of $100,000,000, and the remainder has been supplied by the use of United States notes and Treasury notes presented for redemption, and thus received into the Treasury in exchange for gold coin. The act of May 31, 1878, provided that when any United States note "may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation;" and the act of July 14, 1890, provided that the Treasury notes, when redeemed, may be reissued, but that "no greater or less amount of such notes shall be outstanding at any time than the cost of the silver bullion and the standard silver dollars coined therefrom then held in the Treasury purchased by such notes."

It is clear that when any of these notes have been redeemed they do not constitute a part of the reserve fund, but become a part of the general cash assets of the Treasury, to be used in the same manner as other money belonging to the Government. Whenever they could, by exchanges, be used to procure gold for the replenishment of the reserve, they have been so applied, but when this could not be done they have been treated as available funds in the Treasury and reissued in payment of public expenses. None of my predecessors in office have ever made any distinction between the notes received in payment of the ordinary revenue and notes presented by the holders and redeemed in coin, but such notes have been used indiscriminately as the exigencies of the public service required.

Secretary Sherman discussed this question in his annual report for 1877, before the passage of the act of May 31, 1878, and, among other things, he said: "A note redeemed with coin is in the Treasury and subject to the same law as if received for taxes, or as a bank note redeemed by the corporation issuing it. The authority to reissue it does not depend upon the mode in which it is returned to the Treasury." He was discussing the question whether the notes which might be redeemed after the 1st day of January, 1879, under the resumption act, could be lawfully reissued, and he held that they could; but he stated that this construction of the law was controverted, and insisted that the question should be settled by a distinct provision of law. The result was that Congress passed the act of May 31, 1878, making it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue the notes. Since the passage of that act the right and duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue the old legal-tender notes, no matter how received into the Treasury, provided they belong to the United States, has never been questioned in any quarter, and, as to the Treasury notes issued under the silver-purchasing act, they must be reissued when redeemed in gold, or if canceled standard silver dollars must be issued in their place; for if this were not done there would be a smaller amount of such notes outstanding than the cost of the silver bullion and the standard silver dollars coined therefrom and held in the Treasury, and this condition is expressly prohibited by the statute under which the notes were issued. Whether these notes are reissued or destroyed and standard silver dollars substituted for them, the practical result is the same, for in both cases the Secretary would be using notes redeemed in gold for the payment of the ordinary expenses of the Government; in one case, by paying out the notes themselves, and in the other by drawing silver from a reserve fund on account of their cancellation and then paying out the silver.

We had this question before the Senate over and over again. I think the authors of the acts of 1875 and 1878 never contemplated that the proceeds of the sale of the bonds should be used for any other purpose except for the redemption of the outstanding greenbacks at that time, but subsequent legislation required him to pay them out whenever they came in. It was held by the Department that they were required to do it, and under the act of 1878 these payments have been made openly, with the full knowledge by Congress that the payments would be so made, that the proceeds of the sales of the bonds would be used for this identical purpose. And when we vote for four great battle ships we vote with the perfect knowledge that we are taking the proceeds of the sale of the bonds. Now, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and my good friend from Florida [Mr. CALL] seem to think that as this money is in the Treasury, no matter how it reached there, it is better to have it taken out and expended and put it in circulation.

Mr. BACON. Not unless it is for a necessary and an important purpose.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; but there comes a matter of judgment. I do not think it is necessary to appropriate $20,000,000 for four great battle ships which will be of no earthly use in the next three or four years and which can not be built for three years.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. Can the Senator state with probable accuracy the annual expense of maintaining one of these great ships?

Mr. GORMAN. I can not, because it depends on the amount of service they give.

Mr. WHITE. In time of peace, I mean.

Mr. GORMAN. The object is to keep the ship in commission for a year, fully manned. Hence we are asked, as I said a day or two ago, not only to make provision for constructing the ships, but to give them both sailors and marines, and all the rest of the paraphernalia that is required to put a ship in commission fully armored, fully equipped, and fully manned in time of peace that it may have practice. That becomes necessary, and as a matter of course the expense of it is enormous. The expense is increasing more rapidly, and it will increase in the next three or four years more rapidly than any Senator can imagine, in my judgment.

Now, we are not only appropriating money for building ships, but the first of the ships that were constructed are now here with immense appropriations for new machinery. They are worn out. The ships that were constructed at the time when my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was Secretary of the Navy were grand ships, at the time they were models, and they are splendid ships now for certain purposes, but no one would build such a ship for the Navy now; they are obsolete.

Mr. SQUIRE. May I be permitted to ask a question?

Mr. GORMAN. In one moment. Nobody would think of constructing the same type of battle ships that we ordered four years ago. Take the ships that are now being constructed at Newport News. We have a most distinguished Naval Board to ascertain if those ships can not be improved over the ships ordered the year before, and vitally improve over them. So it will be with three battle ships. If you appropriate now for four battleships there can not be any question that two years hence the navy officers, advancing as the science advances in the construction of ships all over the world, would improve upon these.

Mr. SQUIRE. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SQUIRE. I understand that the Senator is a member of the Committee on Appropriations and that he has been engaged in considering the various questions comprised in this bill and the amounts of money to be appropriated. I should like to call his attention to the same point concerning which I made an inquiry of the Senator from Maine, but which does not seem to have been answered as yet. Why is it that in the consideration of this question the amount specified to be appropriated for each of these great battle ships is so large?

It seems to me we might look at this as a business question. There must be some reason for that. Here we have had several great battle ships built and others authorized to be constructed. We have the Indiana, now launched and in commission, the only one thus far of the United States battle ships that has ever been put into commission. We have the Massachusetts, which was launched a few months ago, and has just been going on her trial trip. We have the Iowa, that was launched only a few weeks ago. Many of us were present to see that magnificent ship launched. We know what the displacement of those vessels is. We know that the Iowa has a displacement according to the record of about 11,410 tons. We know what the displacement of the Massachusetts is by the record, and what is stated to be the displacement of the Indiana and of the others.

Now, I ask, how can we consistently be asked to vote an appropriation for any of these vessels to the extent appropriated in this bill, $3,750,000 each, exclusive of armament, when it appears from the record of the Navy Department that the vessels to which I have referred, having the tonnage I mentioned, cost, for the Indiana, $3,020,000; for the Iowa, $3,010,000; for the Massachusetts, $3,020,000; and the Oregon, which has also recently been launched on the Pacific coast, where the cost of building a great battle ship is supposed to be much greater than on the Atlantic coast—the Oregon was built at a cost of $3,180,000?

If we take a ship of the heaviest displacement—the Iowa, 11,410 tons—and subtract its cost, $3,010,000, from $3,750,000, it leaves $740,000 in excess, and there is no indication of any reason for this increase. Multiply that by four and you have $2,770,000 more in this bill for the four ships than was paid for the ships already built, which I have named, and which were built at a time when the cost of building the ships certainly was not any less than at this day.

Mr. GORMAN. I think I understand the general idea of the Senator from Washington. I want to say to him that the amount appropriated—that is to say, the limit of cost, that it shall not exceed $3,750,000—cuts no very great figure in this appropriation.

The last contracts we made were for about $2,500,000, but it was thought best to give the opportunity to the Secretary of the Navy to make the very improvements that I speak of if they became necessary. We have now a splendid board of naval officers to ascertain whether they can change entirely the upper construction of the vessels. They have turrets on the decks of these great war vessels, and they have found by recent experience that they are so located, the one in the front of the ship and two more in the rear or on the sides, that the guns are at such an angle as almost to shatter the front turret. They are now trying to determine whether they can not have a double turret with a gun below and another turret above.

Mr. FRYE. When the Senator is talking about a ship I wish he would not say in front and rear, but that he would say in bow and stern.

Mr. GORMAN. I am trying to use such terms as all my constituents and all the people of the country will understand. I was not thinking of the technical Senator from Maine, who is a thorough shipman.

But, Mr. President, coming back, I want to reply to my friend from Georgia, who asked me a question about the reason and the right to use this money. The Secretary of the Treasury has said to Congress, as all Secretaries have said to Congress—

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Maryland misunderstood my question. I did not ask a question as to the right to use the funds in the Treasury, but the Senator was speaking of the necessity which would be entailed of the issuance of more bonds if this additional expense should be incurred. The question which I propounded to the Senator was not as to the right to use money now in the Treasury, but as to the right of any Department of the Government, under existing law, to issue any bonds on account of such expenditures.

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, no; there is no such right of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to meet directly the expenditures.

Mr. BACON. That is the point.

Mr. GORMAN. It is done by two steps. The point I make is that the history of the Treasury Department since the last year of President Harrison's Administration has been that if your appropriations exceed your revenues and the balance is run down to a very low limit, then the drain on the gold will begin. During the present Administration gold has absolutely been paid out for the current expenses of the Government; it has been paid to Senators and Members of Congress for their salaries.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Was that gold bought with bonds?

Mr. GORMAN. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. How does the Treasury get any gold except by the sale of bonds?

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, up to the time of the passage of the Sherman Act and for six months after gold came in from the customs. During the present Administration they exchanged for greenbacks and Treasury notes $115,000,000 of gold before the fright began throughout the country, and the business interests of the country supposed that Congress was appropriating more extravagantly than the revenues warranted. When they knew that the Treasury was safe and had a safe balance in it, $116,000,000 of gold poured into the Treasury. People were glad to get greenbacks and Treasury notes. Silver certificates have been taken for gold when this excitement did not exist and when the Treasury was full and had plenty; but the moment that it appeared at the short session of 1892-93, the last session in which President Harrison was President, that the revenues had fallen off and that the expenditures had increased, then a fright began throughout the country which has lasted until the present time. After selling $262,000,000 in gold bonds, or in bonds for which gold was received, and with a balance of over $100,000,000, in addition to the $100,000,000 of reserve, in the Treasury, there is no raid on the gold.

I say to the Senator from Georgia and to the Senator from Florida that the moment Congress adjourns with $600,000,000 appropriated and contracted for, and it becomes known that that charge on the Treasury will deplete the surplus, then you open the door to begin the endless chain referred to by my friend from South Carolina. You will find that the men who have steel and other supplies for the Navy to sell and who have other interests will unite in the general raid that is being made upon the Treasury and they will take out your gold, and the moment the gold is gone more bonds will be sold.

Mr. TILLMAN. What I am trying to get the Senator to answer me is as to the legality of paying out gold for which you sold bonds for current expenses. There is no law for it. But how can the President or anybody else pay out for current expenses gold that was bought with bonds and was put there to maintain the reserve? That is the point I wish to have someone answer as a legal proposition.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from South Carolina will understand just what is done. The bonds were sold and gold was received. The next day or the next week the man who bought the bonds or somebody else goes to the Treasury with a greenback or a Treasury note—

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand the Senator to say that gold has actually been paid out for current expenses.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; I said it had been done to a small extent even during this Administration. That, however, was gold which was received from customs duties and it came in in the ordinary way. It was gold which was received before there was the sale of a single bond by this Administration. Do I make myself understood by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator does not make the law understood. He makes himself understood, but I can not see the law for it.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I remember very distinctly that at one time, something like two years ago, all the employees here in the Departments were paid in gold. It was a fact noted at the time by everybody. I think it was after all the free money in the Treasury had been exhausted, and it was said that the Secretary of the Treasury had begun to trench upon the gold reserve. That is my recollection.

Mr. GORMAN. No; the gold that has been paid out of the Treasury on any account, except for the redemption of Treasury notes and greenbacks, was received from customs duties. It came in in the same way as any other money, and the Department unquestionably had the right to dispose of it. But it was only paid out because the receipts in greenbacks and in paper from customs and internal revenue were not sufficient to pay the current expenses.

Now, I want to avoid that condition again. There is only one way to avoid it, and that is by reducing the expenditures. If Congress, in its wisdom, should make the immense appropriations of $520,000,000 for the current year and authorize obligations for seventy or eighty million dollars for next year, Congress must take the responsibility for whatever comes to the Treasury. I have said on this floor, as I say now, that, while I shall never be satisfied with the action which made it necessary to sell bonds, if Congress refuses to give any other power than that to sell bonds, as has heretofore taken place, or if Congress makes it necessary by extravagant appropriations, there is not a man in the country who will go further than I will to sustain the Executive in maintaining the honor and integrity of the country. But we take the responsibility—we can not escape it—when we vote for these appropriations as they stand. If it does not mean an additional sale of bonds or securities or an immediate increase of taxation, I am more mistaken than I ever have been in my life.

Mr. ALLEN. Before the Senator from Maryland takes his seat, I should like to ask him a question. The Senator stated that the total appropriations in round numbers would amount to about $600,000,000.

Mr. GORMAN. The total appropriations and contracts involving future appropriations.

Mr. ALLEN. The total actual appropriations and the contracts. I find by referring to report No. 336, from the Committee on Coast Defenses, that they want something like $107,000,000 for coast defenses, sixty-odd million dollars of which they want the actual money for at this time, and the balance the ability to contract for. I want to ask the Senator if in estimating the $600,000,000 of appropriations for this year, with authority to make contracts which together amount to that sum, he included the recommendation of the Committee on Coast Defenses.

Mr. GORMAN. No, I did not; and for the benefit of the Senator I will read him exactly what the status of the appropriation bills was as they reached the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest that the Senator put the table in the RECORD.

Mr. GORMAN. I shall be glad to have it go into the RECORD.

The regular annual appropriation bills for the support of the Government for the fiscal year 1897, including the river and harbor bill as passed by the House, appropriate in the aggregate	$374,613,449.19
The urgent deficiency act as approved February 26, 1896, appropriates	6,305,436.52
Permanent annual appropriations, which are fixed by law, as submitted in estimates for 1897	119,054,160.00
Miscellaneous acts approved to date	315,024.72
General deficiency estimates pending, for which bill has only recently passed the House, about	5,550,000.00

That makes an aggregate of..... 505,788,070.43

To that sum there must be added all the amendments to all the bills proposed in the Senate, the result of which will be an addition of not less than $15,000,000, which will make $520,000,000.

Now, in that sum only five or six millions is appropriated on account of fortifications, and there is much more included in contracts to be made. Instead of a hundred million dollars for fortifications, the bill comes here carrying $11,000,000. What the Senate will do with it is a matter of conjecture. I know that the distinguished Committee on Coast Defenses want $100,000,000, or about that sum. Both the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] and the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] are anxious to have the amount increased, I do not know how many millions. It is true that they say with great force the appropriations on account of the Navy have far outstripped those for coast defenses. I notice in the RECORD this morning that the speech made by my distinguished friend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], giving the view of the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], a former Secretary of War, holds the Committee on Appropriations responsible for the small appropriations made on that account. He talks of the neglect of the fortifications of the country, and seeks to charge the Committee on Appropriations with great neglect, implying, as the statement is published this morning, that the reason for it is that at another place the naval bill is considered by a committee specially charged with naval affairs and friendly to naval matters. It is pointed out that in the last ten or twelve years $95,000,000 more than was appropriated in the preceding corresponding period has been put into the Navy, and scarcely anything into fortifications. He attributes it to the fact that the naval bill, where it originates in the other House, is in the hands of its friends, while the fortifications bill, originating in the Committee on Appropriations elsewhere, and also considered by the Committee on Appropriations on this side, has been kept down to a very small figure. That is true to a certain extent.

The result is that $296,000,000 has gone to the Navy since 1867 and a mere bagatelle to fortifications. Senators come with great force and say that that is not right. The highest naval officers, as shown to-day by the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], say we have gone too far with the Navy. They are not unfriendly to the Navy. The brightest man in the Navy, I think, Admiral Walker, says of these appropriations, looking to the proper defense of the country, looking to our own welfare, that the appropriations for the coast defenses now ought to be 60 per cent as against 40 per cent for the Navy, because the Navy has outstripped the land fortifications. Yet it is proposed in this bill not only to do what we have done in the last four or five years, but to go way beyond it, to double the amount. I say there is no reason for it.

When we reach the fortifications bill we shall be confronted by the very fact I have stated. It is not, however, accurate, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has stated to the Senate, that it is, because of the action of the Appropriations Committee. I have had the honor for the last twelve years to serve upon the Committee on Appropriations, and nearly the whole time I have served on the subcommittees on the fortifications bill and the naval bill. I served upon that committee with a member of this body whose memory is dear to all of us and who in his day stood as high as any man in the Army, that great volunteer soldier, General Logan, whose whole heart was wrapped up in the proper defenses of this country, who believed that the real defense was by land. I labored with him, or under his direction, to help to create defenses for the country.

We appropriated money as rapidly as the condition of the Treasury would warrant, taking into consideration the knowledge of our officers and the wants of the country. It was a new field for them. The use of improved steel in the manufacture of guns of this class was scarcely known, and the army officers were slow in getting up provision for the defenses. They had not been able to assemble the machinery to make the guns. The Navy was in advance. They copied from people abroad and had better opportunities, and, I think, a little more knowledge and skill. It is only now, while I am talking, that for the first time, although we have given the Army the money, that the Army is in condition to make great guns. Only recently has there been completed the machinery, the immense lathes upon which you can place and turn a great 16-inch gun. But the time has arrived now when this branch of defense must be considered. Enlarged appropriations must be made, and my judgment is, as Admiral Walker says, that in the interest of the country the appropriations ought to be 60 per cent for coast defenses and 40 per cent for the Navy. But in the present condition of the Treasury it is utterly impossible to give both branches all they want, and it is for that reason that I am opposed to this appropriation.

Sir, I have stood here from the day I entered this Chamber perfectly convinced that the great leader of the Democratic party—I mean Samuel J. Tilden—was right when he advised his party associates and Congress not to be disturbed about the surplus in the Treasury, when we had from a hundred and fifty to two hundred million dollars, but to use it for defense and for aggression, and not to reduce the taxation to a point where we would be compelled to abandon proper defenses both by water and by land.

Now, when we are borrowing money, when there is no possibility, as it would appear, of putting more money into the Treasury by taxation, I am utterly opposed to running the country into debt and selling 4 per cent or 4½ per cent bonds for this purpose.

I would not vote for four battle ships now even if we had a surplus in the Treasury, because I do not believe that more than two are needed. I think the country would be benefited by giving our officers an opportunity to build two now and two next year. They are already building two under last year's appropriation. Let them go on and develop and improve them. That will be fast enough for the needs of the country.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to ask the Senator from Maryland one question before he sits down, because I regard it as somewhat important. If we add to the appropriations that have been mentioned—five hundred and twenty-odd millions—the amounts in the river and harbor bill as it is recommended, and the coast-defenses bill, we have in round numbers $700,000,000 of appropriations by this Congress.

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, no; I included all the bills.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator did include all the bills?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. Under the most favorable circumstances our revenues can not exceed $430,000,000. How are we going to meet the difference between $430,000,000 and $520,000,000?

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator knows it will be paid out of the money in the Treasury, and, as I stated a moment ago, I think it means the issuing of more bonds. I do not myself see any other way.

Mr. ALLEN. Our expenditures are that much greater than our income?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. Can we meet it in any other way than by issuing bonds?

Mr. GORMAN. I think not.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to delay the Senate, as a vote is to be taken to-night, but I now have the figures on which I made my estimate about the cost of these ships. It is based upon what is believed to be the actual cost of the two ships now being constructed at Newport News, the Kearsarge and the Kentucky. They are being constructed under the provisions of the act of last year, which provides that they shall be of about 10,000 tons displacement. Under that act the authorities have believed that a variation of something like a thousand tons or less could be made, so that each ship will be of about 10,800 tons. This year the limit as to size has been increased to 11,000 tons, and I suppose that the new ships, running in the direction of about 14,000 tons which the British build, will be near 12,000 tons. They might be under this provision.

The cost of the 10,000-ton ship, which is about 10,800 tons, is $5,297,000, including hull, armor, and armament. If the Secretary, under this added thousand-ton size, builds a ship of nearly 12,000 tons displacement, it will add about 10 per cent to the cost, and that will make each of the ships cost about $5,826,000, or the four together $23,295,000. So if under this increase of limit or suggestion as to size the ships are made of about 12,000 tons, say 11,800, the cost, reckoning 10 per cent for additional size, will be brought up to between twenty-three and twenty-four million dollars.

I regret that I did not at the time when the question was first asked have the figures at my fingers' ends so that I could give the reason for my statement.

Mr. SQUIRE. If the Senator from Maine will permit me, are we to understand that the reason for the proposed increase is because of the contemplated increase in tonnage, in displacement? Is it proposed to increase the number of tons displacement from 11,000, as proposed in the bill, to about 12,000?

Mr. HALE. I am quoting the two acts. Last year it said of about 10,000 tons. That was the provision of the act under which the two ships are being built, the Kentucky and the Kearsarge. This year the provision is for ships of about 11,000 tons. Any Secretary—I do not know what he will do—would be authorized under the extension of size of a thousand tons to add 10 per cent to the cost and make a ship of nearly 12,000 tons instead of 11,000 tons. Whether he will do that, of course, I do not know. But he clearly would be authorized to do it following the same rule that has been pursued before.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask the Senator from Maine, as he has been so kind as to give this information, which certainly is very important, to state for the information of Senators who are not so well informed whether the proposed decrease in the price of armor plate is going to affect the cost of building the ships?

Mr. HALE. That is a matter of conjecture for the future. It is not reckoned in this estimate.

Mr. SQUIRE. The Senator is not calculating on that?

Mr. HALE. I am not calculating on that, because nothing has yet been done on that subject.

Mr. SQUIRE. It seems to me very strange that there should be so much stress laid upon the fact that these officers should be prevented from remaining as officers in the Navy while acting in the employ of the Bethlehem Iron Company and the Carnegie Iron Company (the committee is trying to reduce the cost of the plates to the Government, and that is an incidental feature connected with their efforts to try to get a reduction in the price of the great armor plates), and yet at the same time when we come to look at this bill we find here an amount proposed to be appropriated so much larger than that which was used in paying for the great battle ships already constructed that have been built with a displacement of 11,400 tons.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is wrong in thinking the figures which have been given as to the Iowa represent anything like her cost. He is dealing with one class of work as compared with another. The expense of the Iowa altogether did not differ materially from the expense estimated for the Kearsarge and the Kentucky. The contract which was made for the hull itself and a portion of the armor would amount to the figures given by the Senator himself, but they do not represent in any way the entire cost of the ship.

Mr. SQUIRE. I am well aware that the armament is not included, but I understand precisely the same elements are included that are included in the present bill for the new ships; that is, the hull and machinery.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. SQUIRE. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. HALE. Yes. In keeping books in the Navy Department a portion of the armor, that along the belt connected with the ship itself, is reckoned as being included in the general limit as fixed without armament. That is a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. SQUIRE. Does the Senator from Maine mean to be understood as saying that in the present bill the armor is included in the cost and that the armor is not included in the cost of the ships named in the table from which I quoted, relating to the cost; that there is a difference?

Mr. HALE. I do not know exactly what the Senator has got, because I have not seen his figures. In the case of the Kentucky and the Kearsarge there is a part of the armor, the belt part of the armor, not relating to the turrets, the decks, or anything of that kind. The turrets and all those things are reckoned by the Department as being within the limit, which was last year $4,000,000 and this year $3,700,000. So, if the Senator will get from the Department the entire figures on the cost of the Iowa—the hull, the machinery, the armor, and the armament in the aggregate—he will find it does not differ materially from the cost of the Kentucky and the Kearsarge. My impression is that the Iowa cost more than the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, because the bidding was so keen for the Kentucky and the Kearsarge that the Department got an advantage of several hundred thousand dollars over and above the old contracts for the other ships. I think the Senator will find that the Iowa, all ready for commission, cost more money than it will take to finish the Kentucky and the Kearsarge.

Mr. SQUIRE. Then, too, I observe that the Kentucky and the Kearsarge each has a displacement of 11,525 tons.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Washington allow me to ask a question of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SQUIRE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I will yield directly to the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE], and through him to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], and through him to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair supposed that the Senator from Maine had concluded, and therefore recognized the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. No; I was only asking a question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would not venture to interrupt the Senator from Maine, and when he took his seat I thought I might interrupt the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE], who is always courteous, and supposed I might ask a question of the Senator from Maryland, and at the proper time, when convenient to the Senator, I shall ask it.

Mr. HALE. I want to get through first with the Senator from Washington.

Mr. CHANDLER. What are the prospects in that direction? [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. The Senator must ask the Senator from Washington, and not me.

Mr. SQUIRE. I do not quite understand the imputation of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope the Senator from Washington will continue his explanation.

Mr. SQUIRE. I am not making any explanation. I desire to ascertain why it is that, with all this effort to reduce the cost of four battle ships, they will cost so much more than those which have been already constructed during the time when labor and material cost more. If we are studying economy, why are we asked to appropriate so much money? Why appropriate nearly $3,000,000 more than the other four ships cost, having an equal displacement?

Mr. ALLISON. That is a pertinent question.

Mr. HALE. That is a pertinent question; and the only answer to it is that they do not cost more.

Mr. SQUIRE. That is a conflicting statement with the statement I have received from the Navy Department.

Mr. HALE. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. He has not all the figures. As I said, if he will get the entire cost under the bids for the armor and everything else of the Iowa or the Indiana, and I think of the Massachusetts, he will find, instead of their costing less than the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, that they will cost considerably more.

Mr. SQUIRE. I understand that.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator supposed differently.

Mr. SQUIRE. The Kentucky and the Kearsarge are still more to the point and illustrative of the fact, because they were contracted for at still less cost and their displacements are to be still greater than that of the Iowa.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator understand, or have I not made myself clear to him, that in making my figures the aggregate cost will be between twenty-three and twenty-four million dollars?

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask the Senator from Maine if he meant that the proposed cost of the construction of the ships contemplated in this bill would include the armor, and if I am to understand him to answer definitely that it would?

Mr. HALE. Everything is included.

Mr. SQUIRE. If that is a fact, it is all right. It may be that the armor was not included in the cost of the other ships in the figures I have quoted.

Mr. HALE. I say I do not know what figures the Senator has. I have not seen them. When you come to the Iowa and other ships I have no doubt the Senator will find they cost more.

Mr. SQUIRE. That is sufficient. Now I understand the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think I shall ask anything of the Senator from Maine just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HALE. I think I shall yield the floor generally, for I should like to get a vote, but I wish to hear from the Senator from New Hampshire first.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think I ought to speak, because what I wish to say is right to the point of the amendment. The question is as to four battle ships or two battle ships. I am free to say that if we could get an appropriation into this bill for a considerable number of torpedo gunboats, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats I should be willing to see a delay in authorizing two of the battle ships. I should be glad, in other words, to see the amendment of the Senator from Maryland adopted. I do not think it is absolutely necessary to our progress in the construction of battle ships that we should authorize four at this time. There are already authorized the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, but the contracts for the armor are not yet made. The advertisements are out, the contracts will shortly be awarded, and the Bethlehem Company and Carnegie, Phipps & Co. will commence the construction of the armor for those two ships.

If each concern has a contract, it will have about a million and a half dollars' worth of armor to make. If we authorize two more battle ships, the Secretary of the Navy will be able in the next six or nine months to award contracts of about a million and a half dollars more to each establishment, and that work, I think, is about all that can be done within the next year or year and a half. So it is quite possible that we shall not expedite the construction of the four battle ships by authorizing them now. Possibly, if we authorize two now and two next year we shall get all four constructed quite as soon as if we authorize all four at this time.

Therefore I should like to substitute, if the sentiment of the Senate is in favor of only two battle ships, for the other two battle ships some torpedo boats. If we leave out the battle ships, we shall save from ten to twelve million dollars; that is, we shall omit that appropriation from this bill, and to that extent relieve the struggling mind of the Senator from Maryland. This reduction would give us an opportunity to build some torpedo boats, and in torpedo boats the United States is deficient. I do not mean small torpedo boats; I mean large torpedo gunboats.

Mr. HALE. Swift boats.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very swift and very large. We have only one, the Cushing, but in foreign navies it is deemed very essential to have a large number of torpedo boats for the purpose of destroying battle ships. Now, we have gone on fairly well in building battle ships and in authorizing battle ships, but we have not made sufficient progress in the construction of battle-ship destroyers; and Senators well understand that the principle of war is that we not only want to design ships to fight the enemy, but methods of destroying the great ships of the enemy. I should myself be very willing, speaking personally—not for the committee, nor so far as I know for any other Senator—to substitute for the ten or twelve million dollars, which we shall save, the construction of 30 torpedo boats. I shall send to the desk an amendment, which I shall be glad to move—and I call the attention of the Senator from Maryland especially to it—if the rules of the Senate will allow me to do so, in case we are to now authorize but two battle ships in stead of four.

Mr. ALDRICH. Do I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to say we can not do both? Why not build the torpedo boats and also authorize the building of the battle ships?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senate can do that if it pleases, but, assuming the Senate to be in an economical frame of mind and to have a proper desire to limit these appropriations, I should like in place of the $11,000,000 for two battle ships to substitute between three and four million dollars for torpedo-boat destroyers and torpedo gunboats. I ask that the amendment be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, on page 50, line 25, and on page 51, lines 1 to middle of line 4, and insert the words:

Torpedo gunboats and torpedo-boat destroyers with a minimum speed of 30 knots and torpedo boats with a minimum speed of 26 knots, 30 in number, to cost in all, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $4,500,000.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator make the total number 30?

Mr. CHANDLER. Thirty in all. I call the attention of the Senator and of all who are within hearing of my voice to the fact that the House provides that these torpedo boats shall have a maximum speed, that is, that they shall not go faster than 30 knots an hour. I suppose that really we ought to be willing to have them go as fast as they can go, and the limitation ought to be a minimum limitation—that a gunboat shall not have less than a certain amount of speed, and that it may go as much faster as the makers can make it go.

But this amendment is subject to a point of order. The inquiry I wished to make of the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Maryland was whether by unanimous consent or in any other way we can have a consideration of the question of authorizing now instead of 3 or 4 or 6 torpedo boats at least 30 of this class of vessels. I have in my hand a letter written to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] by Mr. W. H. Jaques, which I shall read, on this subject.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me a moment on that matter of limitation?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The provision in the House bill was for five torpedo boats to have a maximum speed of not less than 26 knots, and the Committee on Appropriations, believing that these torpedo boats, should be larger than that and should have a greater speed, raised the limit, if I may use the expression—

Mr. CHANDLER. Raised the maximum.

Mr. HALE. Raised the maximum to 30 knots. I should be in favor of making it even 32 knots, because the English are building, or attempting to build—in fact, I think they have already launched—some torpedo boats which make 32 knots. The Committee on Appropriations was endeavoring to get a better class of boats than is provided for in the bill as it came from the House.

In answer to the point of the Senator as to a maximum speed, I should not quite want to go to the extent of saying that if these torpedo boats did not have as much as 30 or 32 knots the Government should not take them, because I do not know whether that would be feasible.

Mr. CHANDLER. What does the term "maximum" mean as a matter of law in this bill?

Mr. HALE. It means that the Secretary of the Navy, in spending this money, shall seek to get that speed if it is possible.

Mr. CHANDLER. The legal construction is that he is to see to it that the vessels shall not go any faster than the rate of speed named.

Mr. HALE. There is no danger of that.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the legal construction.

Mr. HALE. No; there is no danger but that the Secretary will get all the speed he can. I have no doubt that the House of Representatives felt that it was not safe to say that the boats should not be built if they do not attain 26 or 30 knots, but it is an indication to the Secretary that he should endeavor to get 30 or 32 knot torpedo boats.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course it is open to the suggestion that "maximum" means "minimum," and frequently in statutes the courts give construction to language making it entirely the opposite of what the language says. But I have never been able to do that myself.

The Committee on Appropriations have gone in the right direction so far as they have gone, but they have not gone far enough. We ought to build more of these boats.

Now, I will read the letter to which I referred:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 8, 1896.

SIR: Replying to your inquiries in connection with the provision of an adequate torpedo flotilla, if it is to be the policy of our Government to employ torpedo boats as one of the units of defense they should be provided by the hundred and simple efficient requirements demanded, leaving the details to private builders. By this method most excellent results will be obtained, as far as time, price, and efficiency are concerned. A contract for fifty or a hundred would give the country something more than a few unsatisfactory experiments, which more than describes our present torpedo-boat force.

The present combined torpedo flotilla of Great Britain, France, Russia, and Germany exceeds a thousand of the various types. Experiment and service in foreign countries have demonstrated the mistake of building these craft too small and of too low speed. England, particularly, has made a most radical departure, and there is every evidence that she will build no more torpedo boats of less than three or four hundred tons.

While these craft have received various names, such as torpedo gunboats, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats of various classes, they are provided for the purpose of destroying ships with torpedoes, and the development in size and powers of offense and defense is a very natural one.

Great Britain has recently added to her navy 42 torpedo boats, distinguished by the name of torpedo-boat destroyers, of a tonnage of from 260 to 300, the majority of which have a speed of from 28 to 30 knots. These torpedo craft have a horsepower of from 3,000 to 4,000, and their average cost was about $38,000 (about $190,000), $15,000 of which is for hull, including mast and rigging, $22,000 for propelling auxiliary machinery, including air-compressing machinery, and $1,000 for their rapid-fire batteries.

The latest first-class torpedo boats built by Great Britain have a displacement of 180 tons, horsepower 2,000, and speed of 26 knots, and were built at an average cost of $15,000 (about $75,000).

For your further information I append an extract from the London Times, giving a description of the fastest torpedo boat in the world, the torpedo-boat destroyer Sokol, built by Yarrow, of England, for the Russian Government.

Yours, truly,

HON. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY,
United States Senate.

W. H. JAQUES.

We have not any of this class of vessels.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I think we have consumed the maximum time we ought to consume to-day, and if the Senator will allow me, I desire to submit a motion.

Mr. SQUIRE. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HILL. That will lead to further debate.

Mr. SQUIRE. I should like to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that for the information of the Senate and for my own I should be glad to have him explain what these torpedo boats are to take the place of. Are we to have only two battle ships if the torpedo boats are to be constructed, according to the amendment of the Senator, or are we to have three? I do not quite understand him. I think his amendment ought to be printed for the information of the Senate, and then lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

Mr. HILL. Do I understand the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has yielded the floor?

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator from New York that I propose in a few minutes to give way for a motion for an executive session. There are certain Senators who want an executive session, and I hope, therefore, the Senator will not move to adjourn.

Mr. HILL. It is a little late, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator to withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose to ask the Senate to remain longer in session this evening upon this bill. All the amendments, as I understand, that have been submitted to it are to be printed, so that we shall know to-morrow what is before the Senate. I shall endeavor to-morrow, if sustained by the Senate, to get a vote at as early an hour as possible on the passage of the bill. I give notice now that unless the bill shall be concluded by 6 o'clock to-morrow evening, or at some time before that, I shall ask that the Senate have an evening session to-morrow in order to finish the bill. Of course I am in the hands of the Senate.

Let me say now to the Senator from New York—for that is a matter for him to decide—that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] desires an executive session instead of an adjournment. I leave that between the Senator from New York and the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from New York will withhold his motion to adjourn, so that we may have an executive session.

Mr. LODGE. I also ask for an executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York withdraw his motion for that purpose?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for an order to print my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CHANDLER. In addition to being printed in the RECORD, I also desire it to be printed in regular form as a proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. QUAY. Before the order is made, I desire to make a point of order that the torpedo boats provided for in the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire are not estimated for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has not yet been offered, but notice of the amendment has been given. The point of order, the Chair understands, is reserved by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 1, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 30, 1896.

ASSISTANT SURGEONS IN THE NAVY.

William M. Wheeler, a citizen of New York, and Robert S. Blakeman, a citizen of Connecticut, to be assistant surgeons in the Navy, to fill vacancies existing in that grade.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

P. A. Engineer Albert B. Willits, to be a chief engineer in the Navy, from the 28th of March, 1896 (subject to the examinations required by law), vice Chief Engineer Albert W. Morley, retired.

Surg. William G. Farwell, to be a medical inspector in the Navy, from the 28th of February, 1896, vice Medical Inspector Thomas N. Penrose, promoted.

P. A. Surg. James D. Gatewood, to be a surgeon in the Navy, from the 28th of February, 1896, vice Surg. William G. Farwell, promoted.

Surg. John C. Wise, to be a medical inspector in the Navy, from the 20th of March, 1896, vice Medical Inspector Edward Kershner, dismissed.

P. A. Surg. Oliver Diehl, to be a surgeon in the Navy, from the 20th of March, 1896, vice Surg. John C. Wise, promoted.

PROMOTION IN THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Samuel A. W. Patterson, of Pennsylvania, to be a third lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States.

POSTMASTER.

Patrick H. McGrath, to be postmaster at Ronceverte, in the county of Greenbrier and State of West Virginia, in the place of Robert C. Rodes, deceased.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 30, 1896.

CONSUL.

R. Hughs Long, of Alabama, to be consul of the United States at Nogales, Mexico.

APPOINTMENT IN THE ARMY.

Rev. Sewell N. Pilchard, of Delaware, to be post chaplain.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Caleb P. Organ, of Cheyenne, Wyo., to be receiver of public moneys at Cheyenne, Wyo.

INDIAN AGENT.

Luke C. Hays, of Oacoma, S. Dak., to be agent for the Indians of the Fort Belknap Agency, in Montana.

POSTMASTERS.

John J. Whetton, to be postmaster at Highlandville, in the county of Norfolk and State of Massachusetts.

Martin F. Burns, to be postmaster at Wollaston, in the county of Norfolk and State of Massachusetts.

T. Fitz Hugh, to be postmaster at Kansas City, in the county of Wyandotte and State of Kansas.

Herman Schulmerich, to be postmaster at Hillsboro, in the county of Washington and State of Oregon.

Matthew F. Conroy, to be postmaster at Franklin, in the county of Norfolk and State of Massachusetts.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 30, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—RATLIFF VS. WILLIAMS.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit at this time a privileged report from the Committee on Elections No. 3.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire immediate action? Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I do, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions of the Committee on Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That W. P. Ratliff was not elected a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That J. S. Williams was duly elected a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Mississippi and is entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION—NEWMAN VS. SPENCER.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I desire to submit another report from the Committee on Elections No. 3. It is similar to the preceding report.

I ask that the resolutions be read, as it is not necessary to have the report read in these cases.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That A. M. Newman was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of the State of Mississippi and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That J. G. Spencer was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of the State of Mississippi and is entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION—BROWN VS. ALLEN.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. There is another report, Mr. Speaker, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, on which I desire action, and I ask that the resolutions be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John A. Brown was not elected a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress from the First Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That John M. Allen was duly elected a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress from the First Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM GROSE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 515) granting a pension to William Grose.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Grose, of Newcastle, Henry County, Ind., late a brigadier-general of the United States Volunteers in the Union Army, at the rate of $100 per month, said pension to be in lieu of that which he now receives.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend the adoption of the following amendment: In line 8, strike out the words "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five"; so that it will read "at the rate of $75 per month."

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DIRECTORS DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. PAYNE and Mr. SAYERS as House directors for the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the bill (S. 296) for the relief of William H. Atkins, formerly commissary sergeant, United States Army, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Claims.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to further consider the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

Mr. BAILEY. Before proceeding, Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire how much time has been used by the respective sides?

Mr. HENDERSON. As I have kept the account of time, we have used one hundred and seventy-six minutes and the opposition has used one hundred and fifty-seven minutes. I have not compared notes with the Chair, but think that is about correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that on the theory that the debate should run five hours longer, the gentleman from Iowa would be entitled to two hours and twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] to forty minutes, and the gentleman from Texas to one hour and fifty-nine minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield forty minutes to my friend from Missouri, Judge DE ARMOND.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the question before the House is one of importance, and I regret that pressure of other affairs has prevented my giving that attention to the study of it which one ought to bestow before occupying the time of the House upon it. I know there are other gentlemen desiring to speak who, I have reason to believe, are better qualified than I to inform the House with regard to the merits and demerits of the pending measure. I shall, therefore, endeavor to hurry through what I have to say, and then give way to others.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that naturally the first inquiry is with reference to the real, legitimate purpose of a bankrupt law.

Without going into that question in detail, I will content myself with saying it is my conclusion, from such investigation as I have given the subject, that the only legitimate object of such legislation is the relief of insolvent debtors. About this central idea all just legislation upon this subject ought to cluster. There are enough laws for the collection of debts, every State in the Union having its own code. Common observation and common experience alike teach us that the creditor, so far as the laws go, is amply provided with remedies. The person who needs the benefit of a bankruptcy law, if there be occasion for it at all, is the person who is in the unfortunate condition of being so involved in debt that without the aid of such a law he can not get out and start again in the race of life upon something like equal footing with other persons engaged in the same pursuits in which he would engage.

Now, Mr. Chairman, without meaning at all to criticize the purpose of any gentleman who favors this bill or who has had a hand in drafting it, I believe that the bill did not spring into existence primarily on account of a desire to relieve insolvent debtors.

What is the history of this proposed legislation? The present bill is fashioned on the model of the Torrey bill, with some slight changes and modifications. How did the Torrey bill originate? Whence did it come? What brought it into being? What projected it into former Congresses, and what has brought it into this Congress?

The report itself states—for gentlemen are frank about these matters—that this bill was drawn in consequence of action taken by numerous commercial bodies and boards of trade throughout this country.

It might be stated further that the draftsman of the Torrey bill did not, as a humanitarian, looking after the good of human kind solely and exclusively, prepare that bill, or aid, so far as he aided in the make-up of the bill now under consideration. It is a fact, however, that the bill was prepared by that gentleman as an attorney prepares bills, contracts, and other papers for a client; and his clients were and are the wholesale men who are spoken of as having taken action in commercial congresses and boards of trade. Without going further on this line, it is enough to say that the bill was prepared by the agent of creditors, and naturally enough, without impeaching the motives of anybody, and using harsh language toward nobody—naturally enough, it was prepared to promote and conserve and advance the rights and interests of that particular class.

That this is true a very cursory examination of the bill itself will prove. It contains numerous provisions hedging in and guarding from the insolvent debtor the only boon that can possibly reach him—a discharge from the debts which he can not pay. It is difficult, very difficult, for the debtor to obtain his discharge if any creditor chooses to stand in his way. He goes in under suspicion. His every act, his every omission, his conduct clear through the proceeding and antecedent to it, all are subject to the closest examination, the most searching scrutiny, the most minute precautionary devices, to make it certain that by no chance or accident can he get the one thing, the only thing, which can be brought to him by this kind of legislation, unless he be clearly and undoubtedly entitled to it, namely, his discharge.

There is nothing thrown about the creditor in the way of restrictions and hamperings. A creditor animated by bad motives, maliciously inclined, bent upon the destruction of the unfortunate debtor, may move upon him without finding aught of terror in the law, without the dread of any loss or punishment, unless he violates what amount to ordinary criminal statutes.

The debtor is required to attend creditors' meetings and disclose everything within his information, for whose benefit? For the benefit of the creditor. If it be thought that he fraudulently conceals anything, fails in anything, is not vigilant about everything for the benefit of the creditor, he is denied a discharge; but if the creditor, animated by bad motives, seeking the ruin of the debtor, or needlessly or recklessly throws him into bankruptcy, pursues him relentlessly, causelessly, there is no penalty, no reparation provided. A man once started into bankruptcy upon a petition filed by his creditors, it is true, is given the form, the husks, of an inquiry into the question of whether or not he should be adjudged a bankrupt; but what is there left for him in that inquiry? A petition once filed against him, proceedings in bankruptcy begun against him, the bad news being spread abroad in his own neighborhood and as far as his name and his interests and acquaintance shall extend, there is nothing substantial left for him except the relief which may come from a discharge by a court of bankruptcy.

What real interest can he have in battling against Fate, without the common charity of a jury trial even, unless he is swift to demand and insist upon it? If he should defeat the petitioning creditors, will that rehabilitate his shattered credit; will that put him on his feet again? Will that give him his old position as a reputable trader, presumed to be able to pay his debts? By no means. The very act of saying, in the creditors' petition that he is insolvent, makes him insolvent. The charge makes fact that which is charged. If, animated by pride, the debtor successfully resists the effort to declare him a bankrupt, what does he get for the inevitable loss of credit, for a ruined business? Nothing. There is no responsibility resting upon any creditor who may have assailed him, no matter how wantonly or viciously.

There is no provision made in the bill for paying the debtor for making what he can for the creditor; not even witness fees are provided for him. Moreover, he is subject to arrest. But it is provided that he shall not be imprisoned. If it is charged by the creditor that the debtor is going from his present place of residence to some other, is going out of the district, no matter what his intentions or necessities, and that the effect of such removal may be to interfere with the getting out of the wreck all that might otherwise be realized, then the unfortunate debtor may be arrested, or "detained," as expressed in the bill. What is the meaning of all this? Probably that you shall not throw the victim into jail with common criminals, but that he is to be more decently deprived of his liberty. The heavy hand of the law shall be upon him, however; he can not go and come as other men go and come. He must languish under the control of an officer, under guard by an officer, merely because some omnipotent creditor concludes that by putting the screws on a little tighter and interfering with the helpless debtor's personal liberty, in addition to interfering with all his other rights, the creditor may fare a little better.

And then, after the discharge in bankruptcy, after a showing which the court thinks entitles the insolvent to an acquittance, after he has walked out of the bankruptcy court with his debts obliterated by judgment of the court and no longer a burden upon him, with some promise in life for him—even then for two years he is liable to be thrown back into the slough of despair by means of the vague affidavit of any creditor, his discharge set aside, and the whole thing reopened, so far as he is concerned.

Another thing. The definitions in this bill, as gentlemen will see who look at them, are something extraordinary. Ordinarily in definitions the usual meanings are given to words. But here extraordinary meanings are given to some of the words used. When you read one of these particular words in the body of the bill it does not impart to you the wonderful meanings actually crowded into it in the dictionary part of the bill. Turning to the dictionary section, you will find words perverted into meaning what they never meant before and will never again mean.

Take almost any one of these definitions, and you will find this to be the case.

Here is the word "transfer," for instance; an ordinary word, but an extraordinary meaning is given to it.

Transfer shall include the sale and every other and different mode of disposing of or parting with property, or the possession of property, absolutely or conditionally, as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift, or security, and the creation of a lien on property by any means other than by compulsory process prosecuted in good faith.

"Transfer" means all that. Why give it so extraordinary a meaning? I do not even suggest that the committee in giving their sanction to these definitions have any thought or purpose of concealing the very broad meaning that is given to the words. But I say it is fair to infer that the man who drafted the bill originally, the man who acted for the wholesale dealers who desired the bill to be drawn up and now wish it to be passed, gave these words their sweeping scope and hidden power for a purpose. The purpose will be apparent to anyone who will analyze and consider them.

Mr. Chairman, if the object is to relieve the insolvent debtor, then the collection of debt is merely an incident. That kind of bankrupt legislation I favor. That kind I believe is embodied in the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. If the object be the collection of debt, however—if that is the object of bankruptcy legislation—then the bill submitted by the committee will admirably meet the expectations of those who designed it. Why should the object and the design of the law be to aid persons in the collection of debt or to punish persons for fraudulent practices? All these things are provided for in existing laws.

The only just ground for any bankrupt bill is to be found in the sad state of honest but insolvent debtors. Such legislation should be designed to relieve persons who can not relieve themselves; not necessarily or primarily to distribute their estates, not to divide the property of the insolvents, but to give them relief. If that be the object, why is it at all necessary or proper that the estate of a person who desires to be relieved as a bankrupt shall be administered in the bankrupt court? Why would it not be ample, more simple, surer, and better if the law should provide that when the estate of the insolvent which is subject to the provisions of the law, the property of the insolvent not exempted to him by the laws of the State in which he lives, has been distributed, when he has no property left which the law can reach, then he shall be permitted to go into the bankrupt court and ask for the only thing of value to him that such a court ever can give him, a discharge in bankruptcy, relief from the burden of unpaid debts? If that be the proper object, the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas will secure it. If that substitute, which provides for voluntary bankruptcy proceedings in the Federal courts, after distribution of the insolvent estate through the State courts, and is to be in existence two years only—if that substitute be accepted, then all this machinery about the bankrupt court can be laid aside as totally unnecessary.

Take a man in any State—I do not care where—who is tired of struggling with the adversities of life and endeavoring to meet his obligations. When in the way provided in that State, whatever it may be—and if the laws of a State are good enough for the men who live in it, the people who live elsewhere have no very great reason to find fault with them—when in the way provided by the laws of his State he disposes of his property, then open the doors of your bankrupt court to him for a short though sufficient time. Let him present his petition asking for a discharge in bankruptcy, the only thing he seeks, the only thing that can be of value to him. Then comes up the whole question of the honesty of his transactions and of the facts of the case, special and general. The creditors would be notified, as the substitute provides. They would be heard, and before the insolvent could be discharged it would be incumbent upon him to show to the satisfaction of the court that he was in the condition of a man without property, yet having debts; an honest man burdened with debts and unable to pay them.

Upon showing satisfactorily that his transactions had been open and honest, that he was an honest but unfortunate man whose misfortunes were tying him down and destroying his usefulness in the community, he would be entitled to his discharge, and he would get it. If he did not show that, he would fail to get a discharge. Now, where does the creditor lose a solitary right under such a bankrupt law, under such a proceeding? The courts are open to him as before. All the laws that now exist in relation to the collection of debt are in full force and effect. Not a single law now existing in any part of the Union would be stayed or interfered with. Not a solitary right which the creditor had, either by law or by the contract with his debtor, would be in the slightest degree interfered with. The debtor would simply say: "I have nothing more with which to pay; I have acted honestly, and I now ask relief from the burden of these debts which still hang over me and shadow all my prospects in life."

On that proposition the creditor would be heard. Upon that proposition, upon every issue that could fairly and reasonably arise in order to determine the actual facts—the justice, the honesty, the equity of the entire proceeding—the creditor would be heard. What wrong would be done? If the debtor could not show that he had so conducted himself and that his property had been so administered, or so lost and dissipated, as to leave nothing with which to pay his debts, except what might be exempted by the law—if he could not show that he would not get a discharge from any obligation whatsoever. The creditor would have lost nothing. His debt would still remain unpaid; the debtor would still be under the ban of the law, would still be barred in large part from the enterprises that are open to men not weighed down by debt. On the other hand, if the debtor should show that he had acted honestly and that he had nothing more with which to pay, who could deny to him the discharge to which he would be entitled?

Another thing. This course of procedure would secure the distribution of the estates of insolvent debtors at their own homes, under the direction and supervision of officers elected by the people of the debtor's community. But it is said that under this bill the referee is carried to the home of the insolvent, that a referee is to be appointed for each county. But mark the qualifications of the referee. He is not bound to be a lawyer; he is not bound to have any special qualifications whatever. It is enough if he be acceptable to the judge who appoints him. The judge has the absolute and the complete right to appoint anybody referee, without regard to qualifications.

Now, I have been always opposed to this one-man power. I believe that every time we can take a step toward enabling the people in any particular locality, or generally, to select, by their own votes, those who are to administer the laws, we are traveling in the right direction, and that whenever, in place of requiring officers, great or small, to be elected by the people, we provide that they shall be appointed by some one man, or by any number of men, we are traveling in the wrong direction.

There is a contention here that this bill will relieve the insolvent debtor from the great danger and hardship of his present situation. It is said that now the avaricious creditor, having the courts open to him, may seize the debtor's property, may force him to ruin, and that there is no relief for the debtor, no discharge for him.

Mr. Chairman, the creditor who merely brings suit against the debtor does not hamper him in the conduct of his business beyond the legitimate, natural, ordinary effect of that suit. The creditor who resorts to the extraordinary process of attachment is compelled to give bond for the indemnity and protection of the debtor in case he should fail to make good his attachment.

It is said that under this bill the property may be retained by the debtor until he is actually adjudged a bankrupt. How speedily after the filing of the petition, with one referee in each county, that adjudication might be reached we can guess. But in the meantime it is in the power of the creditor to have the property taken out of the possession of the debtor, not on the ground exclusively that the debtor is doing anything dishonest or dishonorable, but on the ground that he is not giving to it that care and attention which the creditor thinks may prevent it from sinking in value or deteriorating. In other words, it practically amounts to this—that the creditor can have the property of the debtor taken from his possession the very day he files the petition.

But the creditor, it is said, gives bond to be approved by the court; gives this bond before the debtor's property is seized. Yes; but the conditions of that bond are blank. There is no provision for indemnifying the debtor against the loss he may suffer by having the property taken out of his hands, as in the case of an attachment. The damages which he might recover would be purely nominal, speculative, upon paper. "Creditor," too, according to the dictionary embraced in this bill, is made to mean not only the creditor himself, but also his agent, his attorney, anybody assuming to represent him. Therefore, when the bill speaks of affidavits to be made by the creditor, it necessarily includes affidavits which may be made upon information solely. A claim sent to an attorney (in a distant State probably) can afford the basis for this proceeding to throw a man into bankruptcy, by virtue of an affidavit by that attorney, based solely on information, which itself would not be evidence. Wherever in this bill you read "creditor" you are to understand the word as meaning the attorney of the creditor, the agent of the creditor, the representative of the creditor.

On every page of the bill will be found evidence that by this measure the thrifty creditor is endeavoring to secure satisfactory machinery for administering upon the estates of unfortunate debtors, not for the purpose of relieving them and putting them upon their feet again, but for the purpose of getting out of an estate more, if possible, than he could get out of it under the laws of the land, in view when the indebtedness accrued.

The debtor is hampered in his freedom of movement. He is compelled to attend when and where he may be directed to attend. Although he may have absolutely nothing at stake, may be absolutely faultless in everything, he must stand guard, without pay, for the benefit of the creditor.

Another thing is contended here—that preferences, of and in themselves, are essentially and inevitably wrong. I deny that. The common experience of every man, if he will simply consult his own experience, will convince him of the fact that there are many times in the lives of both the fortunate and the unfortunate when it is not only not wrong but is absolutely right to make discriminations and grant preferences. Take the case of a man who lends to the debtor in his hour of peril the money or supplies him with the property which tides him over a crisis or possibly many crises; sustains him in his business for weeks or months or even years. The friend thus advances his money or parts with his property either from lack of knowledge of the true situation of the debtor's affairs or, knowing the situation, from his willingness to run the hazard and depend upon the honesty of the debtor, in order to give him a chance to live.

Now, then, is the debtor necessarily to be denounced as guilty of wrong and thrown into bankruptcy because, yielding to every dictate of humanity, respecting every principle of honor, acting as every man should act, he endeavors when the crash is about to come, when the inevitable fall is at hand, to protect him who was his friend in his extremity, to preserve from ruin so far as he can the man who undertook to stay the ruin that threatened himself, until staying it ceased to be possible? Yet the granting of a preference—for months back, even—is made a reason or excuse for forcing a man into bankruptcy.

Why should a man be thrown into bankruptcy unwillingly? What is the reason for it? It is a creditor's reason and no other. Then should the law be made to collect debts or to aid in the collection of debts? That is the question that arises upon every proposition for involuntary bankruptcy. Involuntary bankruptcy simply implies or means that the insolvent himself does not ask for relief; that the insolvent himself, with the burden of his debts upon him, animated by hope—knowing possibly better the probable outcome of his affairs than anyone who has given them less attention and has less knowledge of them—believes that he can get through, struggles against adverse circumstances, hoping that somehow relief may come. At all events, the man thrown into involuntary bankruptcy is the man who, of his own volition, does not ask, declines the aid or relief which may or may not come from such a proceeding; does not ask the boon of any bankruptcy law under the sun; who shuns as a stigma the stamp of "bankrupt."

That being true (and it must be true), it is further incontestably true that what a man will not ask for, will not take when it is offered to him, is that which he does not desire; and if he is forced to submit, he is an unwilling victim. So, then, the bankruptcy law is not made for that class of people.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question: Does the gentleman think that the object of the bankrupt law is simply for the benefit of the debtor class?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will answer that question with pleasure. I think the whole discussion of this matter might, and ought perhaps, justly to turn on this point. I think the principal, the sole just object of a bankrupt law should be the relief of the insolvent debtor, and that all other things in connection with it should be incidental and subordinate to that one consideration.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that the creditor is oftentimes as unfortunate as the debtor?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do recognize that exceptional fact. But the gentleman should remember that this is not a proposition to enable the debtor to force bankruptcy upon the creditor. The creditors are not asking to be relieved from the burden of debt resting heavily upon them. They are not asking to be set abroad again in the world with bright skies above them and bright prospects before them. They are not asking that species of relief.

Recollect that the one good thing which a bankruptcy law alone can bring, and upon which alone it can be defended, is the relief of the insolvent from the burdens of obligations which he can not meet. Of course no wrong should be done to the creditor, and it is not asked by me that the debtor should escape any just obligations that he is able to meet. I repeat what I said before, that by a voluntary bankruptcy law, such as the Bailey substitute, no rights are taken from the creditor. The creditor loses nothing by such a law. But the involuntary feature of the law is solely for the benefit of the creditor, and the incident, not the purpose of it, is to grant a release to a man who does not ask it and does not want it; a man who prefers struggling with the present condition of things—prefers to endure the ills he has rather than fly to those he knows not of.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit me to ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Are you in favor of a voluntary bankruptcy law?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I am, sir; as I have been stating. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the condition of the country is such that a great many men whose misfortunes are not really of their own making, who are totally free from all taint of fraud in their transactions, are less useful to the community, to themselves, to their families, to the nation, than they would be if they could have a release from that from which they can not otherwise escape—the impeding, threatening, enduring blight of debt beyond their ability to meet, debts they can not pay.

But relief to those who ask it and merit it need not be coupled with the power to put a man unwillingly through a court of bankruptcy to make a bankrupt of him who can not pay at once what he may owe. There is a marked distinction between relieving insolvents and making bankrupts.

But, Mr. Chairman, another thing. I believe one effect of the legislation proposed will be this: The debtor, a tradesman, a retail dealer, wishing to escape bankruptcy, as many, indeed most, men do, will be compelled in order to escape that condition to put himself into the hands and under the protection of one or two wholesale men powerful enough in his judgment to carry him along and protect him and themselves. Being under their protection he must buy his goods from them. He dare not go elsewhere to buy. Carried by men having power at any moment to throw him into the bankrupt court, he dare not take his trade anywhere else for fear of provoking their wrath. The effect upon the community of such a condition can not be beneficial. The result is inevitable, but the extent of injury we can hardly contemplate or fairly measure. The trader thus situated will not only be compelled to confine his purchases to one or two houses but he will be compelled to buy at their own prices; the world of competition will be absolutely closed to him. Forced to buy from his guardians at their own prices, he will be also compelled to sell at corresponding prices, so that his misfortunes and their extortion will be visited upon the community at large.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri, does he not think that if a voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy law were in force there would be very few cases of involuntary bankruptcy?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman sufficient time to answer the question.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will answer the question of my friend from Ohio.

Mr. SKINNER. I should like to ask a question in connection with the question asked by the gentleman from Ohio. I want to ask if you do not believe that it would be more oppressive for the debtor class when a vigilant creditor, by attacking and assailing the debtor, obtains a first lien, than it would be to have an involuntary proceeding in bankruptcy, when the moving creditor would then only get an equitable proportion of the assets?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think not. I have already discussed that question. I will answer the question of my friend from Ohio [Mr. WATSON]. I think, Mr. Chairman, that whether there would be many or few proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy, is not really the question before us; we can but guess whether the proceedings would be few or many. If they should happen to be few, still the law ought to be cleared of the harsh provisions for involuntary bankruptcy. For then they would be practically useless, and the best that could be said for such a law would be that it would do but little harm. Upon the other hand, if such proceedings should be many, the evil would be increased in proportion. [Applause.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I think that a mistake has been made in the computation of the time. I am informed that I had at the beginning of the speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] one hour and thirty-eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had one hour and fifty-nine minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood that to be the announcement of the Chair, but the memorandum sent to me from the timekeeper shows that I had only one hour and thirty-eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. One hour and fifty-nine minutes according to the memorandum of the Chair.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is not the gentleman from Texas ready to go ahead?

Mr. BAILEY. Do you mean, am I personally ready?

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, you and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK], I want you to go ahead.

Mr. BAILEY. I had supposed my friend from Kansas desired to yield to somebody now.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want your side to get an hour ahead of us, because we are entitled to close the debate.

Mr. BRODERICK. Do you want us to take all of our time now?

Mr. HENDERSON. Some more of your time.

Mr. BAILEY. Do I understand the gentleman from Iowa that he desires to occupy a full hour at the conclusion?

Mr. HENDERSON. We want the last hour in the debate; yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I recognize that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] is entitled to conclude the debate, but I do not recognize that he is entitled to reserve an entire hour, and to divide that hour among three or four gentlemen.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, yes; I think we are entitled to the control of our time, and we have the close of the debate.

Mr. BAILEY. Not any more than I am entitled to the control of my part of the time. I perfectly agree with the gentleman that—

Mr. HENDERSON. You can do just what you please with your share of the time, of course.

Mr. BAILEY. That is what I am trying to do, unrestrained by being compelled to use it all and leave you an hour to be divided between three or four gentlemen at the close. I do not need to do more than to appeal to the gentleman's sense of fairness.

Mr. HENDERSON. The last hour will be used by one of our side.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

Mr. HENDERSON. Though I think we have a perfect right to divide it if we want to.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, if you do not intend to do it, I will not stop to discuss that.

Mr. HENDERSON. My intention is to have it used by one man.

Mr. BAILEY. I am perfectly content with that.

Mr. HENDERSON. We have been running ahead of you, and I have been perfectly frank both in the House and in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the pending question, bankruptcy, is, in my opinion, a very pertinent one at this time; but it does seem to me, however, as said by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], that it is a sad commentary upon this House that we have spent five months of time while the people of every portion of this country were complaining, when labor was unemployed, when machinery stood still, when the currency of this great country was daily and hourly shrinking in proportion to the number of people, and that now, in these closing days, the best that can be offered by the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress to the people of the United States is to help them into bankruptcy.

Our friend from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], a very brilliant and eloquent gentleman, on yesterday spoke under the seeming impression that he lived in a great State, one that had flourished beyond the power of man to compute, under and by reason of a high protective tariff. Thinking of that last night, I ran over the figures at my command to see whether or not the people of the State of Illinois and in the other States were flourishing and whether or not this Congress, after going into paroxysms over every other question so far as they affected people of foreign countries, should now content itself without trying to aid the people of the United States to reestablish their industries by stopping and helping them into bankruptcy.

Now, what is the condition of the people, even in the great States of Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, Massachusetts, and other protected States? Is this a mere question of allowing the idle and profligate to go into bankruptcy? The masses of the people of this country are not asking you for a method of going into bankruptcy. The people from one end of this country to the other are asking for some way by which they may become solvent or to avoid bankruptcy.

I know that our friends complain and say that the Democratic party or some other party is the cause of this deplorable condition; but now and then a man gets up in the Republican ranks and exposes the fallacy of the Republican leaders.

Only yesterday, in the other Chamber, Senator TELLER, a man equipped, probably, as no other man in this nation is, with facts and figures, rose and told the country what the cause of this depression is. He clearly showed it is not deficiency of revenue or a low tariff, but he said:

I do not know what the deficiency is going to be this year, but I do know that the deficiencies on the 28th day of April for the year were $24,247,517.83. On that day we had $273,522,338 in the Treasury. I repeat, there is not a nation on the face of the earth that holds $273,000,000 in its Treasury for ordinary purposes. If there is such a nation at all it is Russia, that is stated to have accumulated a large amount, nobody knows how much, for war purposes—not to be used except in an emergency for war. There is more money in the Treasury than the people of the United States are willing should be put there and tied up. Every dollar that is put into the Treasury comes out of the circulation that is necessary in this country to maintain even the present bad conditions of commerce and trade. Inside of twenty-seven months you have put into the Treasury $200,000,000 that had been in circulation. You drew out of the circulation of this country $200,000,000 and put it where it is of no more value to commerce and trade than it would be if it were in the depths of the sea.

And yet, Mr. President, Senators rise here and wonder why it is that business does not revive, why it is that prosperity does not come to us. We have had contraction at the rate of $100,000,000 a year; contraction since the 1st of February, this year, of $100,000,000 apparently in ignorance of a well-known and well-settled principle of political economy, that when you decrease the circulation of the money you destroy prices and you discourage enterprise and retard all movements toward production.

Mr. President, if there ever was a nation in the world that seems to be governed by imbeciles and men without thought or men without reason it is fair to say we are now in the hands of that class of people. The history of the world does not show such contraction as we have voluntarily and deliberately and willingly taken it upon ourselves to create for the simple purpose of maintaining the gold standard, and nothing else.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] knows, and every man in this Chamber knows, that the $202,000,000 is a debt put upon this country to maintain the gold standard. And he knows, as I know, that the $202,000,000 is but the beginning of a debt that is to be put upon us if the gold standard is to be maintained. It will not do for the Senator to tell me or anybody else in this Chamber that revenue is what you want. What you want, Mr. President, is some system of finance that shall bring confidence to the people who create and produce, that shall encourage them in the belief that when they manufacture an article they want to sell they can sell it for as much at least as it cost. The absolute certainty exists to-day in every productive circle in the United States, and pretty nearly in the world, that he who produces to-day must sell to-morrow at a loss.

Mr. President, the financial question is at the bottom of this trouble, not a lack of revenues. I do not intend myself to allow either the Senator from Ohio or anybody else to fool the people of this country with the idea that all you need is to pass the McKinley bill again, and that then prosperity will come. You will never see the McKinley bill reenacted, and if you did you would not see prosperity come from it. We have been promised all these years that if we would do this and if we would do the other thing prosperity would be at our door. Every promise made has failed.

I know that there is traversing the country and shouting a band of men who have labeled their candidate "the advance agent of prosperity." Mr. President, the people who look to him as the savior will find that they have been deluded and deceived. The agent of prosperity is not in sight, and he will not come into sight until this system of finance of ours is changed; until we return to the system which gave the people the agencies to do business with, so that we shall satisfy them that when they put their money in an enterprise and produce articles they may reap reward and advantage therefrom.

This is a movement against the retail dealer. It is a movement that the wholesalers have been working at for half a generation for the purpose of throwing every claim they have to collect into the United States courts. It is a scheme that they have been contending for for a quarter of a century almost, to get their claims in a place that they can not be taken advantage of by local creditors. This law is being written not for the purpose of the debtors—this is another law that is being written in the interest of the creditor, and the creditor alone.

Mr. SORG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. SORG. Is not the wholesaler a debtor, too?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. The wholesaler is a debtor, of course, in a particular sense; and probably every man is more or less a debtor.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Have not the wholesalers all over the continent been making assignments?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. The wholesalers all over the continent, like everybody else, are making assignments, and have been demanding a bankrupt law for a number of years. The retailer never has demanded it.

Mr. LOW. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. LOW. Is it not a fact that a great number of poor men, or comparatively poor men, are among the creditors?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Every man is more or less, under our system, a creditor. The provisions of this act and the act itself has a tendency to make men more and more creditors and more and more debtors. If this act goes into effect every retailer in this country will also have a wholesale master. Every man in this country, I care not how you construct this bill—every retail merchant will have over his head a wholesale master, and the wholesalers are a class of men that are so few in number that they will combine when they take it into their heads to put a man into bankruptcy. Under this bill, I care not whether one of the nine causes is true or all false, they will make it so expensive for the debtor, they will so oppress him with their power to prosecute, they will make it so expensive for him through accumulating witnesses and in taking him to foreign courts, that it will result in bankruptcy whether the causes therefor in this bankruptcy bill are true or false.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Are you in favor of a voluntary bankruptcy law?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. If we are to have any bankruptcy law, I would be in favor of a voluntary law. I am, in fact, in favor of a bankruptcy law that will permit such men as have made commercial mistakes, or have been overtaken by misfortunes from which they can never rise, to be relieved, but do not think it very important. My experience in such matters is that under the usual conditions, even in our present condition, debts are hardly permanent. There is not one case in a hundred in the United States where a failing merchant obtains a judgment against insolvent debtors that is not settled by the statute of limitations. They could but do not keep their judgments alive and allow them to expire in five, six, or ten years, as the statutes of limitations operate, and that puts the judgments at an end. I believe if we have a bankruptcy law at all that it should be a voluntary bankruptcy law, or that a bankruptcy law, as stated by our friend from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK], where a man can not be forced into bankruptcy but for the commission of an actual fraud.

But I meant when I took the floor simply to answer some suggestions made by our friend from the State of Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] on yesterday as to the prosperity of that State, and to illustrate as best I could to this House that the difficulty with this country to-day is that we are giving all of our attention to the great property holders of the country and letting the individual go without protection. I wish to say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] that perhaps, well fed and well kept as he is, as well as all other Congressmen, he does not feel the great difficulties of the people even of his own State. Let us see what is the condition of the people of the State of Illinois—and I am speaking now in the interest of the individual, not for aggregated wealth.

Property has written every law upon the statute book since this session of Congress began. Property threatens to write this one, and it seems to me that it is high time that the individual was writing a few statutes in the interest of the individual. I have here an extract from the Chicago Record of December 1, 1895, which reads as follows:

County Agent Oleson says that there are many more worthy poor to be remembered this Thanksgiving than for many years and that the appropriation is altogether inadequate. In 1894 the county agent relieved 38,500 families, or about 219,000 persons. Thus far this year 40,000 families have been relieved, and by the end of the year the number is expected to reach 46,000. This month 375 cases have been sent to the poorhouse. Calls for physicians have averaged 10 a day. There are 30 visitors, 1 of whom is a woman; there will be 40 after December.

That, Mr. Chairman, was the condition in one county in the State of Illinois in the month of November last. Now, some of our friends say that this condition is caused by the Democratic or some other political organization, but in another paper of the same city at the same time I find another item which tells the condition of the Chemical National Bank of the city of New York, and this illustrates the general condition of this class of property. Let us see how these two classes are getting along side by side under this and under former Administrations:

It is said that the capital stock of the Chemical National Bank of New York, issued at a par value of $100 a share, is now worth more than $4,000—40 to 1—and that its dividends to stockholders are 150 per cent per year.

This illustrates fairly the condition of the debtors and creditors throughout the country.

Now, gentlemen, that illustrates the point I am trying to make, and I remind you that both these extracts are taken from the newspapers of Chicago of December last. They show one class of people going down day by day into poverty while the other is going up daily into wealth. This country has beheld in the last two decades its aggregate wealth multiply with unprecedented rapidity. It has observed at the same time the wealth of the individuals of this country depreciating at a ratio without precedent. I noticed the other day that ex-Governor Fishback had made some figures from the last census which ought to be burned into the mind of every representative in this House and at the other end of the Capitol. It is a statement which ought to cause you to think, gentlemen, and to look into the causes of the distress throughout this country; it ought to make you go out and think why it is that when a farmer from the other end of the Capitol goes through the country crowds follow him with the emblematical pitchfork and appeal to him to turn over the ruinous condition of things and the causes or authors of this ruin about the Capitol.

Ex-Governor Fishback says, among many other things, the following:

Mr. Carroll D. Wright's Census Bulletin No. 98 shows that, notwithstanding the immense increase in the wealth in Massachusetts of 82 per cent, upward of four-fifths of all the families residing in Boston have no homes. * * * More than three-fourths of the families residing in Philadelphia have no homes, though its increase in wealth is 77 per cent. In Providence, R. I., nearly four-fifths of the people have no homes, with an increase of wealth of 79 per cent. In the city of New York nine-tenths of the families have no homes, with a marvelous increase of wealth equal to 94 per cent.

But in answer especially to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] I cite the following from the same letter:

Take, for illustration, Illinois. Before the war this was a farmers' paradise. Almost every acre of it is as fertile as the Valley of the Nile, and is in a high state of cultivation, giving indisputable evidence of unremitting toil and energy. Every county in it has from 1 to 20 railroads. Its cities have grown in wealth during the last decade about $500,000,000, yet the aggregate wealth of Illinois during this decade has decreased $59,000,000, and during the single year from 1893 to 1894 it decreased upward of $24,000,000.

Upon whom has this loss fallen? * * * Certainly not upon the cities, which have grown enormously. Not upon her manufacturing interests, for they have increased in the city of Chicago alone $297,000,000 during the last decade, while 71 per cent of the families who reside in Chicago have no homes.

Ex-Governor Fishback further states, in illustration of the effects of special tariff legislation in the interests of New England and the Middle States, the following:

Pennsylvania, one of the most barren States, during the first decade, from 1880 to 1890, grew in wealth $13,000,000 more than Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana all combined.

Rhode Island, * * * not as large as the two smallest counties in Arkansas, with less than one-third of the people of that State, with its little patch of sand and stone and salt water, grew in wealth during the last decade $41,000,000 more than the four great States of Illinois, Indiana, South Carolina, and Mississippi all combined, and these States are 136 times as large and have 21 times as many people as Rhode Island—just as earnest, just as honest, just as industrious people, all toiling just as eagerly to make wealth.

Does not the reading of the report of the committee photograph a sad future for the people? Does it not invite some remedy more helpful to the people than a system to shuffle off some burdens of debt by giving up all their possessions without any feasible hope of replenishing their condition?

At page 3 of the report the committee says:

From the Bureau of Statistics we learn that the total number of failures in the United States from 1879 to 1895, both inclusive, amounts to 171,389, most of them active, aggressive, honest men who have met with misfortune in the struggle of life, and who, if relieved from the burden of debt, would renew the struggle with fresh hope and vigor and become active and useful members of society. From the same source we learn that the total liabilities from 1879 to 1895, inclusive, of the number who failed, as just stated, aggregate $2,611,521,704.

Is this not marvelous? Failures in four years for amounts equal to one-half of the gold coin in the world; and yet members on this floor speak of the abundance of our currency.

The committee has also ascertained from the Bureau of Statistics the failures and liabilities for the first three months of 1895 and for the first three months of 1896, showing that the total failures during the first three months of 1895 in the United States was 3,802; in 1896, the first three months, 4,031; liabilities during the first three months of 1895, $34,160,952; for the same period in 1896, $38,755,015, an increase in 1896 of failures, 229, and of liabilities, $4,594,063.

Dun's Review for September, 1895, says that prices are 8.8 per cent lower than a year ago, notwithstanding the marked rise in iron and a few other things.

The Manufacturer, of Philadelphia, of date December 14, 1895, has the following pertinent paragraph:

The amount of money in circulation decreased for the month of November. It fell off net $1,663,837, a net decrease of over $13,000,000, as shown in the Treasury statement, of changes in money and bullion for the month. The total amount of money in circulation on December 1 amounted to $1,594,195,479, which represents a decrease of about $43,000,000 as compared with the corresponding date of last year. While the circulation has been decreasing, says Bradstreet's, the population has been increasing, and the circulation per capita has been falling even in a greater ratio than the decrease in circulation.

The amount of money in circulation per capita on December 1, as estimated by Treasury experts on the basis of a population of 70,504,000, is $22.61, which represents a decrease of 11 cents per capita for the month and of $1.11 since the corresponding date last year.

These facts and indisputable figures have been staring the leaders of the legislative and executive departments of the Government in the face for years, and yet at every mention of the subject one side replies it is a want of revenue, and the other that it is occasioned by the defect in our paper money; and to relieve these defects the best they can offer is an involuntary bankruptcy law by which the creditors can further despoil the poor prospects of the debtors of the nation.

If every individual in this country earned his livelihood through the same means but few laws would be required, and what would benefit one would inure to the benefit of all others. However, many generations ago mankind learned that the human muscles were subject to the same environments as was the human brain, and adopted the economic principle of training the mind and muscles of men to the apt use of only one kind of tools, thereby dividing men into innumerable distinct avocations. This brought with it a clamor from every branch of industry for legislation favorably fixing its status among the phalanx of industries.

Wealth, where held in inordinate quantities, has combined and obtained control of all departments of the Government and has written every material statute for the past quarter of a century. Every man in this House truly represents his favorite piece of property; but who especially represents the individual? Property holds a mighty and dangerous despotism here that overawes any consideration of the individual. It does not answer the objects of this bill to point out the fact that some leniency is meted out to the downtrodden debtor. In this bill such a course is logically necessary. There can not be a permanent law or institution that is utterly bad. Every bad law must have enough highly commendable provisions to hide in a measure the grotesqueness of its bad features. This one, however, has not even the usual quantity of good features. It is but a poor argument, also, to insist that this bill is preferable to any of the previous bankrupt laws. The former ones were mere machines of oppression, so glaring and abusive in their enforcement that public opinion forced them off the statute books. All experience teaches that where a combination is possible a fair competition is impossible. None of the large cities has any great number of wholesalers in any one line of trade. Combination is not only possible but is certain to take place in the enforcement of this law, as it has taken place in the efforts to obtain it.

The retail merchants are scattered and are so numerous that combination for self-protection is impossible with them. No one can be misled by this bill. The objects of the foreign wholesalers are palpable, and embodying their objects in a small compass, we may say they are to throw all collections into the United States courts and make it impossible for any local financier to aid an oppressed debtor by taking the ordinary mortgage or trust-deed security, and to give the wholesale dealer the club of insolvency to hold over his retail customer as long as he owes him a dollar, and to destroy his right to trade with any other than the one to whom he is indebted, as long as he owes him a dollar.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has requested me to discuss certain provisions of this bill, namely, those that relate to the taxation and payment of fees and costs. I admit at the outset that it is not a very inviting theme. It is not a theme in the treatment of which one can indulge in any rhetorical pyrotechnics, and I apprehend that while upon this stretch I shall be unable, even if I desired, to mount the bicycle of wit and humor. [Laughter.]

Nevertheless, the question of fees and costs is an important one, and deserves the earnest consideration of every man who would intelligently vote either for or against this bill.

Mr. Chairman, a proceeding in bankruptcy, like every other cause pending in a court or other tribunal of justice, must of necessity involve the taxation and payment of fees and costs. "He who works must eat." "The laborer is worthy of his hire." These are not only true Scriptural injunctions, but they underlie every principle of political economy, and, I might add, every system of moral philosophy. He who goes into a court and incurs costs, he who sets the machinery of the law in operation and invokes the services of the officers of the law, is primarily bound unto them for the services which they render unto him. He may be required to pay in the first instance, as a condition precedent to the rendering of the service, or it may be collected of him upon a fee bill. If he ultimately succeeds, then, subject to certain rules of equity, he can recover over and against the unsuccessful party a judgment for the costs by him expended.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the Judiciary in drafting this bill has kept in mind the fundamental truths which I have just asserted. The crowning evils of the bankrupt act of 1867 were the delays incident to the prosecution of a proceeding in bankruptcy and the enormous costs which that proceeding permitted to be taxed, and in most cases ultimately to be paid out of the estate of the bankrupt. In this connection I may add that delays created additional costs, and therefore there was an inducement to those who were to receive such costs to create delays. This bill has well guarded against the evil of delay. It takes from every officer of the court, from every person who may be called upon to perform service in the prosecution of a proceeding in bankruptcy, any inducement to create delay, because by so doing he can not possibly add a farthing to the fee bill or to the bill of costs.

Who are the persons that may be required under this bill to render services either on behalf of the petitioner or of the defendant? The clerk of the United States court, the United States marshal, the referee, and in some instances a stenographer who may be employed by him; the trustee, the witnesses who may be summoned to testify either upon the one side or the other, the jurors who sit in the box to try and determine under the law and the evidence the issues joined between the parties, and I may add an attorney who represents the petitioner in a case of voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy.

Before I start out and specifically analyze the provisions of this bill as to the fees and costs to be paid to each one of these officers or persons, permit me to suggest that he or they who file a petition in a court of bankruptcy must in the very first instance deposit the sum of $25. There is one exception to that: In case a voluntary bankrupt shall with his petition file an affidavit that he is unable to pay, then he is relieved from the payment of the filing fees. Except in cases of that kind, a petitioner or petitioners, whether the debtor or creditor or creditors, must in the first instance deposit with the clerk the sum of $25. What is that $25 for? A clerk's fee of $10; a referee's fee of $10; a trustee's fee of $5.

This bill further provides that in case a debtor is declared a bankrupt, then the creditors who have paid this $25 shall recover it out of the estate of the bankrupt. And if you will turn to the section of this bill which treats of priorities, you will find that in the list of priorities (if I remember aright) the cost and expenses of preserving the estate after the defendant shall have been declared a bankrupt comes first in the list of priorities, and these filing fees come second.

Now, let us take up these respective officers and persons and see how much they are entitled to for the services which they may render under the provisions of this bill. The first officer is the clerk; and section 52 of this bill provides that the $10 paid as a filing fee shall constitute his entire compensation for any and all services that he may be called upon to render in that proceeding. If you will turn to page 18 of the report you will find, commencing at the bottom of that page and running halfway down page 19, a statement of the fees which it was possible for the clerk to tax and collect under the law of 1867. I will not take time to read and comment upon those fees one by one; but I invite the attention of members to them.

This bill simply provides that the clerk shall receive the sum of $10 and no more. And I say to this Committee of the Whole that it is the consensus of opinion of the 17 gentlemen constituting the Judiciary Committee that $10 is amply sufficient, and there are some of us who would have been willing to place this fee at $5.

In this connection I will say that my friend from Texas [Mr. CROWLEY] handed me yesterday a letter which I hold in my hand, written by the clerk of the United States district court for the eastern district of Texas. I do not care to read this letter at length, yet if there be no objection I may ask that it be incorporated in full in the RECORD. At this time I content myself with saying that this clerk writes to Mr. CROWLEY condemning the bill and insisting that under it the various clerks of the various courts of the United States should be permitted to charge fees practically in conformity to the law of 1867. Answering him, I reiterate that when you take into consideration that after the debtor has been declared a bankrupt substantially all the work from that time on must be done and performed by the referee and the trustee, the sum of $10 is ample compensation for any and all services which a clerk of a United States court may be called upon to render or perform.

Section 51 of the bill provides that these clerks shall respectively receive for copies of papers made for persons other than officers of the law the same compensation that they are now allowed for making copies. It will be observed that the compensation thus to be received can in no wise come out of the estate of the bankrupt.

The marshal of the United States under the provisions of this bill may be required to apprehend the person of the bankrupt. He will be required to serve all process, and in certain contingencies he will take possession of the property of the alleged bankrupt and hold it in his custody free from harm during the pendency of the original proceeding—that is to say, until the court shall have determined whether or not the alleged bankrupt be, as a matter of fact, an actual bankrupt. For his services in apprehending the alleged bankrupt, for his services in executing all process under this law, he receives the same fees and emoluments that he would receive for executing like process in civil proceedings pending in the same court.

But gentlemen will remember that under the salary bill recently passed by this House, and which is now in the hands of a conference committee, the fees and costs to be taxed in favor of the marshal are to be collected, accounted for, and by him paid over to the Treasury of the United States. For his services in taking possession and taking care of the property pending the adjudication of the question whether the alleged bankrupt be a bankrupt, the law provides that the court may allow the marshal a reasonable compensation, which in force and effect is the same provision that will be found upon the statute books of all the States of this Union providing for the compensation of sheriffs or constables when under a writ of attachment they go out and seize the property of some defendant in the writ which they may have been called upon to execute.

The referee receives this $10 filing fee; and that is all he does receive until the estate is administered. I will read the section:

Referees shall respectively receive as full compensation for their services, payable after they are rendered, a fee of $10 deposited with the clerk at the time the petition is filed in each case, except when a fee is not required from a voluntary bankrupt, and from estates which have been administered before them 1 per cent commissions on sums to be paid as dividends and commissions, or one-half of 1 per cent on the amount to be paid to creditors upon the confirmation of a composition.

Now, gentlemen, if you desire to do so (and the comparison would be interesting), I invite you to compare the fees provided under this bill for referees with those allowed a register in bankruptcy under the law of 1867. I have said heretofore that the crowning evil of the law of 1867 was the enormous fee bill which the register in bankruptcy and the assignee in bankruptcy were enabled to tax up against the estate of a bankrupt; but under this law the referee receives the ten-dollar filing fee and 1 per cent, and no more, on the amount paid out by way of commissions or dividends, not on the gross sum that comes into his hands, but only on the net sum that the estate shall have yielded for administration and after the actual expenses shall have been paid.

The law further provides that under certain circumstances the referee may employ a stenographer. You gentlemen all understand the necessity of that. The taking of testimony before a referee may be greatly expedited by the services of a stenographer, and this law confers on the referee under certain circumstances the power to employ a stenographer, but limits the compensation of the same to a sum not exceeding 15 cents a folio. Under most of the laws that now prevail in our States stenographers are allowed 25 cents per folio, but it was the judgment of the committee—and I believe it will be the judgment of the House—that 15 cents per folio, under the circumstances, will be ample compensation for a stenographer in this day of many stenographers and typewriters.

The trustee for his services in taking care of the bankrupt's property, making deeds to lands that may be conveyed, and for transfers of personal property receives the filing fee of $5 and a commission, respectively, of 5, 2, and 1 per cent subsequently, not on the gross amount that goes into his hands, but upon the net amount remaining after costs and expenses shall have been paid. After providing for the filing fee of $5, the law says he shall be allowed—

Such commissions on sums to be paid as dividends and commissions as may be allowed by the court, not to exceed 5 per cent on the first $5,000 or less, 2 per cent on the second $5,000 or part thereof, and 1 per cent on such sums in excess of $10,000.

Again I invite a comparison between the fees allowed to the trustee under this law and the fees that were allowed to the assignee in bankruptcy in the old law of 1867, and I refer gentlemen who desire to investigate the matter to page 18 of the printed report of the committee on this bill.

The witnesses who may be summoned, either before the court or the referee, are entitled to the same fees, mileage, and per diem as they would be allowed in other cases. Jurors are not allowed anything under the bill, and for this reason: That all jurors in the United States courts are paid by the Government, and a jury fee is not taxed in a case or proceeding pending or disposed of therein. Hence there was no necessity for making provision in the bill for their payment.

Section 64, clause 3, paragraph 3, provides—

(3) The cost of administration, including the fees and mileage payable to witnesses as now or hereafter provided by the laws of the United States, and one reasonable attorney's fee for the professional services actually rendered, irrespective of the number of attorneys employed, to the petitioning creditors in involuntary cases, to the bankrupt in involuntary cases while performing the duties herein prescribed, and to the bankrupt in voluntary cases, as the court may allow.

In other words, the voluntary bankrupt may be allowed an attorney fee. I apprehend that in many cases it may be absolutely necessary for the insolvent debtor, in order to obtain the advantages of the bill, to have the services of an attorney; and being insolvent and without other means of payment, it is right, it is just and humane, that the court should be permitted to allow him the services of an attorney to be paid out of his own estate. On the other hand, when the creditor goes into court seeking to adjudge the insolvent debtor a bankrupt, and to administer upon and divide his estate, the services of an attorney are necessary. But the attorney of one may do and perform practically all that is necessary to protect the rights of all. We have an illustration in the several State courts in proceedings to partition real estate. The partition of the real estate is for the benefit of all who are interested therein, and therefore in nearly every State in the Union, perhaps in all of them, provision is made allowing the courts to grant to one attorney of the petitioners a fee to be paid out of the estate. And so here it matters not though there may be a dozen attorneys, yet upon the theory that one attorney is competent and qualified to represent, take care of, and protect the interests of all, one attorney's fees and one only, is allowed out of the estate; and that is just and right and proper.

Another provision of the law is that the judgment may be rendered for all costs made out and expended, and in the judgment of the committee we embodied in the law the equitable rule, not the harsh rule, of the law, which says that in every instance the prevailing party shall have the judgment against the unsuccessful party, for there are some times when the prevailing party has necessarily incurred large and improper expenses; hence this bill gives to the United States judge the power to say when and under what circumstances even the prevailing creditor may be called upon to pay the costs which he has unwittingly or wrongfully occasioned to the estate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, briefly, and yet I hope plainly, I have gone over the various provisions of this law applicable to the taxation, collection, and payment of the costs and fees in bankruptcy cases. A few words upon other features of this bill. I am, as every other man ought to be, in favor of a bankruptcy law. I am astonished to find upon the floor of this House anyone unwilling to give to the honest debtor, upon his application, a discharge from the burden of his debts. It seems to me that each and every one of us ought to be in favor of the bill introduced by my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], if forsooth we can not obtain either the bill which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] stands for or the bill which has been reported to this House by the majority of this committee.

Misfortune has come and will continue to come unto those who by the sweat of their brows are compelled to earn their bread. There is no panacea, for there is nothing that can ward off misfortune, distress, misery, and woe. All over this broad land are men who are borne down by the heavy burden of an indebtedness which they are not able to pay. This bill says unto such that they may go into a court of justice, holding out that property, both real and personal, which the laws of their respective States give unto them, either as homesteads or as exemptions for their families, and upon surrendering the surplus they shall be entitled to a discharge, to the end that they may go out into God's sunlight, and by their own efforts again win, if possible, a competency for themselves and those unto whom they are bounden.

All over this broad land, Mr. Chairman, there are many men who to-day are devoting their vital energies to maintain themselves within the limits of an exemption law or a homestead law, knowing that the moment they shall become possessed of an inch of land beyond the limits of the homestead or of a dollar beyond that which shall be protected by the exemption law some rapacious creditor may seize that surplus and despoil them thereof.

We say to all of that large class, "Step forth; let us have the benefit of your brain and your brawn, your energy and your pluck, to the end that the waste places may be builded up and that the desert may again blossom as the rose."

There is a considerable difference of opinion, not only among the members of this House, but among the members of this committee, as to the details of a bankruptcy law. There are men who favor a voluntary bankruptcy law only. There are some who are in favor of an involuntary bankruptcy law, but they would apply it only in those cases where moral turpitude is involved. There are others who take the broad position that the creditors of an insolvent have a right at least equal with himself to say what disposition shall be made of his property. They are in favor of the bill as it is written and stands reported to this House.

Mr. Chairman, a few words concerning this bill. There are nine grounds of involuntary bankruptcy. In other words, there are nine causes set forth in this act for which, upon the petition of a creditor and upon proof that either one of those nine acts have been committed, a party may, without his own consent or volition, be declared a bankrupt, and his property, in excess of his homestead and exemption rights, be taken in charge by an officer of the court. I shall examine these clauses in a different order from that in which they are set forth in the bill. Four of them involve moral turpitude. In other words, four of them deal with those acts which constitute a fraud upon the part of the debtor against his creditors. Take the first one. If a debtor has—

Concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors, and shall not have returned at least forty-eight hours before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, and before the rights of creditors shall have been impaired, altered, or interfered with—

That involves the doing of a wrong. That involves the concealment of a person or his removal for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, and I say to my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] there is no more harshness in this bill as applied to that man than is found in every attachment law in every State in this Union. Neither he nor I has any right, either in a court of justice or upon the floor of Congress, to constitute himself or myself the defender of such a man from a moral standpoint. We may justify such conduct when employed by those men as their attorneys in a proceeding in a court of justice, but stripped of the duty of counsel to client I say to the gentleman that neither honesty, fair dealing, nor good business demands that he or I or anybody else should set himself up as the champion of a debtor of that kind, and I say there is no reason, no argument, that can be produced that will justify any man in voting against this bill because, forsooth, that clause is contained therein.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. What gentleman from Missouri did you refer to?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Not the gentleman who is now addressing me.

The third cause, as set forth in the bill, is, if any person has—

Made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors, and has not regained the ownership and possession of such property before the rights of creditors have been altered, impaired, or changed by reason of such transfer, and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy—

The very same reason prevails here. An intent upon the part of the debtor to deal dishonestly, to defraud and defeat his creditors in their rights under the law, is involved in that conduct.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. BRODERICK. Take the case of a man who has not disposed of his property, but has given a mortgage on his goods. Now, in our State, where they can give a mortgage on the goods and still retain possession, and go on and make the usual sales, would not the transfer, where a mortgage has been given, be considered as an intent to defraud, and would they not undertake to drive that man into bankruptcy for simply putting a mortgage on his goods, for doing a thing which he can do in my State and in your State?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. I presume, Mr. Chairman, that there are creditors who would do that; and there have been creditors who have gone into his office and mine and insisted that a writ of attachment should issue against a man that has done the very thing he suggests when he may have done it innocently. But the provision in this bill is that he shall have done these things with an intent to defraud his creditors. That is a question of fact to be determined in a tribunal of justice which has jurisdiction in this matter. I simply say to my friend that if a debtor makes a mortgage, gives a bill of sale, or in any way transfers his property with the specific intent of defrauding any creditor, he is guilty of wrong, both in law and in morals, and ought to be adjudged a bankrupt.

Mr. GRAFF. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is talking about subdivision 5?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. No, sir; I am talking about subdivision 3.

Mr. GRAFF. I will say in reference to subdivision 5 that it is not necessary that he shall make such transfer with intent to defraud anybody.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. I will answer my friend by saying that I can not talk about five subdivisions all at once. I am talking about subdivision 3 now.

Mr. BRODERICK. The question that I meant to ask was whether this law would be strained in that particular, and would not it be set as a precedent?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. I think, my friend, you are right. Human nature is the same, whether you find it under the coat of a wholesale or a retail man. Human nature is somewhat selfish and inclined to look after its own, and to misjudge the actions of others. I apprehend if you, an honest man, possessed of a limited amount of property, but indebted to a much greater amount, and even inspired by the very best motives, should give a mortgage on your property to secure the claims of one of your creditors, that the others would say in a court—in their own minds, at least—that you had been inspired with fraudulent intent. But that does not entitle the law to adjudge you a bankrupt. The question is whether you did it with that intent; and whether you did so or not is a question of fact to be determined by a jury in the box under instructions given to it by the court.

Mr. TAWNEY. But that is in a bankruptcy proceeding—the hearing of that question of fact—to throw a man into bankruptcy.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Exactly; that is where the question comes up.

Mr. TAWNEY. And it proceeds upon the allegation of a man who is throwing another man into bankruptcy.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Exactly; just as it proceeds now upon the affidavit of a man who seeks to obtain a writ of attachment.

Mr. CONNOLLY. In the preliminary hearing?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. In the preliminary hearing. I will answer the question and will discuss it.

Under the attachment laws in the various States a party can file his affidavit. In some States they are required to make a positive charge, and in some other States merely "belief" in the statement or that he "has reason to believe" is required. I will say to my friend that I have known many a creditor who has insisted upon suing out a writ of attachment and levying it upon the property of an honest debtor, knowing that he had no ground for attachment, saying unto his attorney, "I do this for the purpose of making this man understand, and all others who buy goods of me, that he must promptly pay his debt, or I will run him to the ground." I have had creditors talk to me in that way in my office.

Mr. BRODERICK. That is the danger that I find in this bill.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. But they say, "Ah, but you must give an attachment bond." I have said this to creditors. They replied, "Why, certainly; we will give an attachment bond. There will be no trouble about that. We will tie this man up and take every dollar he has, and he will not be able to fight." "But suppose he pursues the matter, and claims and obtains judgment?" "We will offset his judgment with our debt against him." I say to my friend that you can not create any machinery of law for the collection of debt that calls for an officer of the law to touch either the person or property of a so-called debtor but what may become machinery of wrong and injustice; and because it is true of necessity, because of human nature and its inherent selfishness, is no reason why we should refuse to enact a law either of attachment in the States or bankruptcy in the Federal courts.

The sixth is:

Procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against him with intent to defeat his creditors and suffered same to remain unpaid until ten days before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, provided that a payment or satisfaction of such judgment by a sale of any of the debtor's property or from the proceeds of such a sale shall not be deemed a payment of such judgment under the provisions of this section.

The same argument applies here.

The seventh is:

Secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors, and has not surrendered such property to such legal process at least ten days before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy.

The same argument applies.

Now, I say that these four acts of bankruptcy involve moral turpitude on the part of the defendant debtor, and there can be no good reason why any man should be unwilling to permit such a debtor to be put into bankruptcy, and his property in excess of his homestead and exemption rights taken for the satisfaction of his debts and divided pro rata among his creditors.

Now we come to a class of causes upon which there may be a difference of opinion.

The fourth cause is:

Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts.

I can see no harm in permitting such a person to be thrown into bankruptcy, because, by his making an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, he has turned over all his property to be divided pro rata among his creditors, and the only difference between carrying out that assignment under the laws of the State and the enforcement of the bankruptcy law against him would be that in the first instance he would not obtain a discharge, while under the operation of the bankruptcy law he would obtain a discharge.

The ninth, the eighth, the second, and the fifth do not involve any moral turpitude on the part of the debtor. Now, we are carried into the discussion of a question upon which minds honestly differ. There are certain States in this Union which recognize a right of preference. There are certain States, I understand, which do not. My own State recognizes that right. If I am possessed of but $5,000 and owe each of four persons $5,000, I have the right under the law of my State to take that $5,000 and pay either one of the four, and no man can call me to account in any court in the State. It has been asserted here that that is wrong, that it is unjust. There are others upon the floor who have argued to the contrary—that it is right and just. Taking these clauses up in irregular order, the ninth says:

Suspended and not resumed for thirty days and until a petition is filed while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over.

The eighth provides that if he shall have—

Suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed.

The second provides as follows:

Failed for thirty days and until a petition is filed while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold within such time under such process, then until three days before the time fixed for such sale.

The fifth is that he has—

Made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference, and has not regained the ownership of such property or released same from such levy before the rights of creditors shall have been altered, changed, or impaired by reason of such transfer, taking, or levy, and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy.

These are the acts of bankruptcy which do not involve moral turpitude. Reasons have been given by our friends on the other side why these acts should not, in their opinion, be made grounds of bankruptcy. On the other hand, reasons have been given on our side why they should be. But, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I intended when I rose to discuss only that portion of the bill which more particularly relates to costs and fees, and inasmuch as some of my colleagues have prepared themselves to meet the arguments upon these particular provisions of the bill, I shall conclude my address with thanking this committee for its kind attention. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HENDERSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that bills of the following titles had become laws without the approval of the President.

NOTE.—The following bills were presented to the President on April 14, 1896, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, have become laws without his approval:

An act (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897;

An act (H. R. 5672) to grant to railroad companies in Indian Territory additional powers to secure depot grounds;

An act (H. R. 2234) granting a pension to Joseph A. Cooper;

An act (H. R. 2800) granting a pension to Martha Brooks; and

An act (H. R. 4606) to grant an increase of pension to Mary B. Houk.

BANKRUPTCY.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

Mr. BRODERICK. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is with the utmost reluctance that I find myself obliged to oppose the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary. This is especially so in view of my great respect for the chairman of that committee and his colleagues and for their preeminent abilities as lawyers. In opening this discussion the chairman of the committee informed us that this is not a political question nor is it a legal question. If it were either I should feel constrained to blindly follow his leadership. It is a question of practical common sense, one that must be determined largely by the experience of the past and from what we may reasonably expect in the future under the practical operation of the pending measure should it become a law.

Every member, therefore, is free to follow his own judgment and vote in accordance with his convictions.

Mr. Chairman, ever since the panic of 1893 there has been a great demand throughout the country for a bankrupt law of some kind. I regret that the Committee on the Judiciary did not report to this House a bill without the objectionable feature of involuntary bankruptcy. In the past this feature has always resulted in making our bankrupt laws obnoxious to the people, impracticable of execution, and has occasioned their speedy repeal. Were it not for the fact that this bill provides so many different grounds upon which the creditor may proceed to throw the honest debtor, the man who is struggling honestly and manfully to meet his obligations, into bankruptcy, and thereby destroy his business, and perhaps all his future business prospects, I should heartily support it. But containing as it does these objectionable features, it is impossible for me to do so.

The gentleman who opened the debate on this bill, when his attention was called to the experience of the past with regard to our bankrupt laws, attempted to show that their speedy repeal was due wholly to the fact that the Federal courts were inaccessible to the people, and that this objection no longer existed. Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat surprised that my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] could not have found a more plausible reason for the speedy repeal of all previous involuntary bankrupt laws. It does not speak well for the intelligence of the men who enacted those laws to say that it was found necessary to repeal them in two or three years simply because the courts in which they were administered were discovered to be inaccessible to the people. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that there was another and a far more vital cause for the prompt repeal of our bankrupt laws. Our experience in this respect and the causes which operated to make those laws unpopular and which demanded their repeal should appeal with great force to the members of this House in the consideration of any proposed involuntary bankrupt law.

I have examined the debate on the repeal of the act of 1867, and find that its repeal was due to the obnoxious feature of involuntary bankruptcy. This feature of that law was so outrageously abused by the avaricious and unscrupulous creditor that honest debtors all over the country were forced into bankruptcy and all their prospects for the immediate future ruined. Instead of being a law for the relief of the unfortunate debtor, it soon came to be used as an engine of oppression and extortion. It was that feature of the law that gave rise to the hostility, and which compelled the speedy repeal of the first bankrupt act of 1800 on August 19, 1803. After the repeal of the act of 1800 we were without a bankrupt law until 1841. That, too, was an involuntary bankrupt law. It followed the panic of 1837, and was passed to afford relief to those who were so unfortunate as to lose their all in that great financial crisis. But, like the law of 1800, the involuntary feature made it so objectionable that it was repealed on the 3d of March, 1843, by the same Congress that enacted it. The next attempt to enact a permanent involuntary bankrupt law was in 1867. Five years after this act was passed the House of Representatives passed a bill repealing it. In the succeeding Congress they again passed a bill repealing that act. But both bills died in the Senate; and in 1878 the Senate passed a bill repealing the act of 1867, and that bill passed the House by the overwhelming vote of 205 to 40.

Long before it was repealed its repeal was demanded by the legislature of almost every State in the Union. The Congress that repealed that act and previous Congresses were flooded with memorials from the State legislatures and with petitions from citizens praying for the repeal of that act. In the message of President Grant to Congress in 1873 we have the reasons why the people were so anxious for the repeal of that obnoxious measure. President Grant in that message said:

Careful and prudent men very often become involved in debt in the transaction of their business, and though they may possess ample property, if it could be made available for the purpose, to meet all their liabilities, yet on account of the extraordinary scarcity of money they may be unable to meet their pecuniary obligations as they become due, in consequence of which they are liable to be frustrated in their business by proceedings in bankruptcy at the instance of unrelenting creditors.

People now are so easily alarmed as to monetary matters that the mere filing of a petition in bankruptcy by an unfriendly creditor will necessarily embarrass and oftentimes accomplish the financial ruin of a responsible business man. Those who otherwise might make lawful and just arrangements to relieve themselves from difficulties produced by the present stringency in money are prevented by their constant exposures to attack and disappointment by proceedings against them in bankruptcy, and, besides, the law is made use of in many cases by obdurate creditors to frighten or force debtors into a compliance with their wishes and into acts of injustice to other creditors and to themselves.

He recommended the repeal of the act, and if that could not be done, a repeal of its most objectionable features. That message was delivered to Congress in 1873, six years after the act had become a law. The reasons and the conditions which President Grant cited in that message, showing the necessity for the repeal of the involuntary bankrupt law of 1867, are more powerful arguments against the enactment of a similar law at this time than anything I can say. In view of our present financial and industrial depression, in view of the scarcity of money, in view of the fact that thousands of honest men are struggling along in business in the hope of better times, and in view of the greed and rapacity of some creditors, we should take as a warning against the enactment of an involuntary bankrupt law the words uttered by General Grant in favor of the repeal of such a law.

In criticising the position taken by those who favor voluntary bankruptcy alone the chairman of the committee said:

Why should the creditor be cut off and the debtor alone be entitled to bankruptcy?

That, Mr. Chairman, is an incorrect statement of the position of those who are in favor of voluntary bankruptcy or who favor an involuntary bankrupt law limited exclusively to the ground of fraud. We do not propose to cut off the creditor. It is not a question of depriving him of any right he now enjoys. The question is whether or not, if we give to the creditor an opportunity under voluntary bankruptcy to share equally in the distribution of the insolvent debtor's property when that debtor goes honestly into a court of bankruptcy for that purpose, in addition to the benefit of the State laws passed for his protection, he should have the additional right to go into a court of bankruptcy, and upon the mere allegation of himself, his attorney, or agent that the debtor has committed any of the nine acts specified in this bill, throw his debtor into bankruptcy and perhaps ruin him forever. Voluntary bankruptcy does not take from the creditor any right he to-day enjoys, but insures to him a just and equal distribution of the property of the honest debtor.

The purpose, and I take it the only purpose, of a bankrupt law is to secure the equal distribution of the debtor's property among his creditors and to release him from obligations from which he could never hope to be released if he could not do so through some procedure of this kind. Is involuntary bankruptcy essential to the accomplishment of either of these two purposes? I think not. By the provisions of a voluntary bankruptcy law the creditor, when the insolvent debtor avails himself of the benefit of that law, obtains his proportionate share of the assets or property of the debtor. He could do no more if he had the benefit of an involuntary bankrupt act. The only difference is that in the one case the debtor himself must take the initiative, while in the other the creditor may take the initiative without regard to the interests of anyone but himself. If his grounds for doing so are valid, his motive can not be questioned, nor will the consequence to the debtor and his family be considered. It gives him the right to demand his pound of flesh.

If the honest debtor is unable to meet his obligations as they mature, and is therefore insolvent, and his creditors are pressing for the payment of their claims, and if the debtor knows that under the law he can make an equal distribution of his property and obtain a complete release, and then take a new start in life, he will not hesitate to avail himself of the benefit of such a law. It is only, therefore, where the creditor is dealing with a fraudulent debtor that involuntary bankruptcy is of any benefit to him, unless he seeks to put the debtor into bankruptcy upon the mere allegation of fraud for the purpose of extorting preferences to himself or for the purpose of ruining the debtor.

I take it, Mr. Chairman, that this legislation is intended to proceed upon the theory that honesty in man is the rule and dishonesty the exception. We should, therefore, legislate with a view to protecting the honest creditor and the honest debtor; and if involuntary bankruptcy is not essential to the protection of either of these two classes, but is necessary to protect the honest creditor against the dishonest debtor, it should be limited in its operation and effect so as to accomplish that purpose and that alone.

Is there any necessity for a bankrupt law at this time? In answering this question I want to call the attention of the committee to a few facts which I have gathered from a record recently published by the Bradstreet Company, a commercial agency of national reputation. It shows the failures within the last four years and the causes of these failures. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that every man on this floor will agree with me when I say that the unfortunate debtor who has been overtaken by disaster or who has failed because of competition or the failure of others, or whose failure is due to credit given unwisely to his neighbors or to lack of experience or to lack of capital to carry on his business, is especially entitled to relief in bankruptcy. They are what are known in trade as honest failures.

How many men have failed from these causes during the last three years? I find on examining this record, to which I have already referred, that in 1892, 1893, 1894, and 1895 there were 36,145 men who failed from one or the other of the causes I have recited, and that the aggregate amount of their liabilities was $624,404,143, and that their estates did not equal more than 33½ per cent of their liabilities. It is fair, therefore, to assume that the great majority of these men are still laboring under the burdens of these enormous debts, and that they can only find relief in a court of bankruptcy. If this is not afforded them, the community in which they live will be deprived of their energy and industry or they will have to practice dishonesty by concealing their property in the name of their friends or relatives.

In view of the great demand throughout the country for this legislation, and in view of the great number of citizens who are to-day weighed down with a load of debt, from which they can never hope to be released except by voluntary bankruptcy, the practical question for us to consider is, which of the three propositions now before us shall we pass? Will it afford any relief for us to pass the committee bill, a bill that we know will never become a law at this or any other session of Congress with the sentiment against involuntary bankruptcy it will encounter in the Senate?

I am in favor of the substitute which will be offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK]. That substitute has been carefully considered by the Senate Judiciary Committee, and it has been reported by that committee to the Senate. That substitute provides merely for voluntary bankruptcy, except section 17, which authorizes involuntary bankruptcy in the case of actual fraud. I have not the time to discuss the details of the various sections of the substitute bill, but if the members of the House will send to the Senate document room and call for Senate bill No. 742 and examine it, they will ascertain how its various provisions compare with the bill now under consideration. I hope they will take the trouble to do so before we have a vote on the pending proposition.

The involuntary feature of the substitute is carefully guarded so as to protect the honest debtor and still afford the creditor an opportunity to proceed against the fraudulent debtor. If the debtor has made an assignment or other conveyance of his property, real or personal, or any part thereof, or has given or suffered any lien or any incumbrance on the same with the actual intent of defrauding his creditors, or any of them, the creditor can, in that case, force the debtor into bankruptcy, but under this provision before the creditor can proceed against the debtor in bankruptcy there must be a judicial determination of the question of whether or not the transfer was made with the intent to defraud. But mark the distinction between section 17 of the substitute and the bill now under consideration.

Section 17 provides that before you can put a man into bankruptcy you must adjudicate the question of fraud in court, before a jury if a jury is demanded. There must be a judicial ascertainment of the fact. You can not proceed by a petition alleging fraud, and on that ground force the debtor into bankruptcy. The creditor proceeds against the debtor first as a fraudulent debtor, not as a bankrupt, and the debtor has an opportunity to contest the allegation of fraud upon which he is to be adjudged a bankrupt. If the court finds the fact to be that he has transferred his property for the purpose and with the intent alleged, the debtor can then be adjudged a bankrupt, and not otherwise. There is, therefore, ample protection to the honest man who is charged with fraudulently conveying his property. He has the opportunity of disproving the allegation of fraud, and if he succeeds he is saved and his business is saved from the embarrassment incident to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy such as the committee bill authorizes.

Mr. Chairman, in view of our experience in the past with involuntary bankruptcy, let us drop that feature of the law except as it is authorized in the substitute of the gentleman from Kansas and enact into law only those features of previous laws which proved effective and which can not be abused by dishonest men. By doing so we will afford relief to thousands of men in this country who were ruined in the financial panic of 1893 and who are to-day weighed down with a load of debt they can never hope to pay. These men are bending, as it were, under a collar which for the balance of their lives will hold them in merciless bondage unless we give them the opportunity of passing through the court of bankruptcy and wipe out, as with a sponge, their past obligations and then go forth again as free men to work out for themselves a new fortune or go struggling down to their graves.

Mr. BRODERICK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF].

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that, after careful reflection, I am unable to give my support to this bill. I hear no urgent demand from my own people for an involuntary or a voluntary bankrupt law.

The demand from the people, which is general, strong, and earnest even from the debtor class, is not that they be given an opportunity to repudiate their debts, but that they be given an opportunity to pay their debts. Yet I can see that cases arise where men are honestly involved in debt so hopelessly that some relief ought to be afforded to give them another chance in life. I should be willing to vote for a bill, reasonable in its provisions, which provided a way for a debtor to enter voluntarily into bankruptcy, provided that the period of the operation of that law was confined to a reasonable time, say one or two years. I am not one of those who believe that a liberal voluntary bankrupt law would either be calculated to increase commercial honesty or to make men prudent in business, or calculated to help either the debtor or the creditor; but I believe in being national in my ideas, and if the South or the East or the West or any other portion of this country is so peculiarly situated from past reversals as to need the benefit of a voluntary bankrupt law, I am willing to pass such a law with reasonable provisions, and give them a reasonable time in which to obtain the benefits of it.

I carefully listened to the speech of my colleague [Mr. CONNOLLY], thinking that I should surely find some good reason for joining with him in the support of this bill, but I was very much surprised to find as able a lawyer as he is entering upon a defense of the involuntary provisions of this bill on the ground that it would help the debtor class. And how? He describes a man who in his imagination sees the star of hope, a man who is too proud, forsooth, to take advantage of the voluntary provisions of the act, and he argues you should support the involuntary provisions of this bill, so that this proud-spirited man can have his creditors force him into bankruptcy! I read from page 4582 of the RECORD:

Gentlemen tell us the same benefits might be reached under an involuntary bankruptcy law. That is true; they may be. A proud-spirited man, struggling under adverse circumstances in his business, keeps the star of hope in the sky above him as his guide; and no matter how dark the financial clouds around him may be, if he is honest he looks to that star just as an escaping slave once looked to the North Star for relief, and believes that by a proper struggle he may escape the disastrous results which seem to be threatening him in his business affairs. You say here, "You may release yourself by going to the bankrupt court and ask to be discharged from the indebtedness." "I don't want to do that; I don't want to allow that," the proud-spirited man says. "I don't want it. I don't want to back out and admit my defeat. I want to keep going, no matter what the struggle may be, if I can possibly do so."

Now, I say, give him a chance. Let him struggle on, not under the same adverse conditions. I am willing that he be given a chance, that he shall be relieved from his obligation. But the friends of the exclusively voluntary bankrupt laws say, "Oh, no; that will not do. You must pay in full or else you must acknowledge your defeat, plead guilty, go into a voluntary court, and have judgment passed upon your estate."

I submit that his argument means nothing more or less than that the involuntary features of the bill provide a kindly way of a man getting into bankruptcy by the act of his creditors instead of himself, which would not humiliate the debtor as much as his taking the step himself. This is indeed a peculiar and, I make bold to say, an unreasonable view.

When the star of hope can only be seen in a firmament of bankruptcy legislation, God help the debtors of the country.

Then the gentleman, with further strange, and to me inexplicable, argument, proceeds to give another reason why we should have an involuntary bankrupt law, because, forsooth, of the harshness of the State laws. When cited to the instance of attachment suits in his own State he speaks of the creditor making an affidavit upon information and belief as the foundation of the writ of attachment. The creditor does not do anything of the kind. He is compelled to make his affidavit, to verify it with certainty, from personal knowledge and absolutely. It is a condition precedent that he file a bond before the attachment issues, and the conditions of that bond are not those which can be escaped, as my colleague [Mr. CONNOLLY] said yesterday, by his pleading, when he is sued upon the bond, that he thought that what he alleged in the affidavit was true. Not at all.

The conditions of that bond are that he prosecute his suit to a successful conclusion, and there is no escape from a recovery upon that bond when the fact of his failure to do so is proven, of which the record itself would be plenty of evidence that he had failed to perform the conditions of the bond, and then the only question would be the amount of the damages. It is well known to all lawyers practicing in State courts in the United States that attachment suits are not so readily resorted to. We all know that we have had claims in our offices when we knew that a poor merchant was probably insolvent, yet we believed him to be honest, and we knew no way by which we could commence an attachment suit and maintain it, because the debtor was guilty of no fraud. We have sat there and waited with those claims and permitted that man to honestly administer his own business, and perchance fortune favored him, business grew better, and he finally paid his debts and came out of his financial difficulties. I think it is much better to let the remedy be where it is, in the State courts, under the State laws, framed with peculiar reference to the conditions of that particular locality.

Furthermore, from the slight experience which I have had in my practice, the difficulty about the collection of debts is where the debtor fraudulently conceals his property, where he is guilty of fraud of some kind and conceals the property, or transfers it fraudulently, where it is difficult to reach. There is not any particular remedy which is furnished by this bankruptcy law which is superior to the State courts for the purpose of ferreting out the fraud. The courts of chancery in every State are the courts which have the peculiar power adapted to this purpose. There is quite a contrast between the attachment laws in the different States and the provisions of this bill. The condition precedent of the creditor in the commencement of an attachment suit is that he file his bond, and a good bond, to be approved by the clerk of the court. Under this bill a creditor goes into a court of bankruptcy and files his petition without bond and he can speculate on the chances of his being able to adjudicate the defendant a bankrupt. Every man knows that at this particular time thousands and thousands of merchants have no money and no property except the unsold stock of merchandise upon their shelves and the uncollected accounts upon their books.

Of ten creditors of one of such merchants nine may be willing to wait for better times and give the merchant debtor an opportunity to slowly work out of debt by gradually paying each a portion of their debt, but the one remaining creditor is master of the situation by simply announcing his intention of filing a petition in bankruptcy. Such a creditor assumes no risk, for he can in case of failure be compelled to pay only the costs of the proceeding. For the damages which the honest and solvent debtor in such a case would incur no recovery can be had.

Who can measure the vast amount of injustice which may be done to the large number of business men with small capital who would pull through if unmolested by the unjust filing of a petition in bankruptcy by a creditor at this particular crisis?

Remember that the question of solvency may turn alone upon the value placed upon the stock of goods of the debtor by the court, a subject upon which an erroneous judgment might be easily reached.

For the man who can pay his debt and will not I have no sympathy. I am not concerning myself on the floor of this House to shape legislation for his protection. He deserves none. This includes all debtors who have committed fraud in incurring the debt or who afterwards fraudulently try to escape payment. If the involuntary provisions included in its list of acts constituting bankruptcy on the part of the debtor were those only involving actual fraud, I would be constrained to vote for this bill. It, however, in my judgment, is far too comprehensive, and its provisions are so drastic as to permit it to be used as an engine of oppression against worthy honest debtors who are struggling against adverse circumstances for which they are not responsible, and who, if unmolested, will "work out their own salvation." This should be our highest aim: To encourage men to rise above these difficulties and pay their debts, and not to encourage scaling down honest obligations on the one hand or the oppression of the debtor on the other. Creditors are not usually inclined to ruin the debtor. It has been truly said that self-interest would prompt the opposite course.

This is true, as a rule; but exceptions are not wanting to the contrary. Sufficiently numerous are the exceptions to warrant us in passing no law which shall not guarantee, so far as we may, exact justice to each. There is nothing in present conditions to cause me to look to a bankrupt law as legislation calculated to relieve the present general business depression. Its passage is a confession of distress, not a cure for it.

I shall vote for the Senate bankruptcy measure because I believe it gives all the relief which a creditor should ask. It confines acts of bankruptcy on the part of the debtor to actual fraud, and it provides for involuntary bankruptcy, and is less harsh in its provisions than the present House bill. I vote for it because, if a bankruptcy bill is to pass, I prefer it to the House bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRODERICK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STRODE].

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I regard the measure which is now under consideration by the Committee of the Whole House as one of great importance to the people in all parts of the country—of as great importance, perhaps, as any measure that has been before this House during the present session of Congress. By reason of the great panic of 1893 and the financial and business depression that has existed from that time to the present, thousands of men engaged in business have become insolvent, and have not only lost or surrendered all their property, or will be compelled to do so in the near future, but are hopelessly overwhelmed with debts which they can not pay. Thousands of our brightest, most energetic and enterprising business men in every section of this country are loaded down with debt which, through no fault of their own, they can not pay. Nothing is to be gained by holding judgments over such men. To do so tends to discourage effort, to paralyze industry, and encourage deception. If these men could be freed from their obligations they would, with their former energy, enterprise, and ability, struggle to start themselves in business again and become the most useful members of the business world, and many of them would in time be able to pay and would pay off obligations incurred prior to their failure. Without the aid of a bankruptcy law this will be impossible in many cases.

One correspondent, writing to me on this subject, aptly says:

If a man can not use his own name and build up a credit on that foundation he becomes a salaried clerk, with little hope of bettering his own condition or doing anything toward paying his creditors.

I represent in part upon the floor of this House one of the great, growing young States of the West. It has made amazing progress during the last twenty-five years or more in all that goes to make a State great. Her progress has resulted in a large degree from the energy, enterprise, and business ability of young men who had small means with which to begin business—men who left the Eastern and Middle States and sought the newer portions of the West. They established for themselves, by their energy, ability, and integrity, a business standing that enabled them to obtain extended credits in building up enterprises adapted to the development of the West. It is this class of men in that part of the West to which I belong who have suffered most from the unlooked-for depression in business and the enormous shrinkage of values that have occurred within the last three and a half years. Most of these men are yet in the prime of life. With an avalanche of debts hanging over them they can not hope to establish themselves in business again. If a proper bankruptcy law is enacted, so that they may make use of its provisions to free themselves, many of them will amass fortunes in the future and become the most useful and valuable members of society. Most of them are honest and will recognize their moral duty to pay their just obligations when they can, although they may be released therefrom by their taking advantage of the provisions of a voluntary bankruptcy law.

Gentlemen have said to this committee during the debate on this bill that there was no demand for the enactment of a bankruptcy law; that their constituents are not demanding the passage of such a law; that they have received no letters or petitions from their constituents asking them to give their support to such a measure. I can not say that. During the short time I have been a member of this House I have received about fifty letters and several petitions from the people of my district urging upon me the necessity for the passage of a bankrupt law by this Congress. These letters and petitions came from men who do not intend to take advantage of such a law, as well as from those who will seek legal relinquishment from their obligations under such a law, if enacted, until they can establish themselves in business again. Some members of this House have said that they would oppose the enactment of a bankrupt law of any kind. I believe it to be my duty to vote for the passage of a proper bankruptcy bill. But I do not want to vote for the passage of a bill that will enable the unjust and unscrupulous creditor to oppress or destroy the unfortunate debtor. The collection laws of the several States give creditors abundant means for the collection of their debts. They do not need the additional assistance of a bankruptcy law for that purpose. It was the abuse of the involuntary provisions of the law of 1867 by this class of creditors that made it so obnoxious that its repeal was demanded by the people and recommended by President Grant in a message to Congress, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] showed to the committee in his speech yesterday.

I have the profoundest respect for and confidence in the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee of this House who framed this bill and reported it, recommending its passage. I know the chairman of this committee, Mr. HENDERSON, stated in his speech day before yesterday that this bill is much more humane in its provisions than the original Torrey bill, and more humane than any bankruptcy law heretofore enacted by Congress. I know he is sincere when he says that he believes this bill will prove a blessing to the country if enacted into law. I have so much confidence in his judgment that I am disposed to follow where he leads in matters presented for consideration in this House. Yet I fear the involuntary features of this bill are too drastic. If it should become a law with all its involuntary features as reported by the committee, I fear it may prove dangerous and damaging to that large class of business men who are unable to meet all their obligations promptly as they fall due. Many men now in business would be found to be insolvent if required to pay all their debts at the present time. There are many men engaged in mercantile business, manufacturing, and other industries in the country who are insolvent, but who keep the interest on their debts paid and manage to get enough out of their business to support themselves. If the financial and industrial interests of the country should be restored to the condition they were in three and a half years ago, these men will not only be able to pay their debts, but will have their business left which they have struggled to establish. The good will of the business, the reputation a man has acquired, the confidence of the public acquired by long-continued honorable dealing, is sometimes worth more to a man than the value of all his property. The enactment of a bankrupt law with drastic involuntary provisions will place the power to destroy all this in the hands of hard-hearted and exacting creditors.

Mr. RAY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. With pleasure.

Mr. RAY. You say that a large number of your merchants are practically insolvent to-day. Now, what keeps them on their feet?

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. The simple fact that their creditors do not enforce collections, I presume.

Mr. RAY. It is the leniency of their creditors.

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. I presume so.

Mr. RAY. Then because their creditors have faith in them, and their creditors, having the right to press them, are lenient under the State laws, do you not suppose that they would be just as lenient under the United States laws? Will not they have the same interest in maintaining their credit?

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. They may have, and they may not. If an Eastern creditor becomes alarmed, believing that he may not be able to collect from his Western debtor, if he gives him an extension of time and the opportunity to become further involved in debt, he may imagine that it would be an easier and more certain way of collecting his claim to force the debtor into bankruptcy before he loses what property he now possesses, or becomes more deeply involved in debt.

Mr. RAY. But the Eastern creditor to-day, if he becomes alarmed, can hasten to your State, institute proceedings for the collection of his debt, and put the debtor into the hands of the sheriff in twenty days or thirty days or whatever time may be required to get a judgment.

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. That may be done under the State law, but—

Mr. WALSH. The creditor does not violate the debtor's personal liberty, though, even if he does do that.

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. No, sir.

Mr. RAY. This bill does not violate his personal liberty.

Mr. WALSH. It permits it to be violated.

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. I was about to say when the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH] interrupted me that the Eastern creditor often refrains from forcing the collection of claims rather than to commence proceedings in the local courts, where the debtor can be served with legal process, when he would not so refrain if the Federal courts are given exclusive jurisdiction in bankruptcy proceedings and an involuntary bankrupt law is enacted. It was because creditors did make frequent and oppressive use of the Federal courts for the collection of their debts that former bankrupt laws became so obnoxious to the people.

Mr. Chairman, I can not in the short time allotted me enter into a discussion of the merits or demerits of this bill in detail. I do not like the involuntary provisions which it contains. I should be glad to give my support to a bill properly framed containing provisions for voluntary bankruptcy only. I do not believe a man ought to be forced into bankruptcy simply because he can not pay all his debts within a short time after they become due. I do not like the second, eighth, and ninth acts mentioned in this bill, for the commission of which bankruptcy proceedings may be maintained. I am willing to support a bill containing a provision for involuntary bankruptcy based upon fraud committed by the debtor, the commission of such fraud to be made an issue of fact, to be first determined by a jury before the debtor can be thrown into bankruptcy. I am informed one or two substitutes will be offered for the pending bill, one of which is intended to provide for a system of purely voluntary bankruptcy, the other containing a provision for involuntary bankruptcy based upon the commission of fraud by the debtor, all its other provisions being for voluntary bankruptcy. I shall vote in favor of one of these substitutes, and if it is voted down, then in favor of the other, if I have an opportunity to do so. If both of such substitutes are voted down I hope the bill under consideration may be amended so that I can see my way clear to vote for it. I listened with deep interest to the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] yesterday in opposition to this bill.

I said a while ago that I had received many letters and several petitions from the people of my district, asking me to support the passage of a bankruptcy law. Some of them say they have examined the Torrey bill and want it enacted into law. Others say, "Give us a voluntary law if you can, but if you can not do that, give us some kind of a bankrupt act that will enable the business men of the country who are overwhelmed with debts, and who still possess physical and mental vigor and are full of enterprise and energy, a chance to get from under the weight of debt that binds them down and renders them helpless." I have one letter here from a lawyer of extensive experience, who practiced under the bankruptcy act of 1867, and in whose judgment I have great confidence. He speaks of the bill under consideration in much the same language used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] in his speech yesterday. This lawyer says he has examined the Torrey bill now pending in Congress. I presume he has examined the bill introduced in the House at this session by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. RAY. Well, let me say right here that the provisions of that bill providing for involuntary bankruptcy have been very much modified by the committee.

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. I sent several copies of the bill to persons living in my home city, in which city the writer of this letter resides, for examination. I will read his letter:

LINCOLN, NEBR., March 25, 1896.

DEAR SIR: I have been requested to write to you my opinion of the Torrey bankruptcy bill now pending in Congress. I can not too strongly condemn this proposed measure, and can only suppose that it has received the indorsement of Nebraska people because they are not familiar with its provisions and did not experience, or have forgotten, the operation of the act of 1867, which in many respects was less objectionable than this measure, but which was so oppressive in its operations as shortly after its enactment to arouse a popular demand for its repeal. A prudently drawn enactment providing for voluntary bankruptcy only would, I should think, be a wise and beneficial measure. But a law containing the involuntary clauses incorporated into this bill would, in my opinion, seriously cripple and impair if it did not substantially ruin the banking, jobbing, and manufacturing interests of this State. That the act of 1867, so long as it remained in force, was effective to this end is very vividly within my recollection, as it must be within that of other lawyers who had a considerable practice in the bankruptcy courts in Nebraska.

There are other respects, which I have not time nor space to mention, in which this bill is equally open to criticism. It is in many ways, in my opinion, the most vicious measure upon this subject which, so far as I know, has been offered in either House of Congress.

Respectfully,

Hon. J. B. STRODE,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

JOHN H. AMES.

Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman whose letter I have just read appears to favor no bankruptcy law unless it be purely voluntary, yet, in all the letters in this large package which I hold in my hand, all of which have been on file in the room of the Judiciary Committee, there is but one other letter suggesting the passage of a purely voluntary bankrupt law. I have here one petition containing the names of about forty or fifty business men living in my Congressional district, praying for the passage of the Torrey bill, the heading to the petition stating that they had examined the same. I will call the attention of the committee to the language used by the writers in some of these letters that gentlemen may know what the people of the West are demanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the bankruptcy bill now before the House has been so thoroughly explained and defended by the other members of the committee that I will not occupy any time in considering its details. The discussion seems now to have narrowed down to the question of the comparative merits of a voluntary system and of a system which has both the voluntary and the involuntary features. That seems to have become the issue, and in the short time allowed me I will confine myself to that issue and to one argument which has not yet been suggested in favor of this bill.

The purely voluntary system of bankruptcy has been advocated upon the ground that it "gives the debtor a chance," that it allows the poor man relief, and thereby appeals to our feelings of humanity and sympathy and as well, perhaps, to our desire for popularity. But it seems to me that is not the true ground upon which even the voluntary system can rightfully be defended. We have no right to pass a law which shall simply benefit and relieve a certain class except for the reason that that law is for the good of the whole. That is the only reason we can properly pass even a voluntary bankruptcy law; not simply because it relieves the bankrupts themselves, but because, by relieving the bankrupts, it releases to the community their energy and activity which would otherwise be kept down under a load of debt.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the same principle must authorize the involuntary system, and the question for us is, Will an involuntary bankruptcy law be for the good of the whole community? I claim that it will.

It is said on the other side that a law which allows involuntary bankruptcy is unfavorable for the debtor class. That is true as to individuals, but I deny that it is true for the class. Unquestionably it is pleasanter for individuals who are insolvent to decide for themselves whether they will become bankrupt or not, and to incur no risk of being forced into bankruptcy. But we must remember that the individuals who fail are but 1 per cent of the whole trading class, and that the other 99 per cent, as well as the rest of the community depending upon them, are the people for whom we ought to legislate. And although this 1 per cent would doubtless prefer to make their own choice whether they should go in or not, it may be better for the whole class that the involuntary system should be allowed and creditors have some voice in the decision. I claim that it is better for this reason: An involuntary bankruptcy law would do more than any other law that we could pass to extend and secure credit in the United States.

Of all the developments of this age of development one of the greatest is the credit system. There is no question that our whole industrial life has been stimulated and promoted by it and to-day depends upon it. Anything which improves credit, which makes it stronger and safer, improves the business of the whole community and every class of the community, and quite as much the debtor class as any other. Any law which strengthens and broadens credit benefits and advances the whole country. If we pass this law allowing involuntary bankruptcy, it is going to vastly strengthen the credit system, not because creditors will use it to any great extent, not that this bill will be or can be used as an engine of oppression, but because under it creditors will have confidence that they are going to be treated upon an equality with all other creditors. That is what creditors want. What they fear is either that debtors will prefer their friends or that other creditors by connivance or by superior shrewdness or harshness will obtain an undue advantage. If each creditor knows that his chance is just as good as that of every other, that he will come in on an equal footing with every other, that if there is insolvency, if there is fraud, if there is preference, he can come in and stand on the same level as all other creditors, he will feel content and he will extend his credit. That will give him a sense of security which nothing to-day does.

The losses which creditors rankle under are not losses from the honest insolvent; they are the losses from fraud, or from preferences, or from the superior unscrupulousness or adroitness of other creditors, where they feel that somebody else has obtained an undue advantage over them. When a creditor sees another creditor anticipate him and seize his share of the assets, then he feels animosity toward that creditor and toward the locality or State that allowed the inequality.

It has been said upon the other side that this law would allow one creditor, more harsh and suspicious and energetic than the rest, to collect his debt by threats of putting the debtor into bankruptcy, and thus the debtor would be oppressed and other creditors would be circumvented, but I maintain that the result of this law would be just the reverse. The trouble to-day is that inasmuch as there is no general insolvent law by which all creditors can come in and share alike, each is suspicious and alert to resort to the collection laws, and thus gain an advantage over the other creditors. The neighboring creditors, who see the danger of the debtor, and who are at hand to avail themselves of attachment laws, take advantage of distant creditors. The large creditors in the big cities, whose business is so extended that they have agents constantly in every locality, are watchful and alert and able to protect themselves, and gain advantages at the expense of the smaller and less informed creditors; and hence it is that this bill is opposed by many of the largest houses in our largest cities, because it will take from them the advantage which their organized system of collection gives them, and take from them their monopoly, and put them on the same footing with smaller houses who can not now afford to maintain such elaborate watchfulness.

Under this bill one creditor can not, except in very small cases, file a petition of bankruptcy. It requires the concurrence of three creditors; so that it absolutely prevents one trying to use the law as an engine to extort payment of his debt—three must combine for the purpose. Moreover, this bill takes away the creditor's main motive for commencing proceedings against his debtor, namely, fear that unless he does so proceed he will lose his fair share of the assets and they will go to others. This to my mind is the great benefit of the bill. While it is in existence all creditors will feel that in emergency they have it in their power to step in and prevent others from unfairly absorbing all the assets. For the creditor does not want his debtor to be a bankrupt; he is of all men most interested to keep him solvent. The attempt is constantly made to consider the creditors and debtors as if they were two distinct classes, necessarily and violently antagonistic. But as a rule their relations are quite the reverse, and are mutually profitable and friendly. Of course, when it comes to a legal contest they are foes; but the creditor dreads that as much as the debtor.

It is for the advantage of the creditor that the debtor should keep on with his business. No one is so selfishly concerned as the creditor in the debtor's success. If he is able to collect his debts as they mature, he wants new debts to be created. If he has loaned money and the contract is performed, he wants to loan it again. If he sells goods and they are paid for, he wants to sell more goods. He does not want the debtor to pay except to borrow or buy again. He is the last one who has an interest in having the debtor fail. Hence the creditor, above all others, will be slow to take advantage of a law of this kind. He, above all others, wishes the debtor to prosper. As long as he feels there is no danger of being taken advantage of, as long as he feels, if insolvency should finally come, his chance is just as good as that of any other creditor, so long he will be glad to allow his debtor to go on and work out his own salvation if he can. And it is that security which this law gives; and hence it will do much to improve the relations between creditors and debtors, to broaden laws, extend credit, reduce interest and profits, and benefit the whole community.

Now, sir, experience tells us better than anything else whether such a measure as this would be harsh or not. In my State we have a law with far more stringent involuntary features than this bill, a law which has been on our statute books for more than half a century. But I have never known of any petition for its repeal. I have never heard complaint that it worked hardship on the debtors. I believe that under our law to-day three-quarters, and I am not sure but nine-tenths, of the insolvencies occurring are voluntary. That law is not used for the injury of the debtor. It is used equitably. Anyone can see by considering the proportion of involuntary cases that it is not the creditors who mainly appeal to it. And its satisfactory operation is shown, too, by the fact that there has never been, so far as my knowledge extends, any movement to suspend or repeal it. It has not worked inequitably. Such a fact, it seems to me, proves more than any theoretical reasoning could that a bankruptcy law with an involuntary feature is not necessarily harsh in its operation upon the debtor. It is useful to the creditors not because they can use it as a threat or engine of oppression, or because they use it frequently, but because its mere existence is a preventive of fraud and gives them confidence and security that in case of stress they can be protected.

We have had what are called "debtor States," who claim that they have suffered at the hands of the "creditor States." Now, I believe that one thing which the "debtor States" want and which would really be for the good of such States is to let the "creditor States," as they call them, understand that in those "debtor States" one creditor should stand on the same footing as every other creditor. What creditors fear, if they are at a distance, is that perhaps local favoritism or friendliness or neighborhood feeling may operate to give them less than their fair share as compared with other creditors. A law of this kind operating over the whole country will create among creditors a feeling that they can in any event get their proportion in any distribution which may be made of a debtor's estate, and will much improve the credit of the debtor States.

There are some persons who will not consider this an advantage. One able member discussing this bill said that he believed all credit was injurious, and that it would be better for the country if there were no credit system. If he was speaking as a philosopher, this might be true. It is possible that a country purely agricultural, where each man is able to supply all his own simple wants and aspires to nothing more, may be the most prosperous and secure. A return to the shepherd life of Arcadia might be the best for the happiness of the world, but we certainly are not sent here to legislate on any such principles. We are sent here to promote as far as possible the great industrial life of the country, and as far as possible to make its results felt and enjoyed equally in every section of the country, and one great method of accomplishing that, and of giving to remote regions the advantages of the large centers, and in improving the mutual relations and commercial dealings of different sections is this bill, with the great strengthening of the credit system which it will accomplish by assuring creditors fair and equal treatment.

Mr. BRODERICK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY].

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, the question before the committee is one of very grave importance, so grave, in fact, that I regret that more time has not been allotted to its discussion.

I am not opposed to all bankruptcy legislation, but I am opposed to the bill pending before the committee. I am opposed to it because I do not believe that it is in the interest of the great majority of the people. If the argument of the gentleman who has just taken his seat is well founded, then assuredly no legislation in this direction can be regarded as necessary. If creditors above all others will be slow to take advantage of a law of this character, then there is no occasion for its passage, because nobody else is asking for it. It is with unfeigned regret that I make this statement, because I would not willingly or lightly antagonize the recommendation of a committee for whose chairman and membership I have so high a regard as I have for the chairman and membership of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill is said to be in the interest of debtors. That has always been the pretense upon which bankrupt laws were founded. If it were true, if the experience of the past had demonstrated the truth of that pretense, then we might have as evidence of it at least one petition, or, if not a petition, a letter from some one debtor throughout the length and breadth of this great land of ours asking the enactment of a bankruptcy law. But there is no such petition. There is no such letter. There has never been any such letter or petition sent to any legislative body on earth, and never will be, in my opinion.

It may be that it is better for the business interests of the country to occasionally take a sponge and to a degree wipe out existing indebtedness. To that extent perhaps a bankruptcy law voluntary in its character is desirable. If an involuntary feature is added, it should in my opinion be confined to the commission of actual fraud by the debtor, the proving of which should be carefully guarded. Such a law, if not a good thing, might at least not be an unmixt evil.

We have been cited to the fact that since the repeal of the last bankruptcy law enacted in this country, in 1867, the failures in business have amounted to more than 171,000. We have had our attention directed to the fact that the liabilities of those 171,000 failures amounted to more than $2,600,000,000, and that therefore a law of this kind is a necessity.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it would be equally as fair and more logical to say, in response to that statement, that inasmuch as the growth and progress of this country since the repeal of the bankrupt law of 1867 has been unexampled in the history of nations, therefore the absence of bankrupt laws from the statute books of the country has been among its greatest blessings.

Why, sir, as an offset to the twenty-six hundred millions of liabilities involved in the failures in the United States since 1878, I call your attention to the fact that there has been a growth in wealth during the same period of twenty-seven thousand millions of dollars.

Now, it is estimated that no more than an average of 25 per cent of the liabilities of the failures in the country is ever paid, leaving 75 per cent as a total loss. The statement of the proposition answers itself. The loss is very largely apparent, rather than real. If it is true that there had actually been abstracted from the channels of trade and commerce and from the industries of the country, through its business failures of the past eighteen years, the enormous aggregate of more than eighteen hundred millions of dollars, the growth of the country and the expansion of its trade, about which there is no question, would have been impossible. But the people who are constantly extending credit in the management of their business have learned by experience the per cent of loss likely to occur, and that per cent is largely, if not wholly, discounted by adding it to the credit extended.

To prove the soundness of these observations it needs only to be remembered that the withdrawal of twelve hundred millions from the sum paid the wage earners in 1892 produced the terrible panic of 1893.

Now, upon the question as to whether a bankrupt law is a necessity. I do not believe it is. The experience of the past eighteen years, and of nearly a century preceding that, seems to me to be conclusive upon that point. Still, I would not oppose the enactment of a voluntary system of bankruptcy; on the contrary, I would support it, and would even go further than that, and include an involuntary provision confined to the commission of fraud on the part of the debtor. I would support that sort of a bill, but the pending bill, with nine specific acts of bankruptcy, five of which may be committed without any act of dishonesty or fraud, ought not in my opinion to be enacted into law. The object of the law ought not to be lost sight of and swallowed up in a mad scramble for the collection of debts. Debts ought to be paid, but manifestly they can not all be paid in a day or a month, and laws intended to aid their collection ought to consider the welfare of the debtor as well as the creditor. Both are entitled to and should receive fair treatment.

The history of bankruptcy legislation is intensely interesting and deserves to be carefully studied. The administration of bankrupt laws is an almost unbroken history of misfortune in which the unfortunate debtor has been compelled by the remorseless arm of the law to drink the bitterest dregs of the cup of sorrow due to business reverses. But it is not so much the history of past laws or of their execution that we have to do with in the present instance. It is the scope and purpose of the present bill, and the past is valuable only to the extent that it may enable us to reach a correct conclusion.

I want to remark in passing that all of the bankruptcy legislation of the past, whether of our own or of other countries, was enacted for the purpose of aiding the creditor to collect his debts, and always under the pretense that it was meant to help the debtor by placing him again upon his feet. As a matter of fact, the debtor was not taken into account except as a source of supply.

The time has been when going into debt was regarded by both the makers and the executors of the law as close akin to the commission of crime. That feeling has not yet entirely disappeared from the earth, although it has been much modified by the wide dissemination of sound principles of both morals and business. Bankrupt laws had their origin in the sentiment that the man who owed and could not pay when the debt was due was of necessity a scoundrel and should be treated as such. In the estimation of the wise and virtuous founders of bankrupt courts an honest debtor was an absurd and incomprehensible being, to be found possibly in the pages of fiction, but never to be met with in practical life. That the most recent legislation upon that subject was the outgrowth of a sentiment somewhat modified from the original by the injection into it of the more humane teachings of the modern school may be conceded. The extraordinary diffusion of intelligence among the people in recent years has enabled man to know more of himself and, as a result, to be more lenient toward his fellows. There has, in consequence, been a general lifting up of humanity to a broader and better plane.

Bankrupt laws have been, in the main, if not wholly, extraordinary enactments for the collection of debts. They have been not inaptly termed thumbscrews, placed in the hands of the creditor to enable him to torture the unfortunate debtor into making his tale of bricks whether he had any straw or not. That the present bill is better than its predecessors is due to the influences I have mentioned and to the spirit of Christian kindness that pervades the excellent gentlemen who constitute the Judiciary Committee. But it is not yet in accord with the prevailing sentiment of the age, nor is there, so far as I know, any widespread demand among the people for the enactment of a law of this kind; and in its present shape I sincerely hope it will be defeated. I have not received a single letter from the district I have the honor to represent urging me to support this bill or any bill proposing to bring back again the paraphernalia and the oppression of bankrupt courts. And yet there are in that district a number of towns and cities of 5,000 to 30,000 people, and in no other district in the United States is there a higher grade of commercial intelligence or a more thorough knowledge of the wants of the business world. In the absence of any such request, I have a right to assume that there is not a burning desire existing there for the enactment of this bill, or, for that matter, of any bill upon this subject.

The people of Missouri are the equal in patriotism, integrity, and honor of any people on the earth, and it may be that they have an abiding faith in their ability to manage the matter of making and collecting debts in the State without the aid of any laws other than those provided by their own legislature. I am of opinion, however, that they would approve a law enacted by Congress under the authority granted in the Constitution, which was equally fair to the debtor as to the creditor, and under the operation of which an honest man could not be forced into bankruptcy for the commission of a legitimate and honest act. A law of that sort would afford all the relief that ought to flow from a bankruptcy law without permitting the acts of oppression which would be easily possible under the drastic provisions of the bill under consideration.

I have heard it said here that the reason the bankruptcy law of 1800 was repealed within less than four years after its passage and that of 1841 within less than two years was chiefly the undeveloped condition of the country and the consequent great inconvenience to which debtors were put on account of the long distances they were compelled to travel to the Federal courts and the very slow and imperfect means of transportation.

That may have been the reason on the surface, but beneath the surface there was another reason of more potency.

The cause for the enactment of 1800 was in the fact that the war of the Revolution had left the country impoverished and almost everybody deeply in debt. Owing to the undeveloped condition of the country the process of recuperation was very slow and taxed the patience of creditors to the point of breaking. The law was enacted to meet the demand of creditors, and the debtors were lulled to sleep by the promise that the law would prove a blessing to them by lifting the burden of debt from their shoulders and placing them again upon their feet. It took less than four years of its practical working to dispel the illusions that had been woven around it, and it was repealed in obedience to the almost universal demand of the people. It neither collected debts nor restored debtors. What it did do was to fasten the opprobrious name of bankrupt to a number of the patriot fathers, who through no fault of their own had been unable to keep out of the machinery of the bankrupt court. The practical working of the law produced a storm of indignation among the people, and it was repealed to allay the storm.

What was true of the law of 1800 was also true of the law of 1841, which was enacted while the country was yet struggling with the terrible effects of the panic of 1837. It was repealed in less than two years for reasons similar to those which secured the repeal of the law of 1800.

The law of 1867 was enacted to meet conditions then new to the business world of the United States, and which conditions were either produced by or were the source of an almost universal mania for speculation. Money, always conservative, felt its safety endangered amid the rapid changes taking place in business circles. And these changes were not confined to speculators. Merchants and bankers who had established reputations for cool, calculating, and conservative judgment had grown wild under the operation of the influences at war with successful business. Far-seeing and sagacious men doubtless saw the culmination of the mad scramble for fortunes born on the cast of a card, and hoped to stem the evil tide by the bankrupt enactment of 1867. It is impossible to say what the result would have been had the law followed the panic of 1873 instead of preceding it, but my opinion is that if it had been enacted in 1877 instead of 1867 it would not have remained a law any longer than did the enactment of 1841. The panic of 1873 diverted the attention of the people from the bankrupt law and the bankrupt courts, and undoubtedly added a number of years to its life.

Certainly the country was not in an embryotic or undeveloped condition in 1878, which has been alleged as a reason for the repeal of the law which had then been in operation eleven years. It is true that there are a greater number of Federal courts now than then, and they are nearer to the people and the people are more familiar with them. But it will not be contended that that fact of itself furnishes a sufficient reason for repealing the law. Some additional reason must be found, and I do not think it is difficult to find. My recollection of the experience I had as a practicing lawyer while that law was in force, part of the time as a register in bankruptcy, and the experience of the people among whom I lived warrant me in saying that as the wounds made by the panic began to heal and business began to resume its accustomed channels there remained little or nothing to divert the attention of the people from the iniquitous operations of the bankruptcy law, and they began to clamor for its repeal. The more they learned of its operations the more indignant they became, until the demand for its repeal was almost universal. I believe the only exceptions to that demand were the court officers and such practicing attorneys as had a large share of the business growing out of the operations of the law.

It became apparent that it was but a collecting machine and was extremely imperfect and defective in that respect. While it was used without remorse by creditors to compel debtors to find and pay over money whether they had it or not, the expenses of administration of such estates as were found consumed so large a per cent of the assets that even the creditors finally joined the ranks of the enemies of the law and became as earnest as the rest of mankind in their demand for its repeal. During the eleven years of its existence Congress had in it a number of very able men, and effort after effort was made to amend it so that its operation might at least seem to be consistent with the theory of its construction. I have a right to assume that these efforts to amend were earnest and made with a sincere desire to find a common ground in the law upon which debtor and creditor could meet as friends; a point where the rights of the debtor to his business and his property ceased and the rights of the creditor began as a matter of moral as well as legal right, and that this point could be arrived at in the law without injury to the debtor or to his business, and with full consideration for the rights of the creditor. The effort was in vain; it could not be done. At least it was not done. On the contrary, positive injury was inflicted upon both creditor and debtor by the dissipation of estates through the absorbing power of cost. Estates that I believe could have been made to pay from 40 to 75 per cent on their liabilities under the assignment laws of Missouri were absorbed by the fee-bill sponge until they did not pay 10 per cent of the liabilities of the bankrupt.

Many an honest man went down beneath the heavy hand of the law of 1867 to rise, if at all, only after the best years of his life had been wasted in fruitless effort. With rare exceptions, to rise in business again the bankrupt was compelled to seek a new field and a new atmosphere, where the taint of the bankrupt court was not upon his trail and where the brand was not visible to the people with whom he associated. Struggle against it as you may, declaim against it as unworthy of the age if you will, the fact remains that the term bankrupt is not a title of respect, and it is not at all likely that it ever will be. The argument in favor of a bankrupt law, therefore, which attempts to strengthen itself by the promise of restoring the discharged bankrupt to the commercial and business circles of the country must first invent a means by which the sting of the opprobrious epithet may be at least softened, if not eliminated.

If the law of 1867 had any good points or produced any good fruits they were never placed on exhibition. Whether purposely or not, they were concealed, while the evil results were visible on every hand.

A large number, perhaps a majority, of the business men of to-day have a personal recollection of the operation of the bankruptcy law of 1867. Perhaps their memory supplies them with as complete a knowledge as they care to have of the bankruptcy legislation of the past, and that instead of history they would like to have as much information as possible of the bill under consideration, what it proposes to do and how it proposes to do it, so far as that may be reasonably determined in advance of the practical administration of the law.

The professed purpose of every bankrupt law ever enacted was to benefit the debtor. Now, while I have the highest respect and esteem for the wisdom and the sincerity of my friends who are supporting this bill, I may be allowed to say that, in my humble opinion, all the benefits that will ever come to the debtor under the practical workings of a law with the provisions of this bill could be stuck in the corner of his eye without extending it or in any way interfering with his vision.

But I said a moment ago that the country was no longer in an undeveloped condition in 1878, and that such condition, therefore, can not fairly be offered as a reason for the repeal of the law, since it did not exist. At that time the nation had a population of nearly 50,000,000 people and about forty-three thousand millions of wealth. There were over 8,000,000 dwellings; 4,000,000 farms, with 284,000,000 acres improved; with farm values amounting to more than eleven thousand millions, and farm products equal in value to twenty-two hundred millions; with two thousand seven hundred millions invested in manufactures, employing 2,700,000 operatives and turning out over five thousand millions' worth of products in a year. With these elements of growth and progress, of industrial and commercial activity, the occasion for the repeal of the law of 1867 must be sought for in some other direction. Whenever the cause is sought with an earnest desire to find it, I do not doubt that it will be found in the maledictions of the people and their imperious demand for its removal.

There was a time in the history of the world when the debtor who failed to pay his obligation promptly when due was regarded as a sort of moral monster, fit only to be caught by the machinery of the law and ground to powder. For the good of the world, to enhance its progress and lift up its people, that period has passed away forever, and the debtor of to-day, if there is no other charge against him, can hold up his head and stand side by side with his creditor, demanding and receiving equal consideration and respect. This change of sentiment is of modern growth, and under its operation trade and commerce have expanded and grown to a magnitude undreamed of while the illiberal and cruel laws and policies of the past prevailed.

The world has broadened in its views in proportion as it has acquired information. Curiously enough when the poor debtor was on the rack, men were burned at the stake and otherwise tortured for opinion's sake. It was a crime in those days to believe that the earth revolved on its axis, and it is to be regretted that an occasional remnant of the old philosophy yet exists. Truth is mighty and will prevail, but it takes time. Its forces are often deficient in discipline and difficult to manage, while the cohorts of falsehood are always in martial array and ready to be hurled at a moment's notice in any direction and against any invading truth.

As the years have marched along in stately procession it has been discovered that the progress of the world, whether in commerce, in the mechanic arts, or in the industries, was very largely due to the world's debtors. This mighty truth was not discovered in a day, but it was so forcibly presented year after year in the world's transactions that recognition of it could not be avoided. Every movement the result of which has been to give the world an impetus forward had behind it an army of aspiring and ambitious young men, who were not satisfied with things as they found them, whose intellectual energies grasped a scheme or schemes of improvement, whose nerve backed up their judgment as to results, and who to obtain results boldly enlisted in the army of debtors and gave to their country and to the world the imperishable benefits which all enjoy, and which ought to consign their names to a halo of glory instead of the pillory of a bankrupt court.

Illustrations of this truth are so numerous and striking that it would be an idle waste of time to stop and cite them. No man can draw a truthful picture of the world's progress and leave out of it the great toiling army of the world's debtors. Capital is a useful implement, absolutely essential in every field of human effort, but, as a rule, in the hands of those who own it it "toils not, neither does it spin." To be of value to the world it needs transplanting; but, like many another thing of value, in order to gain in possibilities it must take on an element to which in the old field it was a stranger—the element of hazard. In the old field, while accomplishing nothing, it was secure. In the new field, where the possibilities of achievement are immeasurable, it is constantly liable to assault, very often from forces against whose approach no care can guard and in the breath of whose presence fortunes take instant wing. Yet without this element of hazard, as the world is constituted, progress would be impossible. Bankrupt laws are enacted to reduce the degree of loss, and therefore the risk, not to the men who incur the liability and who have staked their all, but to the men who furnish the money and who seldom if ever stake all in a single enterprise.

But having said this much on the subject generally, I desire now to address myself to the pending bill, which I am assured by its friends is in the interest of the debtor—provided he is honest—but in the interest of the creditor if he is dishonest.

In section 2 of the proposed law there are eight specific acts of bankruptcy, one having been struck out by the committee. In most of them insolvency is a condition precedent, apparently without regard to whether the condition does or does not exist. It is contended that the debtor is protected against an improper or false charge of insolvency by the definition of the term in the first section. Let us see: A owes B; the debt is not paid when due. B waits what he regards as a reasonable time and files a petition alleging the second specific act of bankruptcy, to commit which the debtor must be insolvent. Suppose it is discovered upon a trial of the issue that, notwithstanding his failure to secure the release of property levied upon, his assets exceed his liabilities and that he is therefore solvent. Your law has in the meantime dragged him into court, perhaps at a distance from his place of business, has compelled him to be at considerable expense, and has injured his character and standing and partially or wholly prostrated his business.

The question of insolvency becomes a case in court and carries with it the features of litigation usual in all cases and which are seldom pleasant to suitors or jurors, and, in addition, it would have inquisitorial features of the most virulent character. For the purpose of determining the matter of insolvency every act of the unfortunate debtor, real or imaginary, would become the subject of inquiry and subsequent criticism. Whether relating to the matter in hand or not, it would be tortured into a bearing upon it, and acts concerning the acquisition or disposal of property, entirely innocent of any taint of fraud, would be made to do service in some way, to the serious injury of the debtor. After all this, after his private affairs have been made public, after he has passed through days of torture, after his character has been blackened by innuendo, after his business has been impaired, the evidence is found to be insufficient to establish insolvency, and he is discharged and permitted to gather up the debris of the wreck that has been strewn about the court and return to his home, from which he would never have been taken but for a law like this. And this, we are assured, is for the benefit of the debtor.

How considerate the law which provides a way by which a creditor may involve his debtor in months of trouble and large expense for no better reason than to show the falsity of the allegation of insolvency, and how delightful must be the Christian charity of a law which assures an unfortunate debtor after he has been harried by the kind and considerate proceedings to which it has given rise, after his good name has been blackened, after his business has been seriously impaired, that it was enacted for his good! The inventor of the guillotine always contended that his machine was for the good of society, but the poor devil whose neck was bared to its descending knife was allowed the very poor consolation of differing, in the peace and quiet of the grave, with the opinion of the inventor. Possibly the poor debtor, after he has paid the penalty of exciting the wrath of some merciless creditor, may be permitted to contemplate in a respectful sort of way the beauties of the system of which he is the much-vaunted beneficiary.

This spirit of kindness toward the debtor runs through the bill. Another strong evidence of it is in the provision which makes the transfer of property by a debtor while he is insolvent an act of bankruptcy. He may at the time, in his opinion, have property enough to pay all of his indebtedness, but, in the tenderness of this bill for his welfare, that would count for nothing. One creditor out of ten makes up his mind that he knows what the debtor's liabilities are and what his assets are worth, and that the value of the latter is not equal to the amount of the former; and knowing of the sale and transfer by him of a horse, or a cow, or a hog, or a sheep, or some other piece of property, files his petition, alleging the transfer, and of course the condition precedent, insolvency, which makes it an act of bankruptcy. The trial might disclose that at the time of the transfer a fair valuation of the debtor's property would establish his solvency, but the provisions of this bill are so kind to the debtor that four months are allowed to the creditor within which to file his petition alleging the transfer, and the proof must relate to the date of filing the petition. Some misfortune might have swept away a large portion of the debtor's property between the time of making the transfer and the date of filing the petition, which would make the transfer—an entirely legitimate and innocent transaction at the time it was made—an act of bankruptcy at the date of filing the petition. But it is alleged that the transfer must be made for the purpose of giving a preference. If the man to whom the transfer was made was a creditor at the time, although the indebtedness was but the balance due on an open account, it would be practically impossible for the debtor to rebut the presumption that he intended to give a preference.

Let us take an actual case for the purpose of illustrating this point. A man is engaged in the retail grocery business. On the 1st day of May he owes $5,000 and has assets worth $6,000. He is then solvent within the meaning of the bill. A part of his indebtedness is due to farmers and gardeners, with whom he keeps an open account, selling them goods and buying produce from them, settling whenever it suits the convenience of himself and his customers. On the 1st day of May he sells one of his farmer creditors, to whom he owes $100 for produce, $50 worth of goods. Three months and a half afterwards a wholesale grocer to whom he owes $500 learns of the sale to the farmer and immediately files his petition alleging insolvency, and that the sale was made for the purpose of giving a preference. The debtor might, between the date of making the transfer and the date of filing the petition, have met with losses that impaired his solvency, or his property might be unfairly appraised. In either case he would be forced into bankruptcy, not because he had violated any law, either of God or man, but because he had been making an honest effort to do a legitimate and successful business.

Under the second subdivision of section 2 an attachment is levied upon a debtor's property. If it is not released within thirty days it becomes malignant and grows into an act of bankruptcy. To avoid the perdition of a bankrupt court he transfers to the attaching creditor to pay the debt and release the writ, or to some other person to whom he is indebted, but who has faith enough in his integrity to let him have the money, a piece of property. The writ is released, but under the operation of the machinery of this bill the poor dupe of a debtor would but have pulled himself off of one horn of the dilemma to be impaled upon another. He would have escaped from the second subdivision to be caught in the meshes of the fifth. He would have torn himself away from Scylla to be dashed to pieces against Charybdis.

But the teeth of this bill have not yet all been exposed. A debtor is sued. He has no defense against the note or account and suffers a judgment to be entered against him because he can not prevent it. Having allowed the judgment to be entered against him, he learns that he has committed an act of bankruptcy. He casts about him for the means of satisfaction. He has property that he could dispose of without impairing his solvency, but the same law that injected the poison of fraud into an innocent act prohibits him from satisfying the judgment by a sale of any of his property or from the proceeds of such sale. The "intent to defeat his creditors," intended as a protection to the debtor as against unjust and utterly unfounded petitions, would be found of little practical value. It will be noticed that insolvency is not an essential element in an assignment in bankruptcy under the sixth subdivision of the section. A debtor might have property worth three or four times the amount of his liabilities without having the money to prevent a suit and the recovery and entry of a judgment against him. The judgment having been entered, it needs only to be alleged that he suffered it for the purpose of defeating his creditors in order to lift it to the dignity or reduce it to the malignancy of a full-fledged act of bankruptcy? Perhaps he might be acquitted upon a trial, but from what source would he be compensated for the actual losses sustained? The language of the subdivision referred to is as follows:

(6) Procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself with intent to defeat his creditors, and suffered same to remain unpaid until ten days before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy: Provided, That a payment or satisfaction of such a judgment by a sale of any of the debtor's property, or from the proceeds of such a sale, shall not be deemed a payment of such judgment under the provisions of such section.

The language of the paragraph speaks for itself, and is fairly descriptive of an ancient engine of torture, in the coils of which every movement of the victim served but to increase his pain.

But there is yet another subdivision to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. The eighth subdivision of the section under consideration reads:

(8) Suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such execution shall be paid before a petition is filed.

In construing the first paragraph of section 2 the second paragraph must be kept in mind, which permits the creditor to file his petition alleging any of the acts of bankruptcy specified so far as they relate to the transfer of property or its seizure upon legal process, or the rendition of judgment against the debtor at any time within four months after the commission of the act alleged, or after having suffered it to be done. It should be remembered also that insolvency is always a condition to be proven to the satisfaction of a jury, and necessarily involves time, trouble, and expense, to say nothing of damaged business standing and character, for which there is no compensation. The paragraph, therefore, should read: "If while suspected of insolvency the debtor suffers an execution against himself for $500 or over to be returned no property found he shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, unless the execution shall be paid before the petition is filed." The paragraph should read that way, for the reason that the condition of insolvency is, as has been stated, always a question to be inquired into and determined after the petition is filed. Now, an execution may be issued against a solvent as well as an insolvent debtor. It has been done a great many times under State laws and would, I think, be possible under a national law, the difference being that under State laws the consequences would be a great deal less serious. Besides, a perfectly solvent debtor may have less than $500 worth of personal property. He may have a large amount of real estate, and it may be necessary to return the execution no property found in order to reach the real estate. Under the provision I am considering it would be equally an act of bankruptcy. Suppose it is suggested that the debtor might himself dispose of a portion of his real estate and pay off the execution, and thus relieve himself of the danger of being forced into bankruptcy. It is only necessary to call attention to the fifth subdivision of the section to show that while avoiding one danger he would be but courting another.

I do not believe that this collection machine was cunningly devised so that the cogs would fit into each other in this cold-blooded way. I can not believe that. It is impossible that men endowed with humane hearts and inspired with the sentiments of the good Samaritan—as I know them to be—rather than with the sentiments of the mercenary people who looked at the prostrate and bleeding form of the poor fellow who fell among thieves and then passed by on the other side, could deliberately plan a collection machine, however desirable such a machine may be, that would compel a large majority of the business men of the country to pass through a bankrupt court whether they wanted to or not; that would transform legitimate and honest acts, done in the line of business, into knocks on the door of bankruptcy and invitations to be shoved in. The bill has many good features, if a system of involuntary bankruptcy can be regarded as having good features, and the bad features to which I have called attention are no doubt the result of a constant and too close watchfulness to prevent a debtor who has started downhill from checking his speed and getting a breathing spell and possibly starting back toward the top of the hill again by using some of his own property for that purpose. It was argued doubtless that if judgment was entered against a debtor and he was permitted to pay it off that in that way he might succeed in giving some creditor a preference. The ghost of preference must have been a constant attendant at the table of the committee, and will have to bear the responsibility for the harsh and cruel features of section 2 and for some other portions of the bill which had to be written in harmony.

It is believed, in the matter of expenses connected with the administration of bankrupt estates, that the bill under consideration is an improvement upon the law of 1867, and yet a careful examination of its provisions reveals possibilities in that direction which, should the bill become a law, might in a short time rob it of much of its supposed virtue in that regard.

It should be noted, Mr. Chairman, that the liabilities of the failures of 1895 are but little in excess of 1894 and less than half those of 1893. It must be apparent, therefore, that the country has started in the right direction without the aid of a bankrupt law, and out of sheer inability with its vital forces to remain at the bottom. It should be noted also that in a number of the States the liabilities of the failures of 1879, the year following the repeal of the last bankrupt law, amounted to a larger sum than did the liabilities of the same States for the year 1895. In quite a number of other States the amount of the liabilities for 1895 is about the same proportion greater than in 1879 as the volume of business is greater. It would seem, therefore, to be a reasonable conclusion that 1879 was not benefited in its business channels by the bankrupt law which had just been repealed, and that 1895 was not injured by the absence for eighteen years of any such law.

A great deal of eloquence has been given to the consideration of this theme during the progress and growth of the Republic. Much stress has been laid upon the responsibility and duty of Congress growing out of the constitutional provision, in spite of the fact that the provision may easily be accounted for without regarding it as an effort to give vitality to the great Declaration of Independence touching the inalienability of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. If the beatitudes of a bankrupt law will open up such a vista of happiness to the otherwise bedeviled debtor as it is pretended they will, why is he so utterly blind to the fact? If he is "stripped of all motives to human exertion, with the incubus of an immovable mass of debt upon him, surrounded by a family sharing, without being able to alleviate, his sorrows and sufferings," and if an involuntary bankrupt law can lift that "immovable mass of debt" that is crushing him, why in the name of all those eloquent gentlemen does he not get up and say so? Why does he remain as dumb as an oyster in the presence of proffered blessings of such rare excellence and great magnitude? Is he wedded to his misery, or is he incapable of perceiving the happiness offered him and which he has only to reach out his hand to take? May it not be possible that he is wiser than are his eloquent friends, and that, sugar-coated as the scheme may be, he feels a natural and justifiable repugnance to placing himself and his business under the constant surveillance of a law that allows an honest business transaction to be transformed into an act of bankruptcy?

If the object and purpose of the law is to benefit the debtor, and through his restoration to a condition of financial soundness benefit the country, a voluntary bankruptcy law would accomplish the desired result. If, however, it is proposed to enact an extraordinary remedy for the collection of debts, in the operation of which the unfortunate debtor is to be assigned the rôle of helpless victim, it should be frankly so stated. The objections urged against a voluntary bankruptcy law can not be well founded, for they assume that the shrewdness of a scoundrel would enable him to use its provisions to obtain credit and then to escape from the liability; in other words, to play a succession of successful bunco games upon the innocent and unsuspecting creditor.

That class of creditors disappeared from the earth some years ago, and if the meshes of the law can not be so arranged that they will hold a debtor who voluntarily puts himself within them until his exact status can be determined, until it is known whether he is entitled to a certificate as an honest man or a ticket of leave as a rogue, it is a confession of weakness that is well calculated to place the entire scheme under the ban of suspicion.

Take the pending bill and strike out its involuntary features and then set it in motion. The instant a debtor begins practicing dishonesty and fraud he renders the law powerless to aid him.

Should he prepare for bankruptcy, as it is alleged he would do, he could not avoid making an index that would lead to his detection and prevent his discharge. If this reasoning is not sound the bill in its entirety would prove a failure, for the reason that the same scoundrel could, with the same ease and the same success, prepare for and file his petition to be adjudged a voluntary bankrupt, and secure his discharge with equal facility under the provisions of this bill whether section 2 is left or struck out. A system of involuntary bankruptcy will have all the benefits and all the evils of such system, whether operated alone or in conjunction with involuntary bankruptcy, as in the pending bill. If the object and purpose of the proposed legislation is to lift from commerce and the industries a burden of indebtedness that has become too heavy to carry; if its purpose is to restore confidence through a restoration of credit, and in that way rebuild the foundation upon which alone prosperity can be secured and retained, it would seem that the welfare of debtors should receive the first consideration.

But is the time opportune for the enactment of any system of bankruptcy, and more especially for the enactment of an involuntary system? Under the provisions of this bill it is the duty of the trustees to reduce the assets of the bankrupt to money as speedily as possible. At present there is no sort of property that will sell at a forced sale except at a ruinous sacrifice. Assets fairly worth enough to pay 100 cents on the dollar of the liabilities would be contracted by the forced methods of reduction until they would not pay 50 cents on the dollar. Besides, legitimate business would be seriously retarded and crippled by loading the market with immense quantities of goods at a price impossible to compete with. In the sale of goods a merchant has never been able to compete with the marshal, the sheriff, or the constable. The business of the former will not thrive unless the goods are sold at a profit, while the business of the latter thrives most when the loss is greatest. Evidently the desire for the return of business prosperity is incompatible with a desire for the passage of the pending bill. When men want water to flow, they do not build a dam across its pathway. Forced sales of property are always inopportune when money is scarce, and a law which would promote them, instead of aiding the country toward a return of prosperity, would but plunge it into deeper depths of commercial and industrial disaster.

It is but natural to conclude, as we look out upon the people struggling under a load of indebtedness they are unable to pay, that the load ought to be lifted and the people relieved. That conclusion is irresistible and nearly unanimous. The differences arise when an effort is made to provide methods and measures of relief. No one would deliberately add to the distress, and yet it is impossible to see how that result could be avoided under the operation of an involuntary bankrupt law enacted and set in motion under monetary conditions such as prevail to-day. It is not unreasonable to say that one of the chief virtues of the committee's bill—the diminution of expenses—would be speedily transformed into a grievous fault. The officers having no further use for an estate when once safely landed in court, their several fees having already been determined, would at once begin looking around for other victims, their income depending solely upon the number of estates.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I stand here to appeal for the people. It is a mistake to suppose that prosperity can be restored by firing the debtors of the country from the catapult of a bankrupt court. Individual indebtedness is less in amount now than it was two years ago or one year ago. Confidence is returning gradually. The croakers are retiring into the shadow as the dawn of a better day, already gilding the hilltops, descends into the valleys as the sun of prosperity rises toward the zenith. Do not impede the coming of the day by filling the land with bankrupt officers, bankrupt courts, bankrupt sales, and bankrupts.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Chairman, from the discussion that has already taken place concerning the provisions of the pending bill it is entirely clear that the gentlemen who have addressed the House are all in favor of the voluntary feature of it. It is not, therefore, necessary to enter into any considerable examination of these features, which are provided for the purpose of enabling the debtor who is loaded with debts to apply to the courts for relief upon his own motion. So far the bill seems to be free from any substantial exception. It is only concerning the involuntary system that the objections have been brought to the consideration of the House.

Now, let us see how the debtor stands who may be liable to be proceeded against under the bill, if it shall become a law, in view of the provisions of the State laws authorizing creditors to take proceedings for the collection of their debts. Whenever he fails to meet his obligations he may be sued by his creditor; and if one of his creditors sues him, the others are sure to follow as rapidly as they may be able to serve the processes; and in this manner, if the individual is insolvent, he is not only liable but sure to be broken up in his business, and sooner than by any possibility he could be under the provisions of the enforcement of such an act as this. But we may go further. Suppose he is attempting to assign his property or place it beyond the reach of his creditors when they recover a judgment or judgments against him and the executions are returned unsatisfied, the process they then can pursue is a creditor's bill, or a proceeding supplementary to their executions, upon which search is made for the property of the debtor; and this, when found, is brought before the courts for distribution, and the proceeds divided among the creditors.

When this is all done, and all the property is in this manner found that may be capable of being found belonging to the debtor, the balance of his debts still remain against him, to be held over him for all time, if such is the disposition of the creditor. He is placed in a position, therefore, where he can not engage in business pursuits or substantially help himself by any exertions for the purpose of securing relief. Now, suppose the debtor is guilty, or is chargeable with one or more of the acts of bankruptcy that are mentioned in this bill. Then what is the course that the creditor is entitled to take against him under the State laws in these circumstances? It is not simply to bring a suit against him for the purpose of recovering a judgment before he can seize his property upon execution, but to issue an attachment, because the laws of nearly if not all the States of this Union provide for attachments under those circumstances, and when the creditor makes his affidavit maintaining one or more of these grounds and files his bond as the law requires, he may obtain an attachment without the knowledge of the debtor and seize every item of property not exempt from execution that is within the reach of this process in the hands of the sheriff.

The proceedings which are provided for by these statutes are substantially based on the acts contained in this bill relating to the disposition of his property, or to the absence of the debtor for the purpose of avoiding the service of process upon him, or the concealment of his property, or the confession or allowance of the recovery of judgment against him collusively, for the purpose of seizing and disposing of his property to a friendly purchaser. The State law allows all that to be done by proceedings harshly taken against him under the provisions of the State laws, and he has no remedy whatever.

But even under these circumstances, where his property is seized and sold owing to the fact that he has rendered himself obnoxious to attachment proceedings, his debts are not satisfied unless the proceeds of his property are sufficient to satisfy them, but the balance will still remain against him and hang over him through his life unless it be liquidated in some other manner or compromised through the voluntary action or generosity of his creditors.

This is the position in which a man stands who is a debtor under the laws of the different States, and in the State of Massachusetts the creditor may go still further without assigning any one of these causes; but upon the mere circumstance that a man is in debt and has failed to pay his indebtedness an attachment may issue in the first instance and his property be seized. Now, how does he stand in the bill as it is now before the House?

It is objected to this bill, or to the involuntary part of the bill, that it is cruelly harsh so far as the debtor is concerned. But if you will look at the provisions of the bill you will see that there is no harshness that is in comparison in any degree or in its consequences with the proceedings that may be taken against the debtor under the attachment laws of the different States.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DANIELS. Yes, if you will be brief. My time is short.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Is the failure to pay a promissory note for thirty days a ground for attachment under the laws of these States.

Mr. DANIELS. No, sir.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It is one of the grounds for involuntary bankruptcy.

Mr. HENDERSON. But there must be the element of insolvency also.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. That is one of the questions to be adjudicated.

Mr. DANIELS. Under the laws of the State of Massachusetts it would be a sufficient ground; but suppose it is not. You may sue a man under such circumstances, and recover a judgment against him, and levy an execution and take every cent's worth of property not exempt from execution that he has, and where one creditor sues the others are sure to follow, and the man is no better off in the end; certainly not as well off as he would be under the involuntary proceedings of this bill.

Now, let us see what this bill has provided, because I must proceed rapidly in the consideration of these proceedings. It does not provide for seizing the property of the debtor, as it may be seized under the attachment laws of the different States, or for the arrest of his person, because he may have disposed of his property under a charge that it was designed to defraud his creditor.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but is it not a fact that in order to secure an attachment under the laws of a State a creditor must give an adequate bond?

Mr. DANIELS. I have already stated that. Now, if this bill is matured into law, let us see what the proceeding then will be which can be taken against the insolvent debtor. It is not, as I said before, a harsh or cruel proceeding by any means. A petition is presented to the court or to the referee, if the court refers it to a referee, or the clerk, in the absence of the judge, does so. The debtor then has ten days, under the provisions of this bill, in which to file an answer to that petition, and when he files that answer to the petition he may deny the existence of any or all of these facts or circumstances which are designated in the law as acts of bankruptcy. He can not do that when an attachment is proposed to be issued against him. He has no opportunity to appear in court and question the validity of the proceedings or the right of the creditor to this process; but if the creditor prima facie complies with the laws of the State, he has his writ of attachment as a matter of course, and the debtor's property is seized.

But when the petition is filed, under the provisions of this bill the debtor is in a position to dispute the commission of either or all of these acts of bankruptcy which may be alleged as the ground of proceeding under the petition. He has ten days, by the direct language of this law, to file his answer and deny the existence of the cause or causes upon which it is claimed that involuntary bankruptcy shall be instituted and maintained against him.

So that here, instead of being proceeded against ex parte, without notice to him, and his property actually seized, nothing can be done, no step can be taken which may appear adverse to him in any respect whatever without ample opportunity for resistance. This petition must be served, and he has after that ten days to answer whether there is any ground for the proceedings to be taken against him to put him into involuntary bankruptcy.

Now, if he is guilty of the act or acts charged, then, of course, he has no ground of resistance to the proceeding. If he is guilty, if he has disposed of his property with intent to defraud his creditors; if he has concealed it; if he has absented himself to avoid service of civil process, or done either of these things, why, then, of course, he is obnoxious to the proceeding which the bill provides may be taken against him. But if he is not; if he is in a situation in which he can deny the charge made against him in the petition, and does deny it, then what is the consequence? Why, he not only arrests the proceedings there, but in addition to that he is entitled to a trial of the issue that is made in this manner with his creditors. You can not otherwise proceed. Is there anything like that in the proceedings of a State court if a man is liable to arrest or his property to seizure under attachment? You will find it nowhere in any one of the statutes of the States.

Then you go further, and by section 19 of this bill he is not only entitled to a trial for the purpose of ascertaining whether he is liable to these proceedings or not, but he is at liberty to have a trial by jury; and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STRODE] in addressing the House to-day stated that in case there was an opportunity to try these matters before a jury that then, as I understood him, he saw no objection whatever to the enactment of this bill into law.

The section is this:

A person against whom an involuntary petition has been filed shall be entitled to have a trial by jury, in respect to any act of bankruptcy alleged in such petition to have been committed, upon filing a written application therefor before the expiration of the time in which an answer may be filed.

So that he not only has by virtue of this bill, if it should be enacted, ten days to file an answer and to put the allegations of the petition in issue, but he may also file a written application to the court asking that the issue which is made up in this manner by the petition and answer shall be tried by a jury, and that is another advantage that is not secured to the debtor in attachment proceedings under any of the statutes in the different States of this Union.

In point of fact, every possible precaution seems to have been taken in the bill to prevent these proceedings from being maintained wherever there is not a substantial ground for them. Wherever they may operate harshly upon the debtor he has ample means to go before the court and insist upon a trial, and there, if he chooses, have the matter investigated and determined by a jury.

Now, is it to be supposed that when the man goes before a jury of his neighborhood or of the district that he will be less likely to be protected in his rights than in the State courts? Is that the experience of the members of this House who are lawyers? Is it not true always that juries leniently regard, as far as they can, the rights of the debtor, and protect him against harshness in legal proceedings where the evidence will permit that to be done? It is the experience of every man that has ever had experience in cases of this character that the debtor is not sacrificed, and will not be sacrificed, either by the court or the jury, unless a case is made out against him which authorizes such proceedings as this bill has provided may be instituted and maintained where the debtor is proved to have been guilty of either one of these acts of bankruptcy.

Mr. TERRY. Does the gentleman contend that under this bill they will have the right of jury trial by their neighbors?

Mr. DANIELS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. It is a jury in the bankruptcy court.

Mr. DANIELS. It is in his neighborhood, in his district.

Mr. TERRY. That bankruptcy court may be 400 miles away from his home.

Mr. DANIELS. They are to have trial by jury in the district wherever the charge may be made, because in the United States courts the case must be tried in the district in which the cause of complaint arises; and where a jury is brought before a court, under circumstances of this character, for the purpose of trying such charges, we can see at once that the inclination, the generosity, of the jurors will be in favor of the debtor who is proceeded against rather than in favor of the creditor.

There is this distinction also: Suppose the right to put the man into involuntary bankruptcy is established; then when his property is taken and distributed among his creditors, no matter what the percentage may be, whether it is large or small, he is discharged entirely from every debt that he owes, except those which have been contracted fraudulently or others of an extremely exceptional character; while under the laws of the State, whenever the proceedings are taken and whenever they are consummated, if there is a balance left against him that his property does not pay, that balance must hang over the debtor from the time when the proceedings are ended until his life is ended, unless he finds some other means of satisfying his creditors. These objections urged against this bill must therefore be seen to be wholly unfounded. The proceedings will be a source of relief and liberation to unfortunate men overtaken by financial disaster and rendered unable to pay their debts.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, this brings our side to within seven minutes of the time that has been used on the other side. I will ask the gentleman from Texas to occupy some of his time now, as we shall have but one more speech on this side.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States authorizes Congress to enact a uniform law of bankruptcy, but when you come to the practical matter of framing a law that will be uniform and equitable you encounter very grave obstacles, and it is very difficult indeed to enact a bankruptcy law that will not be used as an engine of oppression or as machinery whereby dishonest men may escape payment of their just debts. Such has been the experience of the people of the United States in the past.

In 1800 we enacted a bankrupt law, but so unpopular did it become when its workings were understood that within three years after its enactment an overwhelming public opinion demanded its repeal. After that we had no bankrupt laws for nearly half a century. The people of the United States had had enough of them. In 1841 we again essayed the experiment of the enactment of a bankrupt law. That was at a time when there had been great distress throughout the land, and it was thought that such a law might be acceptable and useful, but as soon as it was put to work so gross were its inequalities, so great were the frauds and the oppressions practiced under it, that in less than two years it was hastily repealed under the same Administration under which it had been enacted. Then we rested for more than a quarter of a century before we sought to enact another bankrupt law.

After the civil war it was again thought that a bankrupt law would be acceptable to the people of the United States. So in 1867 we passed such a law; but so great were the oppressions and the hardships that resulted from its operation that year after year there came up from all over this broad land a clamor from the American people to repeal that law. Its repeal was resisted from time to time by certain of the mercantile classes, but finally so great had become its iniquities that the great soldier-President of the United States, Ulysses S. Grant, sent a message to Congress recommending its repeal, and it was repealed.

Why, then, sir, at a time like this, again attempt to enact a measure of this kind? It is no time, Mr. Chairman, to be passing bankrupt laws. It is no time to be flying kites when there is lightning in the air. It is no time for passing measures to put the American people virtually in the hands of receivers. This bill, carefully analyzed and looking at what there is back of it, is but another evidence of the grasping greed of the creditor classes of the North and the East, reaching out to gather in and devour the substance of the debtors of the West and the South. For nearly fifteen years, sir, the wholesale dealers in the great centers of trade have been pushing for a measure of this kind, and every session of Congress we behold the familiar features and form of the affable gentleman who, if he has not given a "local habitation," has at least given a name to the "Torrey" bankruptcy bill.

The boards of trade and the chambers of commerce, those same gentlemen who so recently assured us with so much complacency that if we would but repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act prosperity would instantly resume its place in this stricken land—those same gentlemen have again been busy with their set resolutions telling us that what we need now is "confidence," and that the enactment of the Torrey bill, or of some similar measure, will restore us to that very elusive element called "confidence." That, they tell us, is what we need, and inasmuch as the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act did not restore it, this is now the great panacea for all the ills that afflict the people of the United States. And straightway, as soon as these boards of trade and chambers of commerce have sent out their resolutions, they were adopted by other similar boards and echoed and reechoed throughout the land, and hence it is that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STROBE] has been receiving the requests which he speaks of from people in his State in favor of some sort of a bankrupt bill.

I venture to say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman who sent him that request, like the gentlemen who have written similar requests to me to favor a bankrupt bill, have, many of them, no idea of what this bill really is, and if I were to surrender my own judgment in the matter and vote for the bill many of them, when they saw its workings in the community, might probably be among the first to condemn me for having favored its passage.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to make certain statements in regard to this bill—

Mr. CULBERSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he is opposed to a voluntary bankruptcy bill?

Mr. TERRY. No, sir; I would cheerfully vote for a proper voluntary bankrupt bill, enabling struggling debtors to wipe out and commence anew.

Now, as to this bill. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, this bill will increase the financial distress and distrust that already prevail. Persons already struggling with a load of debt will be driven to the wall and crushed remorselessly. Seventy-five per cent of the people of the United States engaged in business to-day are heavily in debt. There is a market of falling prices—such a market that when they purchase they have no assurance that they can begin to realize the cost, with freight and carriage, of what they buy. The same cause that diminishes their profits upon the goods purchased is also diminishing the value of whatever property they have out of which they expect to pay. Under such a condition and with the pitfalls of this bill before their feet, and the open doors of a bankruptcy court before their eyes, where will you find the prudent business man who will want to embark in business with such perils before him? Therefore, instead of relieving financial distress and restoring confidence, you strike down confidence and paralyze business enterprise.

Again, sir, what is it that is to-day enabling this 75 per cent of the business men of the country to keep their feet standing upon the slippery slopes of a market of declining prices? Nothing enables them to keep their feet but the backing of their friends at home—men who know them and have sympathy with them and are trying to extend them help. Pass this bill, and you write upon the sign of every one of these men, "Your local friends dare not credit you"; they dare not give you extensions and take a mortgage for any indebtedness already due them; if they dare to do that, they are liable to lose every dollar so secured. You may be hurled into a bankruptcy court; 40 per cent of your property may be consumed in costs and charges, and your credit ruined without having even the poor recourse of a suit against the man who has ruined you.

Why, sir, this bill, more drastic than any attachment law that was ever framed, will permit your creditor not only to exercise his right of attachment, as before, but to strip you of all your property except your homestead exemptions, to ruin your business, to write the brand of "Bankrupt" across the escutcheon of your commercial honor. And then, although you may have committed no real act of bankruptcy, and the court may finally so hold, you are utterly without redress. Your creditor, who would have to give a bond if he attached your property in the United States court, can by this measure get a more drastic process than the attachment without giving any bond or incurring any liability whatever.

Is this a time for passing such bills as this? I say to you, gentlemen, in all seriousness, that while you have had men clamoring for the passage of this bill under the instigations of boards of trade and chambers of commerce, yet if you enact this kind of a measure and put it into practical operation, denying your citizens the right of trial by a jury of their neighbors, dragging them off anywhere from 25 to 400 miles to appear before a bankruptcy court—if you enact a measure of this kind you will find that the indignation of an outraged people will be visited upon your heads. Do not make any mistake about this matter.

Some men, for whose opinions I have the most profound respect and regard, have written to me in favor of the passage of this bill; but when I contemplate what has been the history of bankruptcy bills heretofore I can not bring my judgment or my conscience to support such a bankruptcy bill at a time like this. It may be a time for the enactment of a voluntary bankrupt law. In the olden time, under the Jewish dispensation, there was, at the expiration of a certain number of years, a period of jubilee, when the debtor was forgiven his debt upon certain terms. So in the history of nations there may come times when you should open the doors of the courts in order that honest debtors may be relieved of the burdens that are pressing them down, in order that their energies may be restored to their country, instead of being crippled and fettered with debt. This is a time for a voluntary bankruptcy law; but it is no time for placing the American people in the hands of receivers.

Mr. LINNEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TERRY. Certainly.

Mr. LINNEY. I observe that under the provisions of this bill the liens of judgment creditors, of mortgage creditors, and in fact all liens, will be preserved in the bankruptcy court, and the assets of the debtor will be distributed pro rata according to the merit or dignity of the different classes of creditors. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman what objection he would have to this bill if the involuntary features should be stricken out?

Mr. TERRY. I have already stated, as the gentleman might have heard if he had listened to my feeble remarks, that I favor a system of voluntary bankruptcy.

Mr. LINNEY. I did not catch that remark.

Mr. TERRY. Now, sir, this bill contains not only those features to which I have hastily referred, but others equally obnoxious. Not only can you take the debtor's property away from him without any bond to compensate for any wrong you may do him, but you may actually take his body and hold it in charge of a marshal for an indefinite time. Turn to section 8, page 12, of the bill, and you will see that this is the fact. Though the bill says that the debtor shall not be put in jail, yet he can be kept in the custody of a marshal, going back and forth at the dictation of one of these petty jumped-up referees. They are to sit in judgment upon the solemn rights of the American citizen—these little referees all over the land who are so anxious for a bill of this kind—these persons who, to use the language of another, are the yelping pack that "bark in the kennels of justice." They want a bill of this kind passed. The men whose grasping greed, already overgrown with wealth, is reaching out for all the earth, would like to have a bill by which they may force their debtors into bankruptcy and gather in the little remnant of their property. They favor a bill that would deprive their debtors of local assistance and the support of their neighbors, and leave them to the tender mercies of their Eastern creditors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] has expired.

Mr. TERRY. I would like a few moments more—two minutes, I think, will suffice.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I say these parties are anxious for a bankruptcy bill. Under the present law, when they run an attachment upon one of their debtors if they falsely sue out a writ they are liable upon a bond. Under a bankruptcy law like this they are liable for nothing. They can use this bill as a cudgel over the heads of their debtors to force from them remorseless exactions. They can, as I have said, deprive them of the assistance of their local friends.

As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] has asked, "Why all this clamor in behalf of those wholesale dealers in the crowded centers?" Have they been victimized by anybody? Have they sold their goods without figuring on a margin of loss? And not only that, but, Mr. Chairman, they have sent their agents around to the little towns and villages and country places throughout the land and painted to the merchants in those places extravagant pictures of the profit to be realized from certain classes of goods, and have actually inveigled them into the purchase of goods that these men would never have thought of purchasing otherwise, giving notice to them that they would extend their obligations; and yet, when the bill, if you enact it into law, goes into effect, if that note given in payment of these goods remains unpaid for thirty days after it is due, they can have all of their property snatched from their custody and placed in the bankrupt court. There are other provisions equally harsh for times like these, but, Mr. Chairman, I have said about all I can say in the limited time allotted to me. The bill is one that ought not to pass in its present shape; it is a bill that should be carefully scrutinized, and I hope every gentleman will consider well before committing himself in favor of its passage.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to speak at some length in advocacy of a substitute which, at the proper time, I shall offer for the pending bill; but I find myself under the treatment of a physician for a throat affection, which renders it imprudent, and perhaps impossible, for me to attempt anything like an extended speech, and I shall be compelled to content myself with a brief and simple statement of the reasons which have induced me to believe that the substitute which I shall offer would be a wiser law than the bill which the committee have reported.

It is well understood that my substitute establishes a system of purely voluntary bankruptcy, while the committee bill establishes a system of both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. Therefore, apart from some details, the choice between the two propositions depends upon the merits or the demerits of involuntary bankruptcy.

If my time and my condition permitted, I think I could advance convincing reasons for my contention that no involuntary bankruptcy law can ever be satisfactory to the people of this country. And yet, sir, it is probably true that if both my time and strength were unlimited, I could not by any argument make that clearer than it has been made by the experience of this country. If my mind were a blank on this question; if in the discharge of my duty I had never been called upon to give it any thought or investigation, the fact that three times in our history a similar law has been tried and each time has proven a failure would be sufficient to deter me from the support of such a measure.

In the early days of the Republic, Congress passed an involuntary bankruptcy law. That law, by its terms and in its concluding section, limited its duration to five years. And yet, with that limitation of five years in the body of the statute, the law became so odious to the people that it was repealed within three years. The country then passed through many reverses, as a new and rapidly developing country always must, and again, in 1840, the Whigs signalized their return to power by passing the bankruptcy act of 1841.

The wise men of the country then admonished that party against the folly of repeating an experiment that had proven a failure before; but it was said then, just as our friends on the other side of the House say now, that the new law was free from the obnoxious features of the old law. And yet, with the benefit of an experience covering forty years, and though the House and Senate then embraced the greatest men of that or any other age, they were unable to devise a wholesome measure, and the law grew so odious that the very Congress that enacted it repealed it. From the repeal of that act the country was never again tempted to experiment with such a law until after the civil war had swept over the land, desolating its homes and wrecking its fortunes. After that dreadful time had come and gone, Congress responded to the popular demand for relief and passed the act of 1867. Within six years—yes, indeed, within four years—after that act had been written upon the statute book the people began to demand its repeal. The House repealed it twice before the Senate could be induced to act; but finally the slower-moving Senate was compelled to answer the popular demand, and for a third time the House passed a law repealing the act of 1867.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry just there?

Mr. BAILEY. With pleasure.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Has my friend examined the debates in connection with the matter to find out whether the unpopularity of the bankrupt laws of which he speaks arose from the machinery of their administration or from the principle of involuntary bankruptcy which was carried in them?

Mr. BAILEY. I have examined them; and I will say to my friend from Iowa that the general opinion was expressed by Senator Conkling, who declared that in a country like this it is impossible to successfully administer an involuntary bankruptcy law. Almost everybody agreed that its involuntary provisions had been abused by unjudy creditors. And how anxious they were to repeal it is well attested by the fact that the repealing act passed this House by a vote of 201 to 40.

Now, gentlemen of the majority, I appeal to you. Your party passed the law of 1867 at a time when the country stood more sorely in need of it than ever before, and that law was admitted to be as perfect as the wise men of that day could make it, yet it wrought injustice and disaster; and are you willing, within twenty years of the time when it was repealed, to put back upon the statute books a law more drastic in many of its features than it was? No man can point out the particulars in which this bill is an improvement upon that bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if my friend from Texas will permit me, in response to the question asked by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], I will say that within the last twenty-four hours I have examined the debate on the repeal of the act of 1867, and it appears conclusively that it was the abuse of the involuntary feature of that act by the unscrupulous creditor that made it so obnoxious that the public demanded its repeal.

Mr. BAILEY. There can be no doubt about that. That was the ground upon which General Grant recommended the repeal of it.

It is frequently insisted that as a bankruptcy law operates successfully in Great Britain it can be made to do so in this country. The difference between the conditions of the two is essentially different. The bankrupt law of Great Britain is practically their attachment law. Besides, England is a small, compact commercial country, and there are many differences between that people and this people, which necessarily makes the operation of the system there and here different. We have in every State in this Union an excellent system of collecting debts, and I believe there is no State in this Union in which a fraudulent debtor may not be brought by a summary process into court under a writ of attachment.

I feel now, as I have felt all the while, that while a purely voluntary system would be the best, yet I would have been willing to agree that the Federal bankruptcy law should embrace the same provisions which are comprehended within the State attachment laws; and if our friends are sincere in saying that they seek the benefit of the debtor as well as of the creditor, tell me, in the name of common sense and justice, why it is that they ask the American Congress to go further in a bankruptcy law than any of the States have gone or will go in an attachment law.

There is no State in this Union—or if there be one it will be found to be that exception which proves the rule—where a man can be dragged into court by the extraordinary process of attachment unless he has committed a fraud or unless that attachment is necessary to give the court jurisdiction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, though I do not believe that any involuntary system of bankruptcy can be successfully administered in this country, and although I believe that as often as the system is tried it will become unpopular and be repealed, yet I would be willing to try a law that limited acts of bankruptcy purely and only to those acts that justify attachments.

I have no fondness for fraudulent debtors. I am perfectly certain that fraudulent debtors do not deserve the favor of the law; but the vice of this bill is that in uncovering the fraudulent debtor it gives the merciless and vindictive creditor the opportunity to harass and destroy the honest debtor.

Our friends have proceeded throughout this entire debate upon the theory that those of us who advocate a voluntary bankruptcy law have lost sight entirely of the interest of the creditor. It is a strange oversight that leads any man to this conclusion. I am free to say that a voluntary system, like the substitute which I have prepared, proceeds upon the theory that when an honest man who is unable to pay all his debts has surrendered his property for pro rata distribution among his creditors, he ought to be permitted to begin life over again with a clean sheet; and that is also the theory of the committee bill. Every gentleman who has defended that bill affirms that it is right to permit an honest but unfortunate debtor to surrender his property and begin the race of life over again, unburdened by those debts which it is impossible for him to pay. We insist that in giving an additional remedy to the creditor against a dishonest debtor, or even against an insolvent debtor, there is great danger that it will be abused, for the experience of three laws and nearly a hundred years proves that it has been abused. We refuse to believe that human nature has changed, and we feel sure that what happened under the old law will happen under this law with its equal opportunities for oppression.

I believe that the consummation of wisdom in framing a bankruptcy law is to devise one under which an honest debtor can surrender his property and procure his discharge, but of which a dishonest debtor could not obtain the advantage, and I believe that very few men will dissent from that opinion. I also believe that any fair and impartial man who will examine this substitute without prejudice will agree with me that no dishonest debtor can procure his discharge under it.

Mr. RAY. I would like to ask the gentleman what his substitute is? Is it the bill 742?

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir; the substitute is numbered 8234. The bill to which the gentleman refers will be offered as a substitute.

My substitute provides that any man who has assigned all he has above his exemptions for the equal benefit of all his creditors is entitled to a discharge. It further provides that any man who has given a preference, either directly or indirectly, or has done any act tending to defeat—I do not even make it a matter of intention—but who has done any act “tending to defeat” the fair distribution of his assets among his creditors, or who has suffered an attachment to be levied upon his property, shall not be entitled to the benefit of this law.

The attachment clause was not free from difficulty. If a man whose property had been attached was permitted to get a discharge it opened the door for fraud, because his relatives and favorite creditors would attach him immediately upon the passage of the bill, and they would take all the property to pay their debts, leaving the other creditors to be paid with a certificate of the bankrupt court. To avoid that, the substitute denies him a discharge if an attachment has been levied upon his property within a given time. But we could not safely stop there, for if we did, any vindictive creditor could have prevented his debtor from obtaining the benefit of the law by instituting attachment proceedings; and so we provided that if upon the levy of an attachment the insolvent debtor would make an assignment as specified in the bill, the effect of that assignment should be to vacate the attachment, and his estate should then be administered and divided among all his creditors. We thereby put it beyond the debtor's power to allow a favored creditor to attach him and thus obtain a preference, and we also put it beyond the power of a vindictive creditor to attach him and prevent him from obtaining the benefit of the law.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. If he complies with the conditions there.

Mr. BAILEY. If he comes into the court and brings all his assets, then he is entitled to the benefit of the law, and I believe no man will say that he ought not to have it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the gentleman will permit me, what does your bill do with the old-time failures?

Mr. BAILEY. Every insolvent debtor can come in under it without reference to the date of his failure.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Suppose this case of preference or preferred attachment, originated at the time of the failure of a merchant, was ten or twenty years ago?

Mr. BAILEY. The bill does not undertake to go so far back. It provides that the prohibited acts shall not have been done within three months of the passage of the bill. That limitation was incorporated in the bill to prevent the rush of fraudulent debtors, who could give their property to their favorite creditors before the passage of the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who dream that any legislation can make a rascal an honest man. I know perfectly well that no power short of that Divine power which gave sight to the blind and which healed the sick can make a rascal honest; but I do believe that it is within the reach of practical statesmanship to make a rascal act honestly by making it to his interest for him to do so. We attempt to do that by offering to every insolvent debtor his financial emancipation if he will place his property in the hands of an assignee for the benefit of his creditors. When he does that, it has passed out of his control and becomes the property of his creditors. We make him surrender his property before we permit him to ask for a discharge. He can come into court only by alleging that he has surrendered his property for the benefit of his creditors. Any creditor has a right to contest the debtor's application for discharge, and can defeat the discharge by proving that the debtor has done any of these prohibited acts.

Now, put it to yourselves, gentlemen. Suppose a dishonest debtor, in failing circumstances, desires to prefer some relative or favored creditor, he can do it, of course, in any State which permits a preference (though many of the States do not permit it), but if he does he can get no benefit under this bill. So he stands there with a relative or creditor on the one side, asking for a preference, and on the other side is the bankrupt law, warning him that if he does give a preference he shall not be discharged from his debts. What would a dishonest man do under the circumstances? He is looking always to his own advantage, and in such a case he will say to himself, “If I prefer any creditor and then assign the balance of my property my property will be gone, and if it is found that I have given a preference I shall get no discharge.” The certain result will be that rather than take the chance of giving a preference and being denied the benefit of the bankruptcy law he will assign all his property so that he may get a discharge, because insolvents always, whether honest or dishonest, believe that if they can only be relieved from their present obligations they can repair their fortunes.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to one point. At the top of page 2 of his substitute I find this provision:

The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the property is situated.

Mr. BAILEY. It also says “subject to the provisions of this act.”

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Now, the constitutional provision is that we shall have power to make uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy; but how can a law be uniform if every State executes it according to its own special legislation on the subject?

Mr. BAILEY. The State does not execute this law. The law itself is uniform. The substitute says that when a certain state of facts exists the Federal courts may grant a discharge in bankruptcy. The fact upon which a debtor obtains the discharge is not that the property has been administered in a certain way, but that it has been surrendered. Now, I submit to my friend, and he knows perfectly well, that the exemptions are in no wise uniform throughout the several States of the Union; but the old law, which allowed these various and conflicting exemptions, was sustained by the courts.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. But this provision in the gentleman's substitute strikes at the substantive part of the law, not at the exemptions. It provides that it shall be administered according to the laws of the State.

Mr. BAILEY. That the estate shall be so administered; not the law. If my friend will read the substitute more closely he will find that the qualifying words, "subject to the provisions of this act," control practically all the preceding part of that provision.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. But my insistent is that this is a delegation of power to the States whose laws are discrepant and different, and therefore that its enactment would not execute our constitutional obligation to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy.

Mr. BAILEY. If that is my friend's only trouble, I will give him a bond to keep his conscience clear if he will support this bill. There is no difficulty on that point.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the fifty-eight minutes remaining on this side I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman remaining?

Mr. HENDERSON. We have fifty-eight minutes remaining. Does my friend from Texas desire to make some observations at this time?

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to say a few words.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not, of course, expect in five minutes to make any argument upon this bill or to discuss its details in any way.

I want to state, however, I am very anxious a bankruptcy bill should be passed at this session of Congress, for the reason that there are hundreds and thousands of good men all over the country who are unable to extricate themselves from debt. These men for the most part, in my State, are the very best part of the population; they are the most enterprising, the most energetic men we have among us; and we need their enterprise; we need their energy to help build up the interests of the country, which have been so greatly depressed.

Heretofore I have stoutly resisted the passage of any law containing an involuntary provision of bankruptcy; I have heretofore believed that such a system could not be well executed in this country. But I have arrived at the conclusion that it is impossible to pass a bankruptcy law containing only voluntary provisions; and I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the reason for this is that when you call upon the creditor class to allow voluntary bankrupts to be discharged from their debts they will demand, as they have heretofore demanded, some consideration in respect to their own interests. It is well known that throughout this country, within the last few years, the creditor class has been greatly imposed upon by the assignment laws of the States, by the privilege granted and exercised under State laws to make deeds of trust or assignments and by the preferences which have been given, by fraudulent attachments, by fraudulent judgments. Throughout the entire country the creditor class has been greatly and seriously imposed upon; and if we expect now to pass a uniform system of bankruptcy for this country it seems to me that we must give as well as take.

The bill now before the House, called the Henderson bill, is, I believe, the very best bill on this subject that has ever been offered in Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly, but I have only five minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. We will secure you more time. Do you believe that if the House should pass this bill it can pass the Senate?

Mr. CULBERSON. I am just coming to that. I ought to say in advance that the measure offered by my colleague [Mr. BAILEY] has in some of its features been offered heretofore both in the House and in the Senate. But the measure as heretofore introduced has been very greatly improved and enlarged by him, so that it is a far better measure than it was when it was offered in the Senate years ago and in the House of Representatives during the Fifty-first Congress; and if it could become a law I should vote for it with the greatest alacrity. I have an idea that I will vote for it at any rate as a substitute for the present bill, merely to maintain my record. [Laughter.] But I hardly think it can become a law. If it could, I think the country would be greatly benefited by it.

Now, as I was saying, the measure reported by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is the very best bill I have ever read, combining both the involuntary and the voluntary provisions. With the highest respect for the judgment of some of my colleagues on the committee who have opposed this bill, I think they have greatly exaggerated the hardships that will flow from the passage of this bill, because it is a very different measure from the law of 1867. It is widely apart from the bill known as the Torrey bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent, with the approval of the gentleman from Iowa—

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope that my colleague on the committee will be permitted to proceed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am unwilling to trespass—

Mr. HENDERSON. And I ask that the general time be extended so as to accommodate him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then I will take a few minutes more.

I say that this bill is widely different and apart from the Torrey bill. There are some things in this bill that ought to be stricken out. The fourth cause for involuntary bankruptcy ought, in my opinion, to be removed from the bill. But, Mr. Chairman, if you will consider this bill in all its details you will find that under it no man can be put into involuntary bankruptcy unless he is an insolvent. Now, under the old Torrey bill the word "insolvent" had a legal meaning affixed to it. Under that bill if a debtor failed to pay a debt for thirty days or forty days the presumption was that he was an insolvent.

A MEMBER. That is in this bill, too.

Mr. CULBERSON. A gentleman over here suggests that the same provision is in this bill, but I beg him to understand that this bill defines an insolvent as one whose property or assets shall not be sufficient to pay his debts; and that question, if he demands it, is to be submitted to a jury. I do not think you will find such a humane provision in any bankruptcy law in this country or in any other. All these provisions in relation to this matter of involuntary bankruptcy proceed upon the idea that the debtor is insolvent.

There is another matter which has been referred to here and which I beg to notice for but a moment. It has been objected that under this bill you can arrest a debtor for debt, that you can take him into custody—not put him in jail, but hold him in custody by a marshal. Now, I would, if I could, strike that from this bill. I did vote to strike it out in committee. But gentlemen ought to understand that this provision itself is more humane than any of the laws of the different States of this country regulating the attachment of witnesses. Under the laws of the different States you can attach a witness, and if he does not give security or bond for his appearance he may be placed in jail. Under this bill, when the creditors assert that the debtor has made some disposition of his property which defrauds them and about which they desire to have him examined, and they ask for a writ to arrest him and bring him before the court to testify, he may be brought there. The distinguished chairman of our committee thought that it would not do to put the debtor in jail, and therefore this bill provides that he shall have the privilege of going around with the marshal until he gives his testimony in court. Is there any injustice in that, anything inhuman, anything cruel, when in every court of the country a harsher power is exercised? I do not think so.

Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to say this much. I should like to see the bill of my colleague [Mr. BAILEY] pass the House. I believe I shall vote for it. I have a great fondness for it. But I do not believe it can become a law, and will, if necessary, vote for the Henderson bill. I believe that the bill of the committee will become a law. I believe that the pressure upon Congress now from all parts of the country will induce the Congress of the United States—the Senate as well as the House—to give us a bankruptcy law that will roll the load of debt off the shoulders of the insolvent. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt at this late hour in the day to make the extended remarks in regard to this bill that I intended. The gentlemen who are opposed to this bill ought to be convinced by the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who has just addressed the committee, that this is a proper bill to be enacted into a law.

I have had the honor to serve on the Judiciary Committee of this House with that gentleman for now six years, and I know him to be a good lawyer and conscientious, high-minded gentleman. During four of those years he was the chairman of that committee. We have had the bankruptcy bill before our committee in each of the last three Congresses, and it has commanded the best attention the committee was able to give to it.

This bill which is now reported from the Judiciary Committee is not the Torrey bill. The gentlemen who have served with me for four years upon that committee preceding this Congress, and the distinguished gentleman from Texas to whom I have already referred, who has just taken his seat, will not hesitate to assert that I have opposed with all the power that in me lay the bills as presented heretofore. I stood side by side with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and his agreement and my agreement to the bill now reported bear the same date. I am proud of my company, because there is no better lawyer in the Congress of the United States than that gentleman. While I come from the great manufacturing counties and States of the East and North, he comes from the agricultural districts of the South, and understands the wants of the people he represents. We now agree on this bill as adequate and just.

The other gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is possessed of a very peculiar mind. It must be undergoing a stage of transition, or transformation, for within the last few months he has presented either to the House or to the Judiciary Committee—or will have presented, if he fulfills his promises, before this subject is disposed of—four different measures which embody essential features radically different from each other.

Mr. BAILEY. Since the gentleman from New York has seen proper to refer to me, I will simply tell him that that is not the truth.

Mr. RAY. I say it is, and I have the proposed bills before me at this moment, and have been examining them.

Mr. BAILEY. You have not got them, and you can not find any such bills as that.

Mr. RAY. I will refer to them in the RECORD, and put in extracts from them.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me say to the gentleman—and I am sure he does not want to misrepresent me—

Mr. RAY. Certainly not.

Mr. BAILEY. I was one of the members of a subcommittee instructed by the full Committee on the Judiciary of the House to draft a bankrupt law containing both the voluntary and the involuntary features. In accordance with that instruction I submitted as my minority report from the subcommittee a report, which was printed. That report is exactly the bill which I shall offer to the House as a substitute for the pending bill, with the involuntary feature cut out. And the member from New York knows perfectly well that I stated to the committee that I had ingrafted the involuntary feature on the bill in accordance with and in obedience to the directions of the committee.

Mr. RAY. I have this only to say, that I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas a few questions, with his consent, and I ask for responses to them. Did you introduce a bankruptcy bill in the last Congress and secure its passage through the House?

Mr. BAILEY. I did, and you know it.

Mr. RAY. Of course I know it. Is that the same bill that you propose to offer as a substitute to-morrow for the pending bill?

Mr. BAILEY. It is not.

Mr. RAY. Very good—

Mr. BAILEY. And let me say here—

Mr. RAY. Now, do not take up my time. I refer to your bills H. R. 4609, Fifty-third Congress; H. R. 259, H. R. 8234, and H. R. no number, all in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. You have asked me a question; let me conclude my answer to it. The bill I propose to offer as a substitute for the pending bill to-morrow is that bill as I introduced it and as it passed the House and was amended by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate; and I introduced it in that form for the purpose of trying to get the two Houses as near together as possible on the subject.

Mr. RAY. Now, I trust the gentleman will not misunderstand me or the remarks I was about to make. The remarks I make are no reflection whatever upon his ability as a lawyer, or upon his intelligence, or his integrity as a man. They only show that the gentleman himself is in a condition of mind where he differs with himself as the weeks and the months go by. And I submit to the House that when a gentleman's mind is in that condition he is not a safe guide to follow in so important a matter as the construction or framing of a law upon the subject of bankruptcy.

Mr. BAILEY. If the member from New York will permit me, I wish to say that in all I have done since I have been here I have been striving to secure the passage of a bill through the House that could pass both Houses of Congress and become a law; and to-morrow, when the question comes, I expect to vote for a substitute that was not introduced by myself as the best thing that can be done.

Mr. RAY. Very good, and I trust the gentleman will not take offense. I did not question the gentleman's honesty of purpose or his desire to secure a good law. I simply referred to this as showing that the gentleman himself has gone from the support of one bill to another with incredible rapidity when we consider its importance.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that in the opening of his remarks he puts himself in the same attitude.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the reason why I do not want to be put in the same attitude myself.

Mr. RAY. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] that I do not put myself in any such attitude.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. You admit a conversion.

Mr. RAY. The bill that was known as the Torrey bill was before this House and before the Committee on the Judiciary when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] and myself sat side by side in that committee, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I came upon the floor of this House and opposed that bill as then reported—he upon certain grounds and I upon others. Now, the distinguished chairman of the committee in the last two Congresses [Mr. CULBERSON] will bear me witness that when the new bill, known as the Powers bill, came before the Judiciary Committee in this Congress I opposed it in the form in which it then stood. I insisted that I would not support it unless the drastic, harsh features were eliminated from it, and the result of our labor has been to eliminate from the bill now before the House every harsh, every drastic feature, every provision that an honest man can object to. This bill has passed and been subjected to the criticism of three sessions of Congress, and has grown better and better until no just criticism can be urged.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before my time is entirely exhausted, I desire to call attention for a few minutes to the unwise provisions of the substitute that will be offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from New York permit me? He stated a while ago that he had been opposing this bill all the time. I have here the record of the vote of the Fifty-third Congress, page 7598 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and it shows that the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] voted against the motion to strike out the enacting clause of this bill voted with all the friends of the bill.

Mr. RAY. Why, certainly I voted against striking out the enacting clause. But can not the gentleman understand that I might refuse to vote to strike out the enacting clause and yet stand upon the floor of this House and advocate amendments to the bill so as to perfect it and make it a bill that I would support; and if I failed in making it a bill that I could support, then vote against the bill itself?

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] was one of the tellers in the fight against the bill, and on the side of the bill.

Mr. RAY. I was one of the tellers in the fight against the Bailey bill in the last Congress?

Mr. BAILEY. No; this is the Torrey bill. I know that you also opposed my bill.

Mr. RAY. I did oppose striking out the enacting clause; but I made a speech upon the bill that tired all the members of this House, in opposition to it. [Laughter.] And now I trust the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] will permit me to make a few remarks in regard to his substitute, giving a few reasons, which will be amplified, why it should not become a law, why it can not become an effective law. Before I do that, I desire to read from Story on the Constitution, just a short extract, showing what a bankruptcy bill is or ought to be. Judge Story, who wrote this book, has always been considered an authority upon constitutional questions. He says:

Without stopping at present to consider what is the precise meaning of each of these terms as contradistinguished from the other, it may be stated that the general object of all bankruptcy and insolvency laws is, on the one hand, to secure to creditors an appropriation of the property of their debtors pro tanto to the discharge of their debts, whenever the latter are unable to discharge the whole amount, and on the other hand to relieve unfortunate and honest debtors from perpetual bondage to their creditors.

That is the purpose and object. Then, again, he says:

Perhaps as satisfactory a description of a bankruptcy law as can be framed is that it is a law for the benefit and relief of creditors and their debtors in cases in which the latter are unable or unwilling to pay their debts; and a law on the subject of bankruptcies, in the sense of the Constitution, is a law making provision for cases of persons failing to pay their debts.

Now, in the first place, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] goes upon the theory that the only object of our fathers in establishing this provision of the Constitution was to provide a way and manner in which failing debtors might escape from their debts; that this was the beginning and the end, the whole scope of this power. Such a law as he has designed and presented to this House has never been enacted in this or any other country on the face of the globe, excepting that at one time England, as a supplementary act to her bankruptcy law, did pass an act known as "An act for the benefit of poor English gentlemen," designed simply to enable them to escape from their pecuniary obligations.

Now, directing attention again to this bill, this proposed substitute of the gentleman from Texas, I will call attention to the first provision of it. I want gentlemen to understand and appreciate how pernicious it would be if permitted to become a law, and the results it would inevitably lead to.

Section 1 reads:

That if an insolvent debtor, not a corporation, shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia in which he may reside, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the provisions of this act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for.

Now, what is the meaning and effect of that? I ask lawyers and business men to give their attention to the practical effect of such a law as that. I reside in the State of New York, in the city of New York; I have property in that city. I am close to the borders of New Jersey and Connecticut. I own property in New Jersey and I own property in the State of Connecticut. In order that I may have the benefit of the law proposed by my colleague from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] what must I do? I must have an assignment filed valid according to the law of the State of New York; then it must be valid according to the law of the State of Connecticut; and then it must be valid according to the law of the State of New Jersey. But that is not all. It does not stop there. It must be valid also according to the law of the United States of America.

Now, if the law of New Jersey differs from the law of New York, I must make my assignment conflict with itself. If it differs from the law of the State of Connecticut, then it must differ and conflict in two particulars; and if the laws of the three States shall happen to conflict with the laws of the United States, then you have an assignment in conflict with itself in four different respects.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to say this? He has stated that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is one of the best lawyers in the Union. That section is taken word for word, except the corporation provision, from the bill of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. RAY. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has seen the error of his ways. He has repented, and upon the floor of this House has told you he is in favor of the bill now reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Now, let us go a little further, and see what the effect will be if you enact into law any such measure. I read from a Senate bill (four bills were introduced by Mr. BAILEY of Texas), and the Senate bill that has been reported over there is known as 742, and contains the same provisions. All are alike in the particular mentioned.

Now, let us go a little further, and see what the gentleman's proposition is. The property in each State must be administered and distributed according to the laws of the State in which it is situated; but the bankrupt himself, when he applies for a discharge, which he may do within three months, must apply in the United States courts. So let us examine the condition of the poor bankrupt who has made an assignment. He has got one that conflicts with itself in four different respects. He has a proceeding running in the State courts of the State of Connecticut; he has another running in the State courts of the State of New York; he has another running in the State courts of the State of New Jersey, and he has still another suit, proceedings relating to the same property and the same man, running in the United States court. Four suits, four proceedings relating to his property, four sets of lawyers, four different courts to construe this law and to construe the laws of the different States.

Now, if the State courts differ in the construction of the State laws, which court is to be the final arbiter? Is it to be the United States court? If so, then if the State court does not decide as some gentlemen think the United States court would decide, it gives an appeal to the United States Supreme Court. From New Jersey comes another appeal, from New York comes another appeal, so that you will have proceedings pending and appeals pending; three sets of lawyers in three different State courts; and then you would have lawyers in the United States courts, all pecking away at the same estate. And that is the possible effect of this wise law of my amiable and learned colleague, Mr. BAILEY, if he will pardon me for mentioning his name.

Now, that is not all. Here you are providing a conflict of jurisdiction and decisions, not for one court, where the estate may be speedily administered, where it may be justly and cheaply distributed, but you are providing for troubles and litigations that would not end in the lifetime of the poor debtor. What a fruitful field for litigation is opened up. How gleefully the shylocks, the greedy shylocks of the profession, would grin as they scan the measure proposed by the gentleman from Texas; and how eagerly would the shysters of the profession hang upon the borders of the estate of every man anywhere near insolvency, saying "the moment he gets in we will pluck his estate to the utter exclusion of his creditors."

Now, without amplifying upon that provision of this bill further, I desire to call attention very briefly to one or two other propositions in connection with it; but before I do, that let me call the attention of my friends upon this side of the House who have criticised the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, and who have favored the enactment into law of Senate bill No. 742, to a provision that is found in both bills. Several gentlemen have criticised House bill 8110 because it permits the bankrupt to be arrested and held during the proceedings.

Now, those same gentlemen, after making that criticism, after having upon that ground condemned the bill reported to this House by the Judiciary Committee, have announced that they should vote for Senate bill 742. The gentlemen have not read that bill, because it, too, provides for the arrest and detention of the debtor during the pendency of the proceedings.

Mr. Chairman, time has been so consumed that I can not give particular attention to the several features of this bill, but must content myself with commenting upon some of them under the five-minute rule.

I ask gentlemen to remember that one of the strongest objections urged against the last bankruptcy bill that we had upon the statute book was that the estate of the insolvent was swallowed up in fees and costs and attorneys' fees. I want to impress upon your minds the fact that under the Senate bill which is to be offered as a substitute, and under the substitute to be offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], it is very evident that the estate will have to be enormously large or else it will be consumed in payment of attorneys' fees. While the estate is being administered in the State court according to the laws of the State, a proceeding will be pending in the United States court, and the debtor, and the creditor also, if they would prevent a discharge, would have to be traveling back and forth, vibrating between the two courts. Then suppose the two courts should differ in their construction of those State laws, what will be the inevitable result? Appeals and still further costs and delays and troubles.

The Senate bill, as well as the House bill, provides—and that feature has been criticised—that all preferences given within a certain time shall become void. Do you suppose that the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Texas can pass the Senate when that body has already spoken upon this point, when it has already condemned the proposition with reference to preferences?

One other objection, Mr. Chairman, and a serious one, is to be considered—the constitutional objection. I hold in my hand and I shall insert in my remarks some portions of an argument presented to the House of Representatives in the form of a report upon the proposition which is embodied in the bill of the gentleman from Texas. This argument will be found in Report No. 206, "Views of the minority," submitted by Mr. Wolverton, a Democratic member of this House in the Fifty-third Congress.

He is an able lawyer, who gave great thought to this subject and who condemns the substitute of the gentleman from Texas as unconstitutional; treats it without gloves, and shows it up in all its enormity and in all its deformities. I ask the lawyers of this House, as a legal proposition purely, how can you hold for a moment that a law enacted under the provisions of the Constitution, which says that the Congress may enact or establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States, is constitutional which in the very send-off, instead of enacting or establishing a uniform law of bankruptcy, proposes to establish, or rather to adopt, the nonuniform laws of the different States of the Union? We all know that no two States have written upon their statute books the same assignment or insolvent laws; they all differ. Therefore when the Congress of the United States attempts to pass a law which either adopts the State laws or enacts them in any form as the law of the United States in relation to bankruptcy it is adopting or establishing nonuniform laws on that subject, and no court in Christendom would say or hold that such a law is constitutional.

Again, the Constitution contemplates and says that when we exercise this power of establishing laws upon the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States those laws shall be uniform, so that all debtors and all creditors throughout the country coming within the provisions of the laws shall have equal protection and benefit from them. Suppose, now, that you enact this proposed substitute into a law, and suppose that the State of New York at once repeals its assignment law. It will then be impossible for a man to make an assignment valid under the laws of the State of New York and under the laws of the United States. He can make no assignment at all, and no citizen of the State of New York can have the benefit of the bankruptcy law if this proposed substitute is adopted.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that the enactment of a law providing for voluntary bankruptcy only would be an exercise of the constitutional power of Congress to enact a bankruptcy law?

Mr. RAY. My opinion is that such a law might be unconstitutional unless it took hold of the estate of the debtor, because from the very definition of a constitutional bankrupt law which I have read to you as laid down by Judge Story and from the decisions of the courts it is evident that the passage of such a partial law would not be an exercise of the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. It would not relate to bankruptcies, but simply the discharge of insolvent debtors.

Mr. HENDERSON. If my colleague will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, I wish to make a suggestion. It is now somewhat after 5 o'clock, and I ask unanimous consent that the remaining portion of the gentleman's fifty-eight minutes be allowed to him when we meet again in Committee of the Whole for further consideration of this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I object.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York a question. If a bankrupt bill having a voluntary provision only would be unconstitutional, would not a bankrupt bill having an involuntary provision only be unconstitutional for the same reason?

Mr. RAY. I think there might be danger that it would be held unconstitutional. Still it would be saved because it takes the property. I believe that the provision of the Constitution providing for uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy contemplates provisions in the case of insolvent debtors which shall take hold not only of the person but of the estate, administer the estate, and discharge the bankrupt in case he has not been guilty of any of the offenses defined and prohibited by the law. It must deal with both the estate of the debtor and his person.

I wish to say further that I would oppose on the floor of this House or elsewhere any bill which should propose to enact a purely involuntary law, as I would oppose here and elsewhere any bill proposing to enact into law something that was purely voluntary. I think the two should go together; that discharges are incidental to the administration of bankrupt estates.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman this other question: Does he not know that the act of 1800 was an involuntary measure only, and that the courts held it to be constitutional?

Mr. RAY. The courts in those times did; but that gives no certainty that the courts to-day would so hold. Neither does it bind my conscience or judgment because incidentally the courts back in those times so held. But that law of 1800 dealt with the estate as well as the person.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me suggest that courts do not change their views upon bankruptcy laws as some gentlemen in this House are admitted to have done.

Mr. RAY. Well, I do not know whether the courts would change their views upon bankruptcy laws or not. It would depend altogether on the make-up of the court.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And something on the precedents.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that.

Mr. TERRY. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] to criticize the substitute of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] as being unconstitutional, upon the ground that it adopts as part of its provisions the laws of the various States on the subject of insolvency, assignments, etc.

Mr. RAY. It attempts to adopt them as part of the bankruptcy law, and provides as a prerequisite to a discharge that the estate shall be administered according to the laws of the various States, and also, mind you, in accordance with the provisions of this bill.

Mr. TERRY. I understand the gentleman. Now, if that is a just criticism upon the substitute of the gentleman from Texas, will it not apply to the bill of the committee which the gentleman is advocating, because this bill adopts the exemption laws of the various States, which may be repealed from time to time in the same way as the insolvent laws of the several States?

Mr. RAY. We do not adopt those exemption laws.

Mr. TERRY. You say that the bankrupt shall be entitled to the exemptions allowed him under the law of his State.

Mr. RAY. That is so; the exemptions would be different in different cases; but we do not adopt those laws or undertake to enact them as a part of this bill.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Would not such a provision be held to be unconstitutional?

Mr. RAY. Certainly not.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. There would be "nonuniformity."

Mr. RAY. It is immaterial whether there is uniformity as to the exemptions or not. I do not think such a provision would make the bill unconstitutional, although in my view it would be far better in the establishment of "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States" to have the exemptions uniform throughout the various States of the Union. It might be a close question, if raised, whether such a provision is constitutional, although I will say that under the last bankruptcy law that question went to the Supreme Court of the United States and the provision was expressly held constitutional.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Then my colleague really has doubts as to the constitutionality of his own bill?

Mr. RAY. None at all.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I so understood you just now.

Mr. RAY. None at all.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. You said it would be "a close question."

Mr. RAY. Oh, I meant the possibility that there might be a question—

Mr. FAIRCHILD. You said it was "a close question."

Mr. RAY. I said it might be a close question—or I intended to say that.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Was the constitutionality of the act of 1800 ever decided affirmatively by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. RAY. Oh, the question came up there, but as I understand the decision it did not come up squarely.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Did the Supreme Court of the United States ever decide directly that the bankrupt law of 1800 was constitutional?

Mr. RAY. As I stated before in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], it was incidentally so held.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. But that was obiter dictum simply.

Mr. RAY. Yes, sir; and of course when a decision is rendered in that way you do not know what the court might do if the question should come up squarely, and especially when that law was a different law and was passed upon a hundred years ago. We do not know what the courts to-day would say about it. But I do not see how any good lawyer can assert that it is a constitutional exercise of our power when we undertake to adopt the various laws of the various States, which are nonuniform, as to the taking hold of and the administration and distribution of the estates of these insolvent debtors.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me a question as a matter of information?

Mr. RAY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. As I understand, the gentleman claims that the provisions of this bill are just. Now, I ask him whether it is just that any person should be placed in bankruptcy and after his property is taken be prevented absolutely from obtaining a discharge where there has been no dishonesty on his part?

Mr. RAY. Certainly not, and this bill most emphatically declares that whenever the debtor has been honest in his conduct prior to and during the proceedings he shall be discharged from all of his debts except those which grow out of actual judgments rendered for personal injury or intentional wrong against property.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. A very large portion of the business of this country is done by corporations which may be thrown in bankruptcy, and I desire to ask my friend with reference to that particularly. As I understand the provisions of the bill, the corporation may be thrown into involuntary bankruptcy. Am I right in that?

Mr. RAY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Now, there is a provision that the corporation may be thrown into involuntary bankruptcy under the terms of this bill, but there is no provision anywhere in the bill, after that is accomplished, for their discharge. If the gentleman will turn to the section of the bill providing for the discharge of bankrupts he will find that in no event can they be discharged from any debt.

Mr. RAY. Now, the gentleman says "turn to the section of the bill," as though I had not studied the bill from the beginning to the end, and had not studied and wrestled with the question as to corporations with my colleagues for months.

Why, my dear sir, I have had occasion to take that question under consideration, and most prayerful consideration, too, for the last six years. I have considered it in all of its bearings. That provision was placed in the bill in obedience to a sentiment, which I have already stated before during this debate, that we were much too liberal in dealing with corporations, and that if we permitted a corporation to go into bankruptcy voluntarily, the United States laws superseding and taking the place of the State laws, that it would relieve the corporation from many of the obligations and drastic features of the State laws connected with corporations and enacted for the purpose of making them honest and dealing honestly. We finally placed this provision in the bill for that and other reasons.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. But I am speaking now of this point, not that you do not permit them to go into voluntary bankruptcy, but you put them into involuntary bankruptcy—that is, your bill makes provision for that—and yet you do not permit them to get out or be discharged from any of the obligations that they may owe.

Mr. RAY. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. It does not so appear in the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. If my friend from New York will allow me. If my friend from Kansas will read the second clause of section 13 in connection with section 60, I think it is, he will discover who are proper creditors and will see that the element of intent to give a wrong preference enters into it.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. If my friend from Iowa will permit me, I am not speaking of that point. It was another question.

Mr. HENDERSON. I beg pardon; I thought that was the point you had in view.

Mr. RAY. No; he undertakes to criticize the bill on the ground that it does not provide for the discharge of a corporation from its indebtedness in case it is forced into bankruptcy.

Now, if you read the dictionary clause of the bill, in connection with the bill, if the corporation has been forced into bankruptcy, it stands on the same footing as an individual.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now, let us examine that a little. I hope the gentleman will explain that more fully, for it is a very important feature.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Your bill provides that—

A person, not a corporation, may, after the expiration of two months, and within the next four months subsequently to being adjudged a bankrupt, file an application for a discharge, etc.

That is to say, you exclude the corporation from filing such a petition. And again, you will find in another part of the bill—

A discharge in bankruptcy shall release the bankrupt, not a corporation, from all of his provable debts, etc.

That excludes the corporation in every case.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The corporation that is insolvent and without any property is dead.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, no; not in all cases.

Mr. CONNOLLY. It does not live if it is dead.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. But this is not a dead corporation. It is a case in which you have simply taken its property and administered it. Now, you provide no method by which it may be released from the bankruptcy proceedings and get a discharge.

Mr. RAY. But every member of that corporation, every individual, if it is insolvent, may take the benefit of the law and apply his property to the payment of his just debts; and they are all discharged, just as all other individuals are. The corporation itself, if it made an assignment, ceases to exist, and becomes dead by operation of law.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Oh, not at all. I do not agree with my colleague there. It may have a franchise which might become very valuable in the future.

Mr. RAY. But do you not see that if the affairs of a corporation are administered in the bankrupt court, and if they have a franchise that is worth anything, it will be sold and transferred for all that it will bring. It will be in the hands of somebody else.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. That would depend. While that may be done, it would not necessarily follow.

Mr. RAY. It would, if the corporation needed a discharge from its debts.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Does the gentleman from New York claim, as a lawyer, that the franchise of a corporation created by a State or city is a part of the assets of the corporation?

Mr. RAY. Well, I do not say it exactly in that sense.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas (continuing). And if not, it can not be administered on by the bankrupt court.

Mr. RAY. I think my friend is mistaken in that. The franchise of a corporation is held to be a thing of value—property in New York, and I think in nearly every State. I had occasion to examine the question. It was up in our court of appeals and was passed upon there. Of course, in the strict sense of that word, the franchise is not a part of the assets of the company, but it is a thing of value, which you can not take away from it without compensation when it is once granted, unless a power to do so is embodied in the constitution of the State, the organic law, as one of its enumerated powers, or reserved in the charter.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Nearly all franchises to corporations are such that they can not be sold at all, and the corporation will still exist after you have disposed of all of its other assets.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman does not claim that.

Mr. CONNOLLY. It is a part of the property of the company.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. How are you going to get it out of bankruptcy? Suppose it is dead? Suppose you want to change its burying place?

Mr. RAY. When a corporation is once dead and buried, I do not believe in changing its burial place. Usually among the common people of this country corporations are offensive enough in life—give enough offense without disturbing their remains. I think you will find no trouble on that question when you come to examine the bill.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman from New York allow me one question?

Mr. RAY. Yes, although you are spoiling my speech utterly by these questions—breaking it all up.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I wish to suggest, in response to what has been said by some gentleman here, that under the common law, as under most of our statutes, bankruptcy works ipso facto a dissolution of the corporation, and it becomes dead in fact and in law.

Mr. RAY. I have asserted that three or four times, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] and other gentlemen seem disposed to disagree with me.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I could demonstrate that you are entirely mistaken, but I do not want to take up your time.

Mr. RAY. I suppose it would depend upon the law of the State creating the corporation. I know it would in the State of New York. As I understand the law, and always have understood it, a corporation is a creature of the statute. It lives by virtue of the statute. It may be wiped out of existence in any of the modes prescribed by the statute creating it, and there may be common-law rules also applying.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. And not otherwise.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Do you claim this bankrupt bill has any provision in it for wiping out a corporation? Certain proceedings have to be had in every State in the Union to dissolve a corporation and to wind it up, so that it no longer exists as a legal entity, and there is no such provision in this bill.

Mr. RAY. I have stated two or three times, and there is no necessity for my repeating it, that as I understand this bill, when the affairs of a corporation are administered, the property will go to its creditors and the corporation will be dead and gone, and I know of no way by which it could be resurrected. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] or my colleague from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD] can point out a way by which it could be revived and brought to life again I should like to know it. It would be a more miraculous raising from the dead than any that we read of in the Scriptures.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I do not rise to discuss that question. I only want to ask my colleague from New York whether he would have any objection to striking out that exception as to corporations securing discharges; and if so, why?

Mr. RAY. So far as I am concerned, I desire to say that I have no objection to striking that out, and would consent to that amendment. I do not know what my colleagues on the committee may think; but I want to give here again a reason, which I have stated several times upon the floor, why I think the provision of the bill a wise one. A corporation being the creature of the State, having its life given to it by the State, being answerable to the laws of the State, and the State laws having provided the way and manner under which it can be wound up and its property distributed properly and equitably and honestly among its creditors, I think it would be better to leave that matter to the State courts creating the corporation.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. But we do not propose to wind it up. We propose to let it be discharged, so that it may continue in business.

Mr. DANIELS. All State laws provide for the division of the assets of a corporation among creditors, without a preference.

Mr. RAY. Yes; and that is very much better.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. In some of the States the stockholders of a corporation are under a double liability. That liability is predicated upon a debt due by the corporation. Now, if you discharge the corporation, the debt is dead and the stockholders are relieved from their liability.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. You can easily include that proviso.

Mr. RAY. You might do so.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. If you admit that the corporation is dead, how are you going to proceed to enforce the double liability?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Because the State laws provide that you can do it.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. If your corporation is dead you can not do that.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The State law reserves that right against individual stockholders.

Mr. RAY. I do not concede for a single minute that if a corporation dies or is extinguished in any legal manner the individual liability of a stockholder dies with it. That liability, when it is incurred and fixed, remains, even if the corporation does die. That is my judgment as a lawyer.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. If the gentleman will permit me, is it not true that before you can enforce the double liability you have got to sue the corporation and get a judgment and issue an execution?

Mr. RAY. Why, certainly, when the statute so prescribes.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. If your corporation is out of existence how are you going to get judgment?

Mr. RAY. My entire remarks are predicated upon the proposition that your proceedings in bankruptcy are had before the corporation is dead. You have proceeded against it, established the debt, and distributed its property, and then it becomes dead. In the meantime, having established that liability against the corporation, you have done everything necessary to be done, and then you can proceed against the stockholders individually upon their individual liability.

Now, of course, I do not know what some court in Kansas or away down in Texas would hold. That is the law in the State of New York and all through the North in all the courts of which I have any knowledge; but I do not know that the laws of the several States are uniform. I suggest in that connection that all this argument but demonstrates the folly of enacting into law any such proposition as that contained in the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Texas, who proposes to make a part of the uniform system of bankruptcy law all the diverse and conflicting laws of the forty-five States of the United States of America.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of this House to the various propositions upon which I have consented to reporting the bankruptcy bill, and the various grounds which I believe demand the enactment of this bankruptcy bill, and some reasons why the substitutes should not be enacted.

Uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States should be established by the Congress of the United States for five good and substantial reasons:

1. Such laws will promote and strengthen the financial, industrial, and agricultural interests of the whole country.

2. They will strengthen the credit of individuals, give confidence to the creditors, and work no harm to the debtors.

3. They will greatly aid and encourage the debtors who are involved to such an extent that they own no property and can not do business in their own name, place them on their feet as men among men, and add to the wealth-producing power of our people.

4. They will make harmless the distrust of State laws relating to the administration and distribution of the estates of insolvent debtors by establishing a uniform system, giving uniform and reciprocal rights and remedies between debtors and creditors in all parts of the country. The merchant and manufacturer and investor will extend credit as willingly to customers in Kansas and Nebraska as to those in New York and Massachusetts, for they will have confidence in the law and will know that their rights and remedies in enforcing obligations are precisely the same in all the States.

5. Such laws will uphold and strengthen our national credit at home and abroad, for when you strengthen the credit of the individuals of a nation you strengthen the credit of the nation itself. A nation of bankrupts can not have national credit, and a nation of honest, rich, or well-to-do men can not but have good credit as a nation. Confidence in the individuals composing a nation gives confidence in the nation itself if it has a good system of enforced laws.

I can not regard the fact that we have had three bankrupt laws, and that all have been repealed, as any argument against the wisdom and propriety of establishing a wise and conservative law at the present time.

We have had at least four protective tariff laws at different stages of our national existence and all have been repealed, but if I mistake not we are to have another at no distant day and one containing both voluntary and involuntary features; one that will protect the free trader and protectionist alike.

It will protect a man whether he desires to be protected or not. It will aid the finances and business interests of this country. It will set in motion the wheels of the now silent mills and factories of this great nation.

Will any man argue that we ought not to have a protective tariff in the future because the Congress of the United States has blundered in repealing those we did have? Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], who represents one of the great manufacturing districts of the great State of Pennsylvania, urge to-day or at any future time that we ought not to enact a protective tariff law because those we have had were repealed?

It seems to me that gentlemen on the floor of this House must be hard pressed for arguments in opposition to this bill when they can find none better than the fact that prior bankrupt laws have been repealed.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] has referred to the bankruptcy laws of the Kingdom of Great Britain and has stated without giving authority for the assertion that the laws of that Kingdom have been unsatisfactory. Mr. Chairman, I challenge the statement. Bankruptcy laws have been maintained upon the statute books of England for centuries, and she has one to-day, and England is the greatest and most prosperous commercial nation on the face of the globe. Her credit is good wherever the name England is known. No citizen of the United States would refuse credit to a citizen of England because of any distrust of the adequacy of her laws upon the subject of the administration of bankrupt estates. It is no argument against the propriety of a bankrupt law that England has amended hers. Conditions are constantly changing. Experience ripens the judgment of men. Practice under a law points to its defects. When defects appear or conditions change, as they are constantly changing in all civilized nations, it shows good sense to amend the laws and adapt them to the changed conditions. Such amendments and changes do not afford reason for the existence and maintenance of the law itself.

The gentleman seems to forget that the condition of things in the United States of America is far different from what it was when our former statutes on this subject were enacted. We have grown from three to seventy millions of people. Railroad lines span the continent and reach out in every direction, affording speedy and easy communication with all parts of our country. Telephone and telegraph lines reach every hamlet in the land, and the forty-five States, instead of being separate and independent from a commercial and business point of view, are all one, for there is, must, and ever will be a constant interchange of the products and manufactures of one section for those of another. Credit must be extended, if we would prosper, by the citizens of one State to the citizens of every other State; and it follows that if this credit is to rest upon a sound and permanent and beneficial basis we must have a uniform system of laws relating to the administration and distribution of the estates of insolvent debtors. And these laws must not only protect the interests of creditors, but the interests of debtors.

It is a mistake to talk about the debtor class and the creditor class and to make so much distinction between them.

In this country of ours we have three classes: Those so very poor that they can not receive and never think of asking credit. This class is made up mainly of the Weary Waggles who tramp the country, and the thieves, bummers, and leg-pullers who infest the great cities. Then we have the very rich, who do nothing except live upon the interest of their money. This class is exceedingly limited, and includes most of the dude element and but very few of the active, brainy men of our country. The great mass, ninety-nine one-hundredths of our people, is composed of a class of active, energetic, laboring people, who are engaged in business of some sort, all of whom are both debtors and creditors. They ask and receive credit. They are asked for and grant credit. They are equally interested in having their interests protected by law both as creditors and as debtors. The Constitution of the United States wisely vests in the Congress the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

The power conferred is wisely guarded and limited. It is not a power to establish "a uniform system of bankruptcy" as proposed by the substitute bill of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], but a power to establish "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies" throughout the United States. In order to comply with the Constitution, not only must the "system" be uniform, but the laws enacted or adopted must be uniform; the same as applied to every bankrupt in every State of the Union. Anything short of this does not comply with the Constitution. "A uniform system of bankruptcy" is quite different from "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies." It may well be said that a "system" is uniform which provides that the estates of bankrupts may be administered according to the laws of the several States, but it is self-evident that in such case uniform laws would not be established. The laws would be nonuniform, depending on the will of the legislature in each State, and we should have as many laws as States.

The bill proposed by the gentleman from Texas violates the Constitution of the United States in the very "send-off." His substitute provides, sections 1 and 2:

That if any insolvent debtor shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia in which he may reside, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the provisions of this act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 2. That such assignment shall convey, subject to all valid liens, all of the estate of the debtor, except such as is exempt by the law of his domicile from execution or seizure for his debts, and shall be for the equal benefit of all his creditors, except with the preferences hereinafter allowed. The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the property is situated, subject to the provisions of this act.

From the reading of these sections we discover, first, that the bankrupt must make an assignment valid according to the laws of the State in which he resides and has property; and second, that if he has property in two or more States, then valid according to the laws of each of such States, so that a man residing in New York City and having property in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, as is frequently the case, in order to become a bankrupt and obtain the benefit of the proposed act, must make one assignment valid according to and complying with the different laws of three different States, or else make three different assignments in the three States. In such case there would be three different assignees residing in three differing jurisdictions.

As I construe the proposed substitute, however, only one assignment is permitted, and as this must be valid according to the laws of three different States, if those laws are in conflict then the instrument of assignment must conflict with itself and be in part valid and in part invalid in each State. In any event the assigned property would pass in part to different assignees and would be administered and distributed according to the laws of three different States, and so there would be three different proceedings in three different jurisdictions and three different bills of costs running up at the same time. Creditors residing in New York would have to prove up claims in three different jurisdictions in three different ways, and before the court in one State could make distribution it would have to await action in two other States in order to ascertain the balances on which to make division. No sane man can successfully contend for an instant that such a proposition is one "establishing uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

But the proposed substitute goes much further than this in providing the form of the assignment. Every assignment must be valid, not only according to the laws of the State where the bankrupt resides and possibly those of several other States, but valid under and in "accordance with the provisions of this act," that is, the act of Congress.

Should "this act," the law of Congress, differ from and be in conflict with the law of the State, then it would be impossible for the debtor to make a legal assignment, and so he would be deprived of the benefit of the law.

It follows, inasmuch as Congress can not coerce a State into making laws, that any State could absolutely nullify the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Texas, if enacted into law, by passing State laws so inconsistent with the United States law that it would be absolutely impossible to make an assignment valid under both. So the citizens of a State having no assignment laws could not avail themselves of the act.

The proposed substitute does not undertake to prescribe the form in which assignments shall be made, except in one or two particulars, and so provide a uniform mode of making assignments, but says in terms that same must be valid according to the laws of the State in which the assignment is made and also according to the act of Congress. Therefore the act, so far as it provides for assignments, the first step to be taken in order to secure the benefits of the law, instead of establishing uniform laws, establishes nonuniform laws, conflicting laws, contradictory laws.

But the gentleman claims that the State law is uniform as to all the residents of the State and all persons having property therein subject to its jurisdiction.

The Constitution of the United States contemplates nothing of this kind. Congress is empowered "To establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." The words "uniform laws" must apply to all the States and to the citizens of all the States within their purview, and the citizen of Oregon and his estate must be taken hold of and the property administered the same as in the State of Georgia or any other State of the Union. The Constitution is speaking of the Union and not of the States in severalty.

Congress is to establish the laws, and these laws, when established, must apply and be uniform "throughout the United States." The proposed substitute is a mere meddlesome measure; that is, it seeks to interfere with the administration of State laws and give an effect to an instrument executed under a State law entirely different, it may be, from that given to it by the law of the State authorizing the execution of the instrument. The proposed substitute says:

That if any insolvent debtor shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in which he may reside, * * * it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for.

This is shooting in the air. No one knows what laws the different States, Territories, and the District of Columbia may enact on the subject of assignments; neither does anyone know what effect the laws of the several States will give such assignments. This proposed substitute undertakes to say that all assignments shall have an effect prescribed by the Congress of the United States, even though the instrument itself and the law authorizing it in express terms state that it shall have a different effect. The proposed substitute says that the assignment shall convey, subject to valid liens, all of the estate of the debtor, except such as is exempt, and that the assignment shall be for the equal benefit of all creditors of the assignor, except with the preferences hereinafter allowed. Then certain preferences are prescribed. The preferences allowed by a State, Territory, or by the District of Columbia may be entirely different from those permitted by the act of Congress. And what shall prevail—the instrument itself and the laws of the State or the act of Congress? If the laws of the United States are to prevail, then the assignment would not be valid under the laws of the State, and if valid under the laws of the State and to be enforced in accordance therewith, then it might not be valid and probably would not be valid under the laws of the United States. This is not a bankruptcy bill at all, but a bill extending or limiting, as the case may be, the meaning and effect of assignments and deeds of trust in the various States and Territories and the District of Columbia for the benefit of creditors. The proposed substitute constitutes a plain interference by the Federal Government with the assignment laws of the various States and Territories of the United States and the District of Columbia. It is crude, inartificial, and plainly unconstitutional.

Under this proposed substitute if a debtor should undertake to avail himself of the benefits of the act he would be compelled to study, understand, and conform his assignment to the laws of every State and Territory in which he had property and also to the District of Columbia, in case he had property there, and also to the terms of the act itself, and not one lawyer in five hundred would be able to draw an assignment in accordance with law. Mr. BAILEY's bill, H. R. 259, section 2, provides—

That such assignment shall convey, subject to all valid liens, all of the estate of the debtor, * * * and shall be for the equal benefit of his creditors.

Section 7 provides (page 5 line 23)—

Provided, however, That if within sixty days after the levy of an attachment the debtor shall execute an assignment or cession of his property and file a petition for discharge as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment, and such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

This attachment provision is not abandoned in Mr. BAILEY's bill H. R. 8234. Let us suppose that in one State the execution of an assignment does not operate to vacate the levy of an attachment made within sixty days prior to the assignment; would any State court surrender jurisdiction in the matter and yield to the act of Congress attempting to provide that all such attachments should be vacated by such an assignment? By what right or authority can the Congress of the United States vacate attachments granted by State courts prior to the execution of an assignment for the benefit of creditors made under and pursuant to the laws of the State and declared by the act of Congress to be valid under the laws of the State?

It is respectfully submitted that there is now enough of conflict between State and Federal jurisdiction without our deliberately framing a law that must of necessity result in innumerable conflicts—conflicts between the State and the United States and conflicts between the States themselves. How can a law valid according to the law of New York be valid according to the law of Florida unless the laws of the two States are identical; and how can an assignment that might be valid according to the laws of both those States be valid under the laws of a third State should the laws of that State happen to differ from the laws of the first two named? Would the several States enact laws to conform to the act of Congress? If a State desired the United States law to be made effective and to be enforced it might pass such laws, but if not in accord with the law of the United States the State would certainly throw as many obstructions in the way of a valid assignment as possible. In such case the citizens of that State would be deprived of all benefit of a bankrupt law. Is this establishing uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States? It seems to me that it is a deliberate attempt to induce the Congress of the United States to enact into law a bill seeking to establish nonuniform laws and as many conflicting laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States as possible.

If the State passes a law authorizing an assignment for the benefit of creditors it must have the right to define the terms and conditions of the assignment and to prescribe the mode of administering and distributing the estate. Has the Congress of the United States any power to step in and give to such an act any broader or more limited effect? Has the United States any right to prescribe the mode and manner in which that assigned estate shall be administered? Has any power on earth the right to enact a law that the State shall not enforce the assignment in its own way and irrespective of the Federal Government? It is true that Congress may pass a general law on the subject of bankruptcies and provide for administering the estates of insolvent and fraudulent debtors which will, at the election of the debtor or of his creditor, supersede the State assignment or insolvent laws, but Congress can not add to or subtract from a State law administered by the State courts or prescribe its construction or effect, or dictate to the courts of the State its execution.

It will be noted that an assignment can not be made under the act of Congress alone, but must be valid according to the laws of the State in which the assignor resides or in which he has property, or possibly both, and also the assignment must be made in accordance with the provisions of this act, and then Congress attempts to say what effect that assignment shall have. It matters not what effect the laws of the State say it shall have. The State and its legislature are of no consequence. Its laws are not to be observed, but the Congress of the United States is the arbiter. Enact this proposed substitute into a law, and do you suppose any State in the Union would retain for a moment assignment laws upon its statute book?

The gentleman from Texas has always been a most strenuous and determined defender of the doctrine of State rights. He has always resented any interference by the General Government in the management of persons or property in any of the States of the Union except when the authority is expressly conferred by Congress. But to-day we find him advocating a bill that proposes to submit the laws of the various States relating to assignments of property for the benefit of creditors to the jurisdiction and adjudication of the Federal courts. I am quite willing that the Congress shall pass laws when jurisdiction is conferred by the Constitution that shall bind the citizens of the entire Union and control their property and property rights, but I am not willing to deliberately legislate as though I had never read the Constitution of the United States or had suspicion that such an instrument exists.

Under the provisions of section 8 of House bill No. 8334 (Mr. BAILEY's proposed substitute), where, when, and in what manner is it to be adjudicated whether or not the person making an assignment is an insolvent debtor? Is the State court to determine that fact? Is it to be determined by the courts of the United States? On this subject the proposed substitute is as silent as pigs in thunder. Is the debtor to determine that question for himself, and shall the courts assume that a debtor is insolvent because he executes an assignment? Assuming that the State court is to exercise jurisdiction in that matter, and determines that the assignor was not insolvent at the time of making the assignment, may the United States court, when the debtor files his petition under section 5 asking a discharge from his debts, adjudicate and determine that he was insolvent at the time of making the assignment? Suppose, again, that a creditor of the assignor impeaches the assignment for fraud and seeks to set it aside in a State court, may or may not the action be prosecuted, and if the judgment is against the assignment, then what effect shall that adjudication have in the courts of the United States? May the question be retried, and if the United States court should decide the other way, which adjudication shall prevail in the State?

Section 5 of H. R. 8334, H. R. 259, and H. R. —, but all Bailey bills, provides that any such debtor, to wit, one who has made an assignment, within the period of four months from the date of the execution of the assignment may file his petition in the district court of the United States for the district or division thereof in which he resides alleging his insolvency and asking for a discharge from his debts. Thus far the debtor is to file his petition in the district in which he then resides, and he can not file it elsewhere unless he reside in a Territory or the District of Columbia, in which case he is to file his petition in the supreme court of the District or in the district court of the Territory where he resides. The section then says:

But the petition shall not be filed in any court unless the debtor has resided in said district or division [in which he resides at the time he files his petition] at least six calendar months immediately preceding the making of the assignment.

Therefore, if after making his assignment a debtor shall move to another State or jurisdiction, he is absolutely precluded by section 5 from filing a petition for a discharge in any court. If he has gained a new residence, seeking to obtain an honest livelihood, he must file his petition, if he files it at all, in the district or division where he resides; but if he did not reside in that district at least six calendar months immediately preceding the making of the assignment, then by the very terms of the bill he can not file his petition in any court. I can not understand the policy of a law that would seek to preclude the honest debtor from leaving the scene of his financial failures and attempting to start life anew in another State at the peril of losing his right to file a petition and ask a discharge from all his debts. The author of this proposed substitute, in attempting to avoid the rock upon which he was wrecked in the Fifty-third Congress, to wit, a provision that the debtor might file his petition in any district court in the district in which he resided at the time of filing it and obtain his discharge, and thus drag his creditors from Portland to San Francisco to oppose his discharge, has grounded upon a more dangerous rock, which prohibits the removal of the debtor from one jurisdiction to another unless he surrenders all hope of ever seeking or obtaining a discharge from his debts.

In my judgment it would be much more sensible to say that any debtor who has made an assignment for the benefit of all his creditors, and whose estate has been administered and distributed according to the laws of the State in which the assignment was made, may file his petition in the district court of the United States in the district where he then resides, and upon complying with the law be discharged from all his debts. It is quite true that this would be open to the objection just suggested, that the debtor by removing from one State to another would thus be enabled to drag the creditors who would oppose discharge from their homes to States, it might be 3,000 miles distant, and thus preclude just objections being made to the discharge of dishonest debtors. This objection could be avoided by permitting the filing of the application in the State where the assignment was made and the estate administered regardless of the then residence of the debtor.

It is a self-evident fact that should this proposed substitute become a law the citizens of some of the States would have a law on the subject of bankruptcy while others would not. All might have, all might not have, depending entirely not on the decree of the Congress of the United States, but on the decree of the States themselves. To illustrate, the assignment must be valid according to the laws of the State and of the United States or else it is not an assignment at all. Therefore a State having no law providing for assignments would not be within the provisions of the act at all, nor would its citizens. Thus, States having assignment laws would be within its provisions. However, should all the States enact assignment laws, then all would be within the act, and the citizens of all the States would be entitled to such benefits as might be secured under it.

Is this establishing uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States? Or is it establishing laws, or rather adopting laws, that may or may not be uniform throughout the United States? There can be but one answer to the question, and that is conclusive against the constitutionality of the proposed substitute.

Section 2 of all of Mr. BAILEY's bills and substitutes provides that the assigned property shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the property is situated, subject to the provisions of this act. This clearly contemplates an administering and distribution of the property under the laws of the State and in accordance therewith.

Section 4 provides that the original assignment, accompanied by a list of creditors, giving names and residences and a statement of the debt due each, with a schedule of property, exempt and unexempt, and a statement of all liens and incumbrances, shall, within sixty days from the date of the execution of the assignment, be filed in the court in which the petition of the debtor is herein required to be filed. Section 5 then provides for the filing of that petition in the circuit court of the district or division of his residence. Now, as the debtor's property is to be administered by the State court, it must have a statement and inventory, with schedules, made and executed in accordance with the laws of the State, filed with it, so that we have a provision for the filing of at least two of these expensive schedules and lists in at least two different places and with two courts. If not so, then a State court must proceed without the information necessary for the proper settlement and distribution of the estate. This brings us to the consideration of another question, and that is the enormous cost and expense that would be entailed in the execution of the proposed substitute. Two schedules, two inventories, two lists of debts, a proceeding in the State courts of each State where the debtor has property, and then when the debtor seeks his discharge he goes into another court in another jurisdiction and must commence a new proceeding in that court to obtain his discharge. How much better would it be to have one proceeding in one court in one jurisdiction to take hold of the estate and distribute the property and grant or refuse a discharge to the debtor.

One of the most serious objections urged against our last law on the subject of bankruptcies was the fact that as a rule the estates were swallowed up or dissipated in the payment of costs and fees. The proposed substitute is as much more extravagant in its provision for fees and costs as can well be imagined.

The practical effect of section 5 would be to prevent the filing of an assignment by a person who had not resided six months in a given district or division of the United States. If a person doing business in one district or division should move across the line into another, continuing his business at the same place, and should file and make an assignment by reason of insolvency, he could not have the benefit of this so-called "uniform system of bankruptcy"; that is, he could not have or even file a petition for a discharge from his debts.

"The debtor must have resided in said district or division at least six calendar months immediately preceding the making of the assignment." Otherwise he can not file a petition for a discharge.

This proposed substitute makes no provision whatever for the control of the assignee. It does not prescribe his duties nor fix his bond nor direct when or how payments are to be made. All that is left to the State courts. If the laws of a State are lax and insufficient and the estate is wasted by the assignee the creditors have no remedy whatever. The courts of the United States have no jurisdiction over those matters.

By section 7, if upon the hearing of the petition for a discharge it shall appear that the debtor made an assignment and that the same contained a full and complete conveyance of all his unexempt property, and that within three months before the passage of this act no creditor of such debtor had been preferred except as authorized, and that certain other acts had been done, then "the court shall order and adjudge that said debtor be forever discharged from the payment of the debts mentioned and set forth in the list accompanying his petition, and such order and adjudication shall be a full, complete, and final discharge of said debtor from the payment of said debts."

It will be observed that so far as this proposed substitute is concerned it is entirely immaterial whether or not the estate of the assignor has been administered or not. The debtor, at any time within four months from the date of the execution of the assignment, may file his petition. On filing the petition the debtor is to be forthwith adjudged a bankrupt. It seems that at least four weeks' notice is to be given, and then the court is to proceed to discharge the debtor from his debts. In the meantime the first steps are being taken in the State court for the administration of the debtor's property and the distribution thereof among creditors. No provision whatever is made to punish or prevent a fraudulent concealment of property by the debtor or the commission of other frauds upon the creditors, and the United States court may proceed to discharge the debtor from all the debts mentioned in the schedules filed by him before it has been possible to ascertain whether or not the conduct of the debtor has been just and honest or fraudulent and corrupt.

Section 16 of the substitute bill (section 13 of H. R. 259) expressly provides—

That this act shall not be construed to annul or suspend the laws of any State now in force or hereafter passed for the relief of insolvent debtors, or the distribution of their estates, except so far as the same may be in conflict with the provisions hereof.

Is it to be inferred that the substitute bill, if enacted into law, will annul or suspend the laws of a State now in force or hereafter passed for the relief of insolvent debtors or the distribution of their estates when in conflict therewith? If so, and that is the plain construction of the proposed law, then the State courts will be called upon to determine whether there is a conflict between the law of the State and the law of the United States, and if the State court shall determine that there is a conflict, then it must determine whether it will adopt and follow the laws of its own State or the laws of the United States. If it determines that there is a conflict, appeals may be taken from that decision, and if the State court determines that there is no conflict and proceeds with the administration of the estate, then appeals may be taken from that determination, and so the State court may determine that the debtor has been guilty of the wrongful acts mentioned in section 7, but such adjudication and determination may not be reached or the facts discovered until long after the United States court, proceeding under a petition for a discharge, shall have adjudicated that none of these acts have been committed, and shall have discharged the debtor. In the meantime the creditors of the debtor are struggling and contending in two different courts; in the one to discover the property of the debtor and compel its proper application, and in the other to prevent a discharge of the debtor from the debts they are seeking to collect. These courts may be running at the same time, demanding the presence of both debtor and creditors in two different tribunals at points far distant from each other. The same questions might be up for determination in both courts, and upon precisely the same evidence the State court might arrive at one conclusion, while the United States court would arrive at one directly the contrary. There is no provision giving to the United States court exclusive jurisdiction of any of these questions, except whether it shall grant a discharge.

With these proceedings running in two, and possibly ten, different courts (depending upon the number of States in which the debtor had property) the debtor and his creditors would be harassed and harried until life would become a burden, and both would be taken from Dan to Beersheba and back again over and over again at enormous expense, while the estate would be the legitimate prey of the attorneys prosecuting or defending suits relating thereto in the State courts.

The substitute bill of the gentleman from Texas is a crude experiment. It follows no precedent and contains no defined principle of administration. While adopting many children, to wit, the assignment laws of all the 45 States, it makes no provision for quarrels between them, but leaves all differences to be settled first by the State courts, and eventually by the Supreme Court of the United States, for all these proceedings must be valid according to the laws of the States and also in accordance herewith; that is, with the act of Congress.

What a fruitful field of litigation is here opened up for litigious men and greedy attorneys! With what glee will the shylocks of the profession whet their professional wits if this substitute should be enacted into law! The speculators of the profession would camp for the next six months on the borders of every suspected insolvent and plunge his estate into the boiling caldron of conflicting decisions immediately the law went into effect.

The proposed substitute bill provides for the appointment of auditors, but inasmuch as the estates are to be administered and distributed in accordance with the assignment or insolvent laws of the several States, it is difficult to see what these newly created officers will have to audit unless it be the number of conflicting decisions made by the several courts.

It is not the discharge of the debtor that is important to the creditors, but the speedy and honest administration and distribution of his estate. The author of the proposed substitute seems to think that uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies only relate to the discharge of insolvent debtors. In this he errs, as we shall see. The speedy and honest cession of property for the payment of creditors is, and should be, the prerequisite of every discharge. Honest conduct should precede and accompany the assignment at every step of its execution, and only when this is finally completed should the debtor be permitted to institute a proceeding for a discharge. If there has been dishonesty at any stage, then a discharge should be refused. Where can it be best known whether or not the debtor has been honest? Certainly in the court where the property has been administered, for there the whole conduct of the debtor will be necessarily inquired into; there the light of day will be let in upon all his transactions.

But this substitute bill permits the debtor to apply for and obtain a discharge before the administration of his estate has fairly commenced. And this proceeding is to be taken and conducted in another court.

I can conceive no more complex and cumbersome mode of dealing with this important subject. The mind of man never devised an easier way of escape for the dishonest debtor. Why remove him from the court in which his property has been administered and his financial transactions and conduct inquired into and made known to another jurisdiction at a distant point, where perchance his fleeced and impoverished creditors might not be able to follow, when he comes to apply for a discharge? Why not confer jurisdiction upon the State courts to at least recommend the granting or refusal of a discharge? If we are to adopt the State courts in one stage of the proceeding why not in all others?

How different the bill reported from the committee. We have here a complete and perfected system, fair and just to both debtors and creditors, simple and plain, easily and cheaply administered, calculated to speedily convert the estate into money and distribute the same fairly, and finally place the honest debtor on his feet again, a man among men.

The conditions mentioned by President U. S. Grant when he recommended the repeal of our former law do not now exist. No man can be forced into bankruptcy unless guilty of fraud or actually insolvent and in a condition when he has become unable to pay and has ceased to pay his debts.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] concedes a great demand for a bankrupt law; others make the same admission. Then why not act?

SHALL THE LAW CONTAIN VOLUNTARY AND INVOLUNTARY PROVISIONS, OR ONLY VOLUNTARY PROVISIONS?

It must be conceded that great difference of opinion exists on this proposition.

There seems to be objections to involuntary provisions, growing out of the fear that bankruptcy proceedings will be quite generally resorted to as a means of collecting debts, and that the law of Congress will supersede the laws of the various States within their respective jurisdictions as a collecting agency.

I am opposed to the enactment of laws intended simply as collection laws, for the reason that I do not think the Constitution confers any such power. Should we pass laws providing simply for the enforcement and collecting of debts, I think they would be unconstitutional. It would be convenient to have uniform laws throughout the United States for the collection of debts. But this is not the purpose of this bill, nor does it tend in that direction.

This bill is aimed at actual insolvency, and while all insolvents may have its benefits, the involuntary features are most carefully guarded, and great care has been taken to keep far within the powers conferred by the Constitution.

Two things must concur in all except three cases to render a person subject to the involuntary provisions of the bill.

First. In all cases there must be a condition of actual insolvency or fraud must have been committed.

Second. In all cases except three the person proceeded against must have been guilty of fraudulent acts affecting the rights and remedies of his creditors.

Third. In the other three cases a condition of things must have arisen rendering it highly proper and expedient for the law to take hold of and administer the property of the debtor for the benefit of all his creditors: (1) The debtor must have failed for thirty days, and while actually insolvent, to secure the release of property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over; (2) The debtor must have made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts; and (3) suspended and not resumed for thirty days, and until a petition is filed and while actually insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper aggregating $500 or over.

It must be conceded by all just-minded men that in each of these cases the creditors should have the right to take hold of by some process the property of the debtor and apply the same equitably to the payment of his debts; and secondly, if the debtor is honest, that when this is done he shall have a full discharge from his debts and an opportunity to commence life anew. It is no answer to say that in such cases the most active creditor should have the full benefit of his zeal and diligence. We must remember that all creditors having equal equities—equal rights to recognition and payment of their claims—do not have equal opportunity to ascertain and know the debtor's financial condition.

Again, if those "who first come are to be first served" from the debtor's estate, the debtor may communicate his actual condition to a few of his creditors of long standing and enable them to obtain judgments in advance of more recent creditors who perchance have recently filled the counters or storehouses of the debtor with their goods on credit, and these goods are in this way taken to pay old debts, and recent creditors are used to pay the more ancient ones. Again, the debtor would be enabled by way of suggestion to prefer a certain few of his creditors to the absolute exclusion of all others.

When a debtor descends to the commission of actual fraud upon his creditors it is certainly time that they be permitted to take the property of the debtor and apply the same equitably to the discharge of his debts.

Therefore, it seems to me, nothing can be said against the fairness and justness of this bill, if involuntary provisions are to be permitted at all.

It excludes from these involuntary provisions wage earners whose income is less than $1,500 per annum and all persons engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil.

This leaves the involuntary features of the bill applicable only to merchants and manufacturers and bankers, giving some degree of protection to our great mercantile and manufacturing interests.

OBJECTIONS TO A PURELY VOLUNTARY BILL.

In the first place, any just and constitutional exercise of the power conferred on the Congress of the United States to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States demands that the law contain both voluntary and involuntary provisions.

Any other exercise of this power would be one-sided, be incomplete, and radically defective. There is nothing in the Constitution to indicate that it was the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to limit or restrict this power to the enactment of laws for the release of insolvent debtors from the burden of their debts. On the other hand, the language of the Constitution indicates that it was the purpose of our fathers to invest Congress with full power to enact complete and comprehensive laws on this subject.

The power to pass laws on the subject of bankruptcies was not included in the original draft of the Constitution of the United States. The author of The Federalist treated the subject with great brevity, and we find the following the only commentary on that clause in the Constitution:

The power of establishing uniform laws of bankruptcy is so intimately connected with the regulation of commerce and will prevent so many frauds where the parties or their property may lie or be removed into different States that the expediency of it seems not likely to be drawn in question.—The Federalist, No. 42.

Here is a clear indication in express language that the exercise of the power was intended to prevent frauds by debtors. How can frauds be prevented by the enactment of a law containing purely voluntary features? The enactment of a voluntary bankruptcy law, instead of preventing, would aid and encourage frauds of the most gross character. The enactment of such a law would encourage men to rush into debt, buy property on credit, and use the same extravagantly or perchance conceal the same from honest creditors, trusting to the law to relieve them from their obligations at a future day. Any bill containing only voluntary features might justly be entitled "An act to encourage frauds."

Honest men, of course, will decline to run largely in debt unless they can see a clear way to pay their debts. On the other hand, a dishonest man will incur all the indebtedness he can, provided he thinks he can make way with the property, secure the benefit of it, and eventually obtain a discharge from his obligation to pay.

The very definition of a constitutional law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States requires both voluntary and involuntary features.

In Story on the Constitution, volume 2, fourth edition, page 50, note 2, it is said:

Perhaps as satisfactory a description of a bankrupt law as can be framed is that it is a law for the benefit and relief of creditors and their debtors in cases in which the latter are unable or unwilling to pay their debts. And a law on the subject of bankruptcies, in the sense of the Constitution, is a law making provisions for cases of persons failing to pay their debts.

It will be noted that the law is for the benefit and relief of creditors and also their debtors in cases in which the latter are either unable or unwilling to pay their debts. A law having for its object the discharge of debtors from their obligations is simply one for the benefit and relief of debtors, and does not take into account the creditor at all, except as he may be prevented from ever enforcing his just and legal claim against the debtor, it may be, without any compensation at all. Again, a law making provisions for cases of persons failing to pay their debts does not contemplate one simply for the discharge of the person failing to pay his debts from the obligation to pay, but clearly contemplates laws providing, first, for a surrender by the debtor of all his property to his creditors, which is a provision in their interest, and then a provision that when this is done the debtor shall be discharged. This last provision is in the interest of and for the benefit of the debtor.

To meet with favor, any law upon the subject of bankruptcies must work harmoniously and equitably in the interest of both the debtor and creditor classes; it must protect all interests, and this can be done only by providing that when the debtor becomes insolvent and unable to pay his debts his property may be taken by his creditors and equitably distributed, and by providing that when the debtor becomes dishonest and insolvent and shows his dishonesty by overt acts, that then the creditors may take the property before it shall have been wasted and apply it equitably to the payment of creditors. Such a law can not be used as an instrument of oppression. No honest debtor will be or can be injured by it. Only rogues need be afraid of such a law. The creditor class is not only willing but anxious to encourage traders and manufacturers of every class and condition, so long as they remain honest and evince a disposition to meet their obligations. It always has been and always will be to the interest of the creditor class to sustain and keep their debtors out of bankruptcy. So long as debtors are honest and proceed honestly in their business and pay their debts when they can, the creditors are helped in their business, for the debtor is their most efficient ally in obtaining and commanding a market. It is not pay for the goods sold to-day that the dealer is aiming for, but a constant and well-sustained market for the product or products he deals in, and the creditor with this end in view, and aiming to have the profits of money transactions, always has and always will sustain the honest debtor so long as he, on his part, makes a determined and well-directed effort to succeed in business.

To establish a law on the subject of bankruptcies providing simply for voluntary bankruptcy would ruin credit. Such a law would create distrust in the business world the moment written upon the statute books. The merchant would suspect that men were seeking credit for the purpose of incurring as large an indebtedness as possible with the view of ultimately hiding or concealing their property and taking the chances of obtaining a discharge from their debts at a future day. Such a law would destroy all confidence between the debtor and creditor class. Within the last four years commerce and business of all kinds have suffered a paralysis, and what we need is a law that will speedily restore confidence in the business world, especially between the debtor and creditor classes.

It is written in history and is a common-sense proposition that men having money to employ in business will not employ it and give credit unless they have reasonable safeguards protecting them in so doing. When reasonably protected capital always greedily seeks investment, to encourage business, to encourage enterprising men of little or no capital in business. Capital is not lazy, but active, enterprising, ambitious. The men who are content to invest their money at simple interest are quite rare comparatively. Men of large capital are usually those who have amassed it in business, and they usually dislike to see it idle or engaged only in drawing moderate interest. Moneyed men delight to see their money engaged in a business that sets the wheels of great manufacturing industries in motion. Such men delight to know that their capital is making things hum.

When confidence is established and sustained between the capitalist and the honest, industrious, enterprising, poor man, the poor man finds no difficulty whatever in obtaining the aid and assistance of the capital of the rich, but the moment that confidence is destroyed capital hides itself, and the poor man, however industrious, active, or enterprising, finds himself without the ability to command means to engage in business. Hence it is that the Congress of the United States should not put its seal of approval upon any law that has a tendency to destroy the little confidence now remaining in the business world.

The great mass of active business men in the United States and in the civilized world are both debtors and creditors. They belong to both classes. They buy upon credit, and owe numerous and large debts. They sell upon credit, and have large amounts due them and a large number of creditors scattered over every State, and it may be the world.

These men do not want a bankrupt law that is purely voluntary or purely involuntary. In their own interest, to cover all the exigencies of life and of trade, they desire the law to be just first to themselves, and secondly, just to the persons with whom they deal. They can see no equity in a law that would permit their debtors to refuse to pay and then escape their obligations through a voluntary bankruptcy law. If their debtors are to escape the load of debt in certain exigencies and under certain circumstances, they want reserved to themselves the power to take the property of these debtors and apply it to the payment of their debts before it shall have been dishonestly or improvidently scattered and wasted. And the same rule and the same law they would apply to others they are willing to have applied to themselves. A just law is equity, and equity is a just law; and law and equity should go hand in hand, and so the debtor and creditor classes must, if they would prosper, go hand in hand and have laws upon the statute book that are reciprocal in their nature, giving relief and protection to both.

Both labor and capital are interested in the enlargement and extension of the debtor class. Labor wants employment and capital seeks investment. Whenever capital is invested in business it gives employment to labor, and this combination of labor and capital produces something, and this something when produced goes into the markets of the world, is found in the channels of trade, and is continually asking men, who are honest, to buy upon credit, use or sell again, and pay by and by, and so keep the machinery of the business world well oiled and in constant motion. "Never run in debt" is a remark often made, but a principle rarely followed.

Young men of integrity, ability, and ambition, willing to work and determined to succeed, can do but little without credit, and capital would be largely useless unless credit should claim its assistance and cooperation. Intelligent labor is constantly seeking broader fields of usefulness. Inventive genius constantly seeks credit. Capital universally seeks to increase itself. He who would place impediments in the way of either is an enemy to mankind.

Failures sometimes occur. It is taught in Holy Writ that the attempt to create mankind was to a degree a failure. Adam was taken on credit, and he failed to hew to the line. After a few thousand years God sent great floods to wipe mankind from the face of the earth, and only a few were reserved to start business afresh, but God took these on trust, gave them credit, and has allowed the world to go on ever since. I do not think this earth should be blotted from the universe because its inhabitants have not been a perfect success. Nor do I think the credit system should be abolished or condemned because now and then men fail to pay their debts. Nor would I abolish capital because it grows at times intolerant. Those who cry out against combinations of capital and seek to undermine it are their own worst enemies. They degrade and belittle the communities in which they live. Poverty is not a disgrace, nor is it a magnificent blessing. Labor is the grand master, building up nations more surely than the proudest kings, and on the surest foundation. But labor must have its reward, and this is first a good living and then an accumulated capital upon which it may draw when old age has palsied its hand. That is the best nation which contains the most earnest, intelligent labor, the most active industries, the broadest education, the greatest active capital. Riches are the reward of labor and its best friend.

All this being true, the two must work in harmony, be mutually helpful, and our lawmaking powers must be considerate of both. Both have rights entitled to our respect and protection. Therefore, when we deal with the credit system at all, let us deal with and care for all interests, those who extend as well as those who receive credit. To ignore the one while we foster the other is legislative dishonesty, repudiation of duty. When we undertake to enact laws in the interest and for the protection of the debtor class we should see to it that the creditor class have their rights proportionately guarded and protected.

Judge Story, in his most excellent work on the Constitution, says, section 1106:

Without stopping at present to consider what is the precise meaning of each of these terms as contradistinguished from the other, it may be stated that the general objects of all bankrupt and insolvent laws are, on the one hand, to secure to creditors an appropriation of the property of their debtors pro tanto to the discharge of their debts whenever the latter are unable to discharge the whole amount; and, on the other hand, to relieve unfortunate and honest debtors from perpetual bondage to their creditors, either in the shape of unlimited imprisonment to coerce payment of their debts, or of an absolute right to appropriate and monopolize all their future earnings.

Again he says:

One of the first duties of legislation, while it provides amply for the sacred obligation of contracts and the remedies to enforce them, certainly is pari passu to relieve the unfortunate and meritorious debtor from a slavery of mind and body which cuts him off from a fair enjoyment of the common benefits of society and robs his family of the fruits of his labor and the benefits of his paternal superintendence. A national government which did not possess this power of legislation would be little worthy of the exalted functions of guarding the happiness and supporting the rights of a free people. It might guard against political oppressions only to render private oppressions more intolerable and more glaring.

It is evident from these quotations that the views of this great jurist were that the duty of Congress in the exercise of this constitutional power is first to secure to creditors an appropriation of the property of their debtors, who are either unwilling or unable to pay; and secondly, to guarantee to honest debtors a discharge from their pecuniary obligations. Anything short of this is not a bankrupt law. Anything short of this violates the just principles that should guide us in dealing with the subject. To secure these results a law must contain both voluntary and involuntary provisions.

It always has been and always will be impossible to enact or put into operation perfect laws on this or any other subject. Any system of laws born of the brain of mortal man will be incomplete, found to contain imperfections, but bringing to our aid the experience of mankind, taking into consideration the wants or needs of the human race, we can legislate with some degree of wisdom, and this we do when we regard all our citizens, all our interests, and have a care to foster and protect everything conducive to the general good of our country and its institutions.

No State pride or jealousy should stand in the way of the enactment of just, comprehensive, and complete laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. State laws are necessarily incomplete and inefficient. Each State can pass laws affecting its own citizens and discharging them from the obligations of contracts entered into subsequently to their enactment. But as no State can pass laws impairing the obligation of a contract it is utterly unable to pass insolvent laws that shall affect debts incurred before their enactment or between citizens of different States.

Says Story, section 1107:

But there are peculiar reasons independent of these general considerations why the Government of the United States should be intrusted with this power. They result from the importance of preserving harmony, promoting justice, and securing rights and remedies among the citizens of all the States. * * * There can be no other adequate remedy than giving a power to the General Government to introduce and perpetuate a uniform system.

Again, the author says:

In the next place, it is clear that no State can introduce any system which shall extend beyond its own territorial limits and the persons who are subject to its jurisdiction. Creditors residing in other States can not be bound by its laws, and debts contracted in other States are beyond the reach of its legislation. It can neither discharge the obligation of such contracts nor touch the remedies which relate to them in any other jurisdiction. So that the most meritorious insolvent debtor will be harassed by new suits and new litigations as often as he moves out of the State boundaries. His whole property may be absorbed by his creditors residing in a single State, and he may be left to the severe retributions of judicial process in every other State in the Union. Among a people whose general and commercial intercourse must be so great and so constantly increasing as in the United States, this alone would be a most enormous evil and bear with peculiar severity upon all the commercial States. Very few persons engaged in active business will be without debtors or creditors in many States in the Union. The evil is incapable of being redressed by the States. It can be adequately redressed only by the power of the Union. One of the most pressing grievances bearing upon commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests at the present moment is the total want of a general system of bankruptcy. It is well known that the power has lain dormant, except for a short period, ever since the Constitution was adopted; and the excellent system then put into operation was repealed before it had any fair trial upon grounds generally believed to be wholly beside its merits, and from causes more easily understood than deliberately vindicated.

These considerations so ably and cogently presented ought to impress every member of the Fifty-fourth Congress with the necessity of immediate and wise action.

The present financial distress and depression impresses everyone and invites our attention to the wisdom and necessity of providing relief to the victims of business failures not in their power to avert. Thousands of our best and most energetic business men are now hopelessly involved and bowed down beneath a load of debt which they are powerless to lift. We owe it to these men, to society, to our country, to enact a law that shall bring a spring-time of hope to these men and encourage them to a renewal of their old-time business vigor and activity. At the same time we must be reasonably certain that we do not throw open avenues that invite the dishonest to a career of fraud and speculation, the reckless to a life of extravagance and dissipation. Enough run easily and heedlessly into debt and then resort to questionable methods to secrete the remnants of their property without having an invitation extended and a promise deliberately made by the lawmaking power that however heedless, reckless, and extravagant their conduct may be the door to escape is wide open and the way plain and easy.

In point of fact, these views would seem to have commended themselves to the better judgment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], for, having introduced House bill 259, to which I have made reference and from which I have made quotations and which is a purely voluntary bill, that gentleman submitted to the subcommittee having this bill in charge another proposition, headed as follows:

H. R. (no number). In the House of Representatives.

Mr. BAILEY submits as his report from the subcommittee the following bill:

A bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Then follow eight sections substantially word for word like bill H. R. 259. In section 9 of his report from the subcommittee that gentleman takes a new departure and inserts a provision providing for involuntary bankruptcy, as follows:

That any three or more creditors of any debtor entitled to take the benefit of the provisions of this act may file their petition in a court having jurisdiction over such debtor, alleging that said debtor is a merchant, broker, banker, trader, manufacturer, or miner, and that he owes them debts amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $500 or more, and that he has within four months of the filing of said petition, and since the passage of this act, committed either of the following acts, namely: First, concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent, actual on his part, to avoid the service of civil process and to defraud his creditors; second, made a transfer of any of his property with actual intent on his part to defraud his creditors; third, made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property, or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon, by process of law or otherwise, for the purpose of giving a preference; fourth, procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself with intent to defraud his creditors; fifth, secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors.

The court shall cause its due notice to be given to the debtor on such petition, and if, upon hearing, the allegations thereof are found to be true, such debtor shall be adjudged bankrupt, and proceedings shall be had as provided in this act for the distribution of the estate of a debtor among his creditors, except that the assignment provided herein to be made by the debtor shall be made by a decree of the court to such assignee as the court shall appoint upon the nomination of a majority in number and value of the creditors, or, in the absence of such nomination, in the discretion of the court, and thereupon like proceedings shall be had as are provided in this act for a case of voluntary bankruptcy.

It will be observed that this provision is much more radical and drastic in many respects than the bill reported by the full committee and now under consideration.

The provisions of this bill reported to the full committee by Mr. BAILEY, who was a member of the subcommittee, shows that the work of the subcommittee was not without result, and that the gentleman from Texas had been, in part at least, converted to the idea that a just and true bankruptcy law should contain both voluntary and involuntary features. Whether this conversion was genuine and permanent or not, it demonstrates that the gentleman from Texas is quite at sea regarding the true basis upon which a bankrupt law should be constructed. In the Fifty-third Congress he wrote and secured the passage through the House, by a very narrow majority, his bill providing for voluntary bankruptcy. At the very beginning of this Congress, and on the 6th day of December, 1895, he introduced H. R. 259, providing simply for voluntary bankruptcy, but he prepared and had printed as his report from the subcommittee the bill above referred to. This action on his part demonstrates one of three things; that the gentleman's mind is vacillating, that he really believes that a bankrupt law should contain both voluntary and involuntary provisions, or that he would prevent, if possible, by confusing the mind of this House, the enactment of a just and complete law on the subject of bankruptcy containing both voluntary and involuntary provisions.

Both bills suggested by the gentleman from Texas, and to which I have referred, provide that the act shall continue in force two years and no longer, except as to proceedings commenced within that time. He now proposes H. R. 8234.

If a law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States should be enacted at all, the measure should be a permanent one and not merely temporary, a mere makeshift. If parties who are in debt to-day and unable to discharge their pecuniary obligations are entitled to a discharge from their debts, then those who are in the same predicament three and four and five years hence ought to have the same privileges extended to them. There is no good reason why a bankruptcy law should be temporary. It concerns the great debtor and creditor classes; it affects trade, commerce, and credit, and should be permanent and afford security to the creditor class and immunity to the honest debtor class when its provisions have been honestly complied with. Stability in law and in policy makes a country respectable and respected. Instability makes any government weak.

It may be that the unwise tariff legislation enacted by the Fifty-third Congress will give place to wise and efficient legislation on that subject enacted by the Fifty-fifth Congress. It may be that the financial distress and ruin brought upon the people of the United States by the unwise and incompetent Democratic Administration that has controlled affairs for the past three years have made all the bankrupts they will, and that if we pass a temporary bill designed to clear the deck and cure, so far as possible, the evils of improper legislation, we shall have done a good work and been of some use to the American people. But the Fifty-fourth Congress should not act simply as a physician. It is not here to cure diseases only. This Congress should legislate not only to cure existing ills, but to avert, if possible, distress and wrongs in the future. This Congress should aim to enact permanent laws that will build up and strengthen business, trade, commerce, agriculture; that will strengthen the hands of persons engaged in these pursuits. This Congress should aim to strengthen our financial condition and give confidence to all classes of our citizens.

NATIONAL AND STATE CONDITIONS DEMAND THE ESTABLISHMENT OF UNIFORM LAWS ON THE SUBJECT OF BANKRUPTCIES.

We should do all we can to extend and strengthen our national credit, and to do this we must maintain individual credit. A nation of bankrupts can not maintain national credit. The character and strength of a nation is measured largely by the integrity, intelligence, and ability of the people composing it. The day has gone by when physical power determines the standing of a nation among the governments of the earth. Fleets and standing armies will always command a certain degree of respect by operating on the fears of mankind, but even these can not be maintained without a firm national credit behind them. The United States of America would have gone down in defeat and suffered dissolution had not its credit at home and abroad commanded the respect, first, of her own people, and secondly, the respect and confidence of foreign nations and their people. The independence of the Southern Confederacy would have been recognized by some foreign nations and the attempt made by them to establish it had not our people exhibited the ability and willingness to maintain our national credit, sustain armies and navies, and maintain and defend the integrity of the nation, the Union of the States.

Wise uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States will do much to maintain our credit both at home and abroad. The more we foster, protect, and sustain our own industries, manufactures, and business men the more we add to our individual and consequently our national wealth. Couple this with honesty, and we have the indestructible basis of national prosperity. To-day we are dealing largely with the citizens of foreign nations, and we are seeking to extend these commercial relations. Credit is asked and received and must be maintained. We measure foreign nations by the wisdom of their laws, their ability and willingness to protect persons and property and property rights. We are weighed in the same manner and by the same rules. Let it be understood that the strong arm of the National Government is ready to extend itself and secure the honest administration and distribution of insolvent debtors' estates among their creditors, and the citizens of all civilized nations will have confidence in entering into commercial transactions with and extending credit to citizens of the United States regardless of the State in which they live.

Distrust of States and State laws will disappear or cease to be a factor in commercial transactions not only between citizens of the different States, but between citizens of the United States and of foreign nations. It is common knowledge that the laws of many of the States are extremely lax or inefficient in providing means for the just and equitable application of the property of an insolvent debtor to the payment of his just debts. As a result, it is many times difficult and sometimes impossible for residents of some of the States to obtain credit, and so trade and commerce even among citizens of the several States is limited and crippled.

In my judgment, no wiser action can be taken by this House, especially under existing conditions, than to provide uniform laws on this subject. Some of the States complain of the poverty of their people. The great West and South want credit with the East. The complaint has come from the West that the East has quite largely withdrawn investments, and she has felt this action and feels it to-day. This withdrawal of capital and credit has resulted in a depreciation of values and general business stagnation. Whatever other causes have contributed to this condition, one cause has been the distrust pervading moneyed men in the East of the efficiency and adequacy of State insolvent laws in the South and West.

So long as States permit debtors to prefer creditors without restriction or substantial limitation, making it possible, and even probable, that the debtor, when overtaken by insolvency, will devote all his property to the payment of his home creditors, friends, and relatives near by, whether it be honestly or fraudulently, merchants, manufacturers, and business men residing without their boundaries will be exceedingly shy of extending credit to citizens of those States. Usually they will not do this at all without exacting security that the would-be debtor is either unable or unwilling to give—security that he can not give without inviting attention to his weak financial condition, and thus impairing and usually destroying his credit at home.

A fair and impartial consideration of these conditions must be conclusive of the wisdom of the enactment of this bill into law. We must remember that our population, wealth, manufacturing industries, and interstate commerce are rapidly increasing.

The rapid growth and development of our means of intercommunication; the spread and extension of railroad lines, making transportation easy, rapid, and cheap; the growth of telegraph lines and the invention of the telephone, making it possible for the merchant in New York City to converse with the customer in Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, and other western cities, and the growth and improvement of our mail service, together with the rapid growth of industries and manufactures in certain sections unknown to others, but the products of which are necessary for the use of almost every citizen in every home in the land, makes an interchange of our manufactures and products absolutely necessary to our prosperity. With this interchange trade and interstate commerce, credit must go hand in hand. Credit will be demanded when the agricultural States purchase the implements and supplies manufactured in others. They will pay when crops are marketed. Credit is asked when the great food products of the South and West are put on the market. The manufacturer purchases cotton on credit. If credit is not given, then these crops are sold to speculators for ready cash at less than their real value, and so the rich are made richer and poor producers, usually the planter and farmer, are made poorer, deprived of the just fruits of their toil. So illustrations may be multiplied at will. It all tends to illustrate the necessity of maintaining and making reasonably safe the credit system, a system as old as man and absolutely necessary to the growth and prosperity of any people.

To this end, as stated, a wise and moderate yet efficient system of uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies is necessary.

The fathers who framed our Constitution foresaw the wisdom and necessity of conferring upon Congress this power. Present conditions demand its exercise. The great army of 175,000 persons who have met with financial disaster and are virtually debarred from actively engaging in business in a legitimate manner and other thousands who would profit by their release from their financial burdens, and more than 500,000 business men engaged in commercial pursuits demand a wise and efficient law on this subject.

The Fifty-fourth Congress will not have lived in vain if it does its duty in this regard and does what it can to dispel the financial gloom enshrouding so many of our most enterprising citizens.

If we do this, and act wisely in the doing, we shall gladden many a home, carry good news to many a despairing debtor, give new life and vigor to thousands of our best and most enterprising, though unfortunate, business men, gratify the creditor classes, strengthen our credit at home and abroad, extend our trade and commerce, and do much to set in motion the wheels of workshops and factories long idle and useless.

I trust this House will speak with no uncertain or wavering voice, for the Republican party is not only the friend of progress and of liberty, but of the oppressed and unfortunate. Let us not hesitate to exercise our constitutional powers when by so doing we add to the strength, wealth, wealth-producing power, and security of the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, I add as a part of my remarks some of the comments of Mr. Wolverton, an able Democrat from Pennsylvania, made by him on the Bailey bill H. R. 4609, in the Fifty-third Congress. (See Report 206, part 3.) That bill was virtually the same as the Bailey bill H. R. 259, the Bailey bill H. R. 8234, and the Bailey bill (no number) all of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The minority of the Committee on the Judiciary respectfully dissent from the report of the committee, and submit herewith their principal reasons therefor, as follows:

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE TORREY BANKRUPTCY BILL AND THE BAILEY BILL.

The Bailey bill (H. R. 4609) is an incomplete measure, which contains imperfect provisions for voluntary bankruptcy; the Torrey bankruptcy bill (H. R. 4617) is a complete measure, which contains comprehensive provisions for voluntary as well as involuntary bankruptcy.

The incomplete bill (the Bailey bill) may not be, but the complete bill (the Torrey bankruptcy bill) is, constitutional.

The incomplete bill would be an experiment in bankruptcy legislation in this country; the complete bill embodies the wisdom and avoids the errors of past legislation in this and other countries.

The incomplete bill may not prove to be, but the complete bill is, unquestionably, a bankruptcy bill.

The incomplete bill may not apply to the whole country; it might be, in effect, repealed and reenacted from time to time by State and Territorial legislative acts or decisions by their courts; the complete bill applies to the whole country and can not be affected, except by an act of Congress.

The incomplete bill does not grant any relief to debtors who owe less than $300; the complete bill grants relief to debtors without invidious distinctions as to amounts owed.

The incomplete bill leaves it discretionary with debtors to provide for the payment in full of the wages of servants and laborers in the States where they are not provided for by the insolvent laws; the complete bill makes absolute provision for the payment of the wages of employees of every grade for a reasonable time prior to bankruptcy, and for a liberal amount, and will apply alike in all of the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia.

The incomplete bill requires an assignment to be made by the debtor according to the laws of the State where he lives, and also according to its provisions, although they may be in conflict; it also requires that the trust shall be accepted by the trustee before an application for a discharge can be made; the complete bill permits the bankrupt to make his application to the Federal court for a discharge, irrespective of conflicts between State laws and the Federal laws, and without reference to the acts of the trustee.

The incomplete bill permits applications for discharges to be made without limit of time or number after the expiration of four months after the date of the assignment while it is in force; the complete bill permits the application to be made after the expiration of two, and within the next four months, or conditionally within the next six months, but not afterwards.

The incomplete bill makes it possible for discharges to be improperly granted or withheld without reason; the complete bill embodies such safeguards as are calculated to enable all honest insolvent debtors to receive discharges and to prevent all dishonest debtors receiving them.

The incomplete bill permits corporations, including national banks, to be discharged; the complete bill does not seek to interfere with the rights of creditors to pursue their remedies against the stockholders of corporations, and hence withholds the right of discharge.

The incomplete bill will permit the discharge of dishonest debtors, except those who make an assignment within three months before its passage; the complete bill provides for the discharge of only such debtors as are honest and ought to receive this great consideration under the law without reference to the time they become bankrupt.

The incomplete bill as well as the complete bill forbids the discharge of a person from any debt created by a defalcation while acting as a public officer, an executor, guardian, or trustee, or in any fiduciary capacity; but the incomplete bill permits the discharge of a corporation, although it may have plundered the estate of which it was executor or administrator, robbed a child of which it was guardian, misappropriated the funds received as a trustee or in some other fiduciary capacity.

The incomplete bill neither leaves the administration of the estates of unfortunates to be wholly dealt with by the State insolvent laws in their diverse ways nor to a national bankruptcy law in a comprehensive way; the complete bill is a national law and vests jurisdiction to administer it for the benefit of debtors and creditors in the Federal courts.

The incomplete bill requires proceedings to be had, first, under a State law, and, second, under a Federal law; the complete bill provides for proceedings only under a Federal law.

The incomplete bill provides that property shall be assigned and administered by a State law, subject to the provisions of this Federal law; it also provides that where property in different States is assigned it shall be according to the laws of the State where the debtor resides; the complete bill leaves no room for unfortunate conflicts between State and Federal laws and the laws of different States, to be fought out at the expense of our citizens who may honestly endeavor to exercise a constitutional right.

The incomplete bill requires that the costs of two courts shall be incurred; the complete bill provides for economical proceedings in only one court.

The incomplete bill will expire in two years; the complete bill will protect the rights of debtors and creditors without limit of time.

The incomplete bill extends the benefits of voluntary bankruptcy, in the States and Territories where it applies, to corporations, including national banks; the complete bill does not permit corporations to become voluntary bankrupts, but extends to them, except national banks, the benefits of involuntary bankruptcy.

The incomplete bill is an imperfect reproduction of the law of the "Poor English gentleman"; the complete bill embodies all that is wise and conservative in the English bankruptcy act of to-day.

The incomplete bill is alleged to be in the interest of debtors; the complete bill recognizes the fact that all debtors are not poor, nor all creditors rich, and therefore protects the interests of both classes alike, without reference to their poverty or their wealth.

The incomplete bill is calculated to destroy credit and thereby require a great majority of those who buy property or borrow money, especially in a small way, to give good security in the form of collateral, indorsements, or mortgages, for their indebtedness; the complete bill will extend credit by securing an equitable enforcement of the rights of both the debtors and creditors, and will have a tendency to enable would-be debtors to buy property and borrow money without security, since under it preferences will not be given and the equitable rights of creditors will be secured.

The incomplete bill is not, but the complete bill is, demanded in the best interests of honest debtors.

The incomplete bill might, but the complete bill would not, advance the interests of dishonest debtors.

The incomplete bill is not, but the complete bill is, demanded in the best interests of both debtors and creditors.

The incomplete bill, or a purely involuntary bankruptcy bill, would not, but the complete bill would, protect the best interests alike of poor and rich creditors.

The incomplete bill would not, but the complete bill would, protect and promote the interests of consumers.

The incomplete bill is not demanded by any organization or by any man outside of Congress, so far as we know or have heard; its enactment is not advocated by any newspaper, so far as we have been advised; the complete bill has been demanded by organizations of all sorts, petitioners of every class, and very generally by the press in all parts of the country.

The incomplete bill is not, but the complete bill is, advocated in the best interests of all classes of people.

The incomplete bill is not, but the complete bill is, supported by the members of Congress who are in favor of securing to all of the people every right guaranteed by the Constitution.

The incomplete bill was voted down in the Fifty-first Congress in the House; the complete bill was passed at the same time by a large nonpolitical, nonsectional majority.

The incomplete bill was adversely reported by this committee in the Fifty-second Congress; the complete bill, at the same time, was reported by this committee as a comprehensive embodiment of the legislation anticipated by the Constitution.

When the debate on the Torrey bankruptcy bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary began, the reading of the bill by the Clerk to the members was postponed upon the suggestion of a member from Texas until it should be considered under the five-minute rule; before that time came a member from Missouri, Mr. Bland, moved to strike out the enacting clause, and the motion prevailed. In the debate upon that motion it was stated, and not contradicted, that two-thirds of the members had not read the bill. We therefore respectfully submit that this subject has not been considered by the members of the House.

The complete bill is the one, the enacting clause of which was stricken out, with a few amendments suggested in the course of the general debate as calculated to improve it.

The fact that the incomplete bill was reintroduced by the leader of the opposition, Mr. BAILEY, and its prompt report to the House secured by those who have heretofore been classed as opponents to bankruptcy legislation, immediately after Mr. Bland's motion was made and carried, at an unexpected time to its friends, is an admission that bankruptcy legislation is demanded by the people. Since this demand is to be answered, the only question is, Will Congress pass the incomplete or the complete bill? When the members of the House shall have considered the subject fully we have no doubt but that their conclusion will be a wise one, and that the complete bill will be adopted as a substitute and then passed.

IS THE BAILEY BILL CONSTITUTIONAL?

Out of deference to the views of the members of the committee who have reported the Bailey bill to the House, we will not express an opinion as to whether it is or is not constitutional. We will, however, submit some questions which each member may answer for himself. If the answer to any of these questions, or any one of others equally pertinent, shall be adverse to the bill, such answer will show it to be unconstitutional. The fact that these questions are pertinent certainly shows that the bill is impractical and ought not to be passed in preference to one which is free from these objections.

By the first section of the Bailey bill it is provided:

"That if any debtor * * * shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in which he may reside or be domiciled, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property, valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the requirements of this act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for."

By the second section it is provided:

"That such assignment shall be made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides."

Does this bill, by its above provisions, undertake to say how assignments under State laws shall be made? If so, it provides for a condition of things which may be illustrated thus: Mr. BAILEY resides in Texas. If he has property there and also in Mississippi and should wish to make an assignment under the first section of his bill, the one in Texas would have to conform to the laws of that State, and also "with the requirements of this act"; the one in Mississippi would have to conform to the laws of that State and also "with the requirements of this act." If he should wish to make an assignment under the second section of his bill, the assignment in Mississippi would have to be "made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides," i. e., in accordance to the laws of Texas. Would a national law which required an assignment to be made of property in any given State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in accordance with State or Territorial laws other than its own, be constitutional?

If it should be claimed that the above provisions are not for the purpose of overriding State, Territorial, or District of Columbia laws, but that they simply state conditions which must be complied with by a debtor before he can get a discharge, then our question is: Can a debtor having property in more than one State, or Territory, or the District of Columbia and a State or Territory, get a discharge under this bill? If not, is it not unconstitutional for want of uniformity?

By the second section it is also provided:

"The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the debtor resides, subject to the provisions of this act."

Take again the example of Mr. BAILEY; let us waive the question, as it is a difficult one, as to how he is to assign his property in Mississippi, and consider the question of its administration, both in that and his own State. Does this provision require the State of Texas to administer estates assigned under its laws "subject to the provisions of this act"? We have always thought that when a State legislature, while in the exercise of its constitutional authority, passed a law, that the courts of that State might enforce it without reference to the "provisions of an act" of any other legislative body on earth! Does the above provision require the assigned estate, in the example given, to be administered by the courts of Mississippi "according to the laws of the State" of Texas and "subject to the provisions of this act"? The language used is, "shall be administered," etc. If such are its requirements, is it constitutional? It can not be said that it constitutes simply a condition precedent to a discharge, because, upon a hearing under a petition for a discharge, it is not required that any showing should be made as to the administration of the estate.

By the second section it is also provided:

"That such assignment * * * shall convey all of the estate of the debtor, except, etc., * * * and shall be for the equal benefit of all his creditors, subject, etc., * * * It shall contain a list, etc., * * * a schedule, etc., * * * a statement of liens, etc., * * * all of which shall be verified, etc., * * *"

This bill does not purport to provide for any proceedings in a United States court in which the question of bankruptcy shall be determined, by which the rights of creditors shall be adjudged, or by which the assets shall be marshaled and distributed. Can these provisions, therefore, have any force which relates simply to the effect and provisions of the assignment under State laws? It would be competent for such a law to embrace a comprehensive bankruptcy system, i. e., to provide, first, for the determination of the jurisdictional fact as to whether a given debtor was or was not a bankrupt; second, for the administration of the estates of bankrupts (not simply of debtors); third, the discharge of the bankrupt (not for the discharge of a debtor who might or might not be a bankrupt); fourth, the adjudication of the rights of creditors; and, fifth, the punishment of those who have committed frauds. In the event of such a law, embracing such a system, it might properly provide for an injunction against proceedings in the State courts which were in conflict with it. But since it does not so provide, will any restrictions which it may apply, first, as to what the State courts shall do, and, second, as to how they shall do it, have any binding force upon such courts? Is it not, therefore, unconstitutional for this reason?

Section 5 contains a provision with reference to what debtors the court may discharge, as follows:

"That the debtor did make an assignment * * * and that no attachment has been levied upon the property of such debtor within three months before the passage of this bill: Provided, however, That if, within four months after the levy of an attachment, the debtor shall execute an assignment or cession and file a petition for a discharge as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment, and such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act."

The primary purpose of this bill is to provide for the granting of discharges; and yet it is here provided how a debtor may "vacate the levy of" a State attachment otherwise than by paying the demand or giving bond. Would a State court which had issued an attachment, and a State officer who had executed it, pay any attention to such a provision in a United States law? Ought they to do so?

We will consider for a moment, only for a moment, that this bill may properly provide that an attempt of the defendant to assign the title to the property which has been attached and the filing of an application for a discharge in the United States court will vacate the levy of a State attachment. We take this view simply to enable us to consider an additional defect in this provision. Suppose that within the time provided the debtor makes the assignment or cession, but the property shall have been already sold under an attachment prior to his making such application, or prior to his making such assignment or cession, and the proceeds of such a sale shall have been paid over to satisfy the demands of the attaching creditors. The effect, in such an event, could not be to "vacate the levy of such attachment." Could the creditors who had not attached enforce this provision? Would the debtor be entitled to file his application for a discharge? Suppose that his attempt to assign the property as herein provided should be ignored by the State court issuing the attachment and its officer levying it, could the debtor then file his petition for a discharge? Is there anyone who will claim that such a provision is constitutional?

In brief, is not this bill unconstitutional because of what it contains and what it does not contain?

As between a bill concerning which, if enacted, there would be at least a reasonable doubt as to its constitutionality and one concerning which no such doubt exists we are in favor of the latter.

IS THE BAILEY BILL A BANKRUPTCY BILL?

Does the measure of Mr. BAILEY constitute more than an attempt to meddle with the State courts in their endeavor, under imperfect insolvency laws, to exercise the jurisdiction which was reserved to Congress by the Constitution? Is it anything more than an endeavor to pay, by the judgment of a court, the debts of debtors who never have been adjudged, and may not be, bankrupts?

Can a law under which there can not be any bankrupts be said to be a bankruptcy law?

This bill does not purport, by its terms, "to establish * * * uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," as provided by the Constitution. Its language is as follows:

"A bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy."

Even if the title conformed to the language of the Constitution, it would not make it a bankruptcy bill. You can not make a signboard into a house by posting a notice upon it. "This is a house."

"Laws on the subject of bankruptcies" had well-defined characteristics when that provision was inserted in the Constitution. It follows that any bill which it is proposed to enact, under the power given to Congress by the Constitution, must have those characteristics or else there is no power to enact it. Those characteristics were that there should be an adjudication in bankruptcy; an identification of the creditors and an adjudication of their rights; the discharge of, or refusal to discharge, the bankrupt if he filed a petition therefor; an administration of the estate; and the punishment of those who had committed frauds.

The first step is to give the debtor a status which will vest the court with jurisdiction of him and of his estate. Suppose that in an involuntary proceeding in bankruptcy, under a bankruptcy law, it should be found that an act of bankruptcy had not been committed; the result would be that the court would not have jurisdiction and the case would be dismissed. If upon a hearing for the discharge of a voluntary bankrupt under a bankruptcy law it should appear that he had never filed a petition in bankruptcy, it would follow that he had never become a bankrupt, and therefore the court never had jurisdiction of him, and his application for a discharge would have to be dismissed. In other words, a bankruptcy court can never have jurisdiction of anyone except a bankrupt. When such jurisdiction is acquired, it extends to the rights of the creditors, the rights of the bankrupt, the administration of the estate, and the protection of the creditors, the bankrupt, and the estate, by the punishment of those who have committed frauds.

Under the Bailey bill the debtor is required only to make an assignment, secure its acceptance by the trustee therein named, and apply for a discharge. It is not necessary that the assignment shall have been filed or that his status shall have been fixed by the decree of any court. It can not, therefore, be said that he is a bankrupt. As the debtor does not become a bankrupt, the bill can not be a bankruptcy bill.

Mr. BAILEY, in his report, makes an admission as to the character of his bill as follows:

"This bill not only differs from all previous enactments in being purely voluntary, but another and material difference is that under it the property is administered according to State laws."

Can a law which "differs from all previous enactments" be established under the Constitution?

We hasten to explain, in view of the failure of the bill reported to have any of the characteristics of a bankruptcy law, that it was reported in the absence of three members of the committee on the day after it was introduced, and that there was a feeling that the House would decide the question, and that it was desirable to get the subject up again for consideration without delay.

In view of the characteristics of the bankruptcy law provided for in the Constitution, formulated and unanimously adopted by George Washington and his associates, what is the bill by Mr. BAILEY and his associates? It is unknown to the Constitution; it has no parallel in past legislation; it is a stranger to us, and we can not, therefore, give it a name. We advocate a bill which, when read to or by the members, will be found to contain each one of those characteristics, expressed in plain and simple language. We therefore think that it ought to be adopted as a substitute and then passed.

WILL THE BAILEY BILL APPLY TO THE DEBTORS OF THE WHOLE COUNTRY?

The language of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power to pass such a bill as the one in question is as follows:

"To establish * * * uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

We are in favor of carrying into effect this provision of the Constitution by the enactment of a perfectly fair and impartial law, as understood by our constitutional fathers.

The first section of the Bailey bill provides as follows:

"That if any debtor * * * shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, etc., * * * it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for."

The legislature of Montana never has passed an assignment law. It has relied upon Congress to pass a bankruptcy law. Will the effect of the measure proposed be, if enacted, to deny any relief to the debtors of that State? Why should we pass such a law when we may as well pass one which is comprehensive of the rights of both debtors and creditors "throughout the United States," as provided by the Constitution?

We have not had time to examine the statutes of all of the States; there may be others which have no laws upon the subject. If so, their citizens may, under this proposed law, be denied their constitutional rights.

This law will result where it applies, if enacted, in a diverse administration of the estates of bankrupts in the States and Territories and the District of Columbia. Can it, therefore, be said to be "uniform throughout the United States"?

The citizens of all of the States which now have such laws may be denied their constitutional rights, as citizens of the United States, by their supreme court deciding that such laws were for some reason void, or by the repealing of such laws by their legislature. This proposed law may be, in effect, enacted or repealed again and again by legislative action thereon and without any action by Congress.

This proposed law does not of and within itself confer any right upon a citizen; the right which it purports to confer is wholly dependent upon the action heretofore or hereafter of a State or Territorial legislature or by Congress with reference to the District of Columbia.

Why should our constitutional rights as citizens of the United States be thus denied us, or be jeopardized by the possible action of our courts or legislatures, since they act wholly as to our rights as citizens of the State?

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we were a national body, composed of representatives from the whole country? We think not.

The first section provides as follows:

"That if any debtor * * * shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, etc., * * * in which he may reside or be domiciled, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property, valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the requirements of this act."

The above provision is contradicted by one from the second section, as follows:

"That such assignment shall be made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides."

The second section also provides as follows:

"The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the debtor resides, subject to the provisions of this act."

The debtor having property in two States can never make an assignment according to both of the above provisions and therefore can not, as it seems to us, have the benefits of the act.

The debtor having property in two States can never secure the administration of that part of it which is situated in a State other than that of his domicile according to any laws other than those of the States in which the property is situated; the provisions of this act, therefore, can never be complied with in that respect. In view of these provisions, what must be said concerning the uniformity of this bill "throughout the United States"? Possibly the explanation is to be found in the title to the bill. It is not by its terms to establish uniform laws "throughout the United States," as required by the Constitution, but only "to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy."

Upon a consideration of the whole subject it seems to us that we must reach the conclusion that the enactment of such a law would not be a full exercise of the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution to legislate upon this subject.

Such are the provisions of the bill reported favorably, the next day after being introduced, by a committee of lawyers of which we are members!

SMALL DEBTORS MUST, BUT LARGE ONES NEED NOT, PAY.

Section 1 of the Bailey bill provides that it shall apply only to persons who owe $200 or more. Why should this financial limitation be put upon voluntary bankruptcy? The man who owes less than this sum may be as effectually borne down by it as the man who owes a greater sum. The probabilities are that he will be less able to pay it than the man who has succeeded in owing a larger amount. Why should a rule be established that a debtor who owes amounts up to $200 must pay or continue to owe them, but the debtor who owes a larger sum may secure a discharge without the payment of any sum? We contend that all citizens should be equal before the law.

Can it be possible that the members of the Committee on the Judiciary wish to recommend to the House that it shall draw this kind of a distinction between citizens who have large financial obligations and those who have small ones?

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we earnestly wish to legislate wisely for the equal benefit of all classes of the people? We think not.

The complete bill extends the benefits of voluntary bankruptcy to all debtors, except corporations, without invidious distinctions as to amounts owed. It provides that creditors holding unsecured claims for $500 or over against a common debtor may commence proceedings for themselves and such other creditors as may wish to join them. This provision was made as to involuntary bankruptcy, because it was thought that a substantial benefit would not accrue to creditors by permitting them to proceed in cases where the indebtedness was less than that sum.

We do not want in this country any distinction between citizens under the laws because of their occupation, or because they are rich or because they are poor. We want it possible for an honest man, irrespective of the amount he owes, to make a voluntary surrender of his property, except his exemptions, and, if honest, secure a discharge; but we do not want it to be possible for a rich man to hide away his property and then go into bankruptcy and secure a discharge from his debts which he could and ought to pay. We do not want it possible for poor men to become rich by such means.

If a debtor has become insolvent and can not meet his obligations and protect his property we think his creditors ought to be entitled to proceed, under very careful restrictions, to secure the payment of at least a percentage of their claims, since it is the same to them in dollars and cents whether the loss they suffer grows out of dishonesty, incompetency, or the misfortune of their debtor. We want it to be possible for the creditors of a debtor who has swindled his creditors, or is preparing to swindle them, to be able to interfere by involuntary proceedings and secure their equitable rights.

The bill we offer as a substitute for the Bailey bill will apply, approximately, to the affairs of only one in a hundred of those who do business or conduct agricultural, mineral, or other industries in whole or in part on credit; it will affect the affairs of those to whom it does imply with impartiality, and therefore ought to be passed.

THE PROTECTION OF SERVANTS AND LABORERS INCOMPLETE.

The third section of the Bailey bill provides that there may be preferences for—

"Debts due the United States or any State in which any of the property of the debtor is situated, or to the servants or laborers of the debtor."

This provision leaves it discretionary to the debtor as to whether he will or will not provide for his servants or laborers, unless there is such a provision in the State law. We think that any bill on this subject should provide that servants and laborers should have a preferred claim for their wages. Eight of the States, as shown by a published table, do not make any provision under their assignment laws for the protection of servants and laborers. Such States and Territories as have enacted such laws might repeal them.

Would the passage of this bill indicate what we know of the daily necessities of laborers and of the wise public policy which justifies the payment to them when their employer fails of their wages for a limited time before such failure and in a reasonable amount? We think not.

The bill which we submit as a substitute makes provision for the payment of the wages of servants and laborers earned within a reasonable time, before the date of the failure of the employer, and for a liberal amount, without reference to whether the States have or have not done so. It thereby not only secures the rights of those in the States where they would be neglected under the provisions of the Bailey bill, and in all of the other States where they might be so neglected by the repeal of present laws, but it establishes a uniform rule under which the rights of servants and laborers of the whole country will be protected.

The wages of employees should be paid, because it will promote alike the best interests of debtors and other creditors. The great body of laborers live from day to day on their daily earnings. If they were compelled, in the event of the failure of their employer, to take a percentage of their wages in common with other creditors, as they might have to in eight of the States under the Bailey bill, it would result in untold hardships to them and their families. The possibilities of having such calamities befall them would result in their having always to be on the alert with reference to the financial standing and moral worth of their employers. Whenever it happened that they knew that their employers were about to fail, or thought there was danger, or heard a rumor, or became frightened, with or without cause, they, or many of them at least, would be compelled in financial self-defense to quit their employment. Such a result might possibly be secured by the circulation of a malicious rumor as to the solvency or fraudulent acts of an employer. The abandonment by employees of their employment at a critical time might ruin financially a solvent, honest employer. Such an abandonment might result in irreparable damage to the property of an employer who had become insolvent, and thereby result in great injury to the property interests of the creditors.

The bill we offer as a substitute is not liable to these objections, and hence ought to be passed in the best interest of employees, as well as other creditors, and of debtors.

IMPERFECT AS TO DISCHARGES.

The fourth section of the Bailey bill provides that—

"Such debtor, after the expiration of four months from the date of the execution of the deed of assignment and the acceptance of the trust by the trustees, may file his petition * * * asking for a discharge from said debts."

Suppose the trustee should not accept the trust. In that event the debtor might not be able to file his application for a discharge; at any rate he might be denied what ought to be his right, or hampered and delayed in securing it, by the whim or caprice of a trustee. There is no pertinent relationship between the right to file an application for a discharge and the acceptance by the trustee, and the bill ought not to make the one dependent upon the other.

This bill provides how property shall be assigned, surrendered, and administered. There are now in the country many hundreds of thousands of honest debtors who ought to be discharged under any law which may be passed, but who have no property to assign, surrender, or to have administered. Will this bill apply to this army of men? If it will, why should they be put to the trouble of making an assignment under a State law only to go with a copy of it to a United States court and begin another proceeding?

This bill provides that a debtor can not apply for a discharge in a United States court until after making an assignment under a State law. Great numbers of unfortunate men have been compelled to make assignments under the imperfect State insolvency laws during the many years that Congress has refused to pass a wise bankruptcy law; their estates have been administered and they are now penniless. Many of the States have passed insolvency laws under which creditors may cause the estates of their debtors to be liquidated. Many, many men have seen their estates thus disposed of and are now waiting for relief under a national law. Will this bill apply to these different classes of unfortunate men? If so, why should it not permit them to apply directly to a United States court? Why require first the making of a needless assignment of nothing in a State court?

The creditors of many dishonest debtors have sued them for their debts, litigated with each other for preferences, and paid the costs and expenses. Sometimes they have recovered some part of their claims, sometimes they have lost everything in addition to their costs and expenses, and frequently debtors have escaped with the goods and money.

It is proposed by this bill that such creditors shall lose the residue of their claims against their debtors unless they go to the further expense of, first, contending with the personal representative (the assignee) of the debtor in a State court; and, second, defending in a Federal court an application for a discharge, which must be granted even to dishonest applicants, unless it happens that their assignment was made within three months before the passage of the bill.

Debtors and creditors have always found that diverse laws and complicated proceedings aid rascals, cause needless and exorbitant costs, and hamper and disgust honest men.

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we were familiar with past legislation upon this subject? We think not.

The complete bill will be found, when it shall have been read to or by the members, to contain plain and simple provisions by which every deserving bankrupt may, in an inexpensive way, secure a discharge. It will be found to contain also safeguards to prevent rascals extorting from a court of justice a certificate of discharge, which will constitute a fraud against small and large creditors. We therefore recommend it as a substitute.

NO LIMITATION OF TIME AS TO APPLICATIONS FOR DISCHARGES.

Section 4 of the Bailey bill provides:

"That any such debtor, after the expiration of four months from the date of the execution of the deed of assignment, * * * may file his petition in the district court of the United States for the district in which he resides * * * asking for a discharge from said debts."

The fraudulent debtor—an individual or corporation—who ought not to be discharged by any law enacted by honest men for honest people, may, under this bill, file his or its application at any time while the law is in force subsequent to the expiration of four months. Thus he or it may abide his or its time and then proceed with perjured testimony to exact from a court of justice, in the absence of the dead and indifferent creditors, a certificate which will constitute a fraud upon his or its creditors and enable him or it thereafter to enjoy the same benefits as those bankrupts who have become such through no fault of their own and who have been given a discharge upon the merits of their cases.

It is not required that the application shall be made in the United States district court having the same territorial jurisdiction, or partly so, as the court in which the assignment was made; the provision simply is that it shall be made "in the district court of the United States in which he resides."

If, for example, the assignment was made in Mr. BAILEY'S district and the conduct of the debtor has been so reprehensible as to prevent the probability of his securing a discharge in the United States court of that district, he may move to California or to any other district within the country and there again apply for a discharge. If the discharge should not be granted, the petition will be dismissed and will, of course, not constitute any bar to a removal to Maine or some other district and the renewal of the petition, until in the end a certificate of discharge shall have been exacted from a court of justice.

The bill we advocate provides that the application shall not be made within two months after the adjudication, that it may be made to the court in which the proceedings are pending within the next four months, or, if it can not be made within that time, the judge may permit it to be made within the next six months; but it shall not be made thereafter. The purpose of this provision is to have the matter disposed of within a reasonable time, to the end that all parties in interest shall have an opportunity to be heard and that justice may be done.

The discharge of honest insolvents who have failed, through no avoidable fault of their own, is justified by a wise public policy. They can not, while resting under the burden of their debts, either pay them, discharge their full obligations to their dependents, or fulfill the greatest possibilities as citizens in the communities in which they live. It was intended by the founders of the Government that these men should be discharged. We are ready to make good such intention by the passage of a law pursuant to which they may be discharged under such careful restrictions as will prevent bad men slipping through at the same time; we therefore urge the passage of the complete bill.

A DISCHARGE MAY BE IMPROPERLY GRANTED OR WITHHELD.

Section 5 of the Bailey bill provides, among a lot of other things, that—

"Upon hearing of the petition, if it shall appear that the debtor did make an assignment as authorized by this act." * * *

There is no limitation as to the number of assignments which he may have made. If, therefore, the first assignment does not conform to the provisions of the bill, it seems to us that he may subsequently, at his convenience and under circumstances which are thought to be entirely compatible with his interest, proceed to make another assignment and then force through his discharge.

There are certain limitations as to acts which might prevent the granting of a discharge if consummated "within three months before the passage of this act," but there is no limitation or inhibition against the same class of fraudulent acts if they shall have been committed prior to such three months or if they shall be committed after the act has gone into effect.

It is provided by section 5, among other things which a petitioner must show upon a hearing for his discharge, as follows:

"That no attachment has been levied upon the property of such debtor within three months before the passage of this bill: Provided, however, That if, within four months after the levy of an attachment, the debtor shall execute an assignment or tresson and file a petition for discharge as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment, and such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act."

We do not comprehend why the simple fact of an attachment having been levied against a debtor "within three months before the passage of this bill" should, of itself, bar him from the right of receiving a discharge; the language is that the attachment has been "levied." Many innocent men have their property wrongfully levied upon, and in the end the attachment is quashed. Why should the men who have been thus unfortunately attached, within three months before the passage of this bill, have any different rights from the same class of men who may happen to have been attached either before or subsequent to that period? The making of an assignment and applying for a discharge will not enable such a debtor to receive a discharge. The reason that it will not do so is that "the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition" will not "vacate the levy of such attachment." The time never will come, therefore, when "such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act."

This bill proposes to divide all time into three periods: First, the three months before its passage; second, the infinity of time before such three months; and third, the two years during which it is to be in force. It provides that the rights of those who may apply for a discharge shall be determined, not with reference strictly and only to whether such acts as they have committed were right or wrong, but especially with reference to whether they were committed within a particular one of these three periods. We do not know any reason why any such distinction as this should be made. The bill we advocate does not make any such distinction.

The method proposed of making proof under an application of a bankrupt for a discharge is an unheard of departure from the ordinary proceedings in courts of justice in this, that it not only requires the applicant to prove that he has done certain things, but that he has not done others, i. e., he must prove himself innocent. A bankruptcy bill should provide, in our judgment, with reference to a discharge so far as the applicant is concerned, that he has become a bankrupt by a decree of court, that he has filed his application within the time limited by the act, and conclude with a prayer for his discharge. It should then be the right of those who are in interest to oppose the discharge to show, as an affirmative proposition, that he has done any one or more of the acts the doing of which, according to the terms of the bill, would prevent his receiving that great privilege. Such are the provisions of the bill we advocate as a substitute for this one.

CERTAIN DEBTORS OUGHT NOT TO BE, BUT WILL BE, DISCHARGED.

The fifth section of the Bailey bill provides that a discharge shall be granted if, upon a hearing of the petition, it shall appear as follows:

"That the debtor did make an assignment as authorized by this act * * * and that within three months before the passage of this act no creditor of such debtor had been preferred in any manner except as authorized by this act, and during said time no other act was done or suffered to be done by such debtor respecting his business or estate to prevent an equal distribution of his estate among his creditors, or to give one creditor an advantage over another, or to defraud his creditors, and that no attachment has been levied. * * * Provided, That no person shall be discharged from any debt or obligation which shall have been created * * * in any other fiduciary capacity."

Persons will not be discharged as to debts which may have been incurred in a fiduciary capacity, but there is no limitation as to the discharge of corporations: they may deliberately prepare for and make an assignment in certain parts of the country, except within three months before the passage of this bill, and afterwards secure their discharge without let or hindrance. Do the members of this committee, not joining herein, wish to maintain that position in the House?

There are now in the country large numbers of trust companies which become executors and administrators of the estates of the dead, guardians of the estates of children, and trustees of sacred funds of all sorts, and otherwise act in fiduciary capacities; there is no prohibition in this bill against their securing a discharge from debts created by their embezzling such funds; it prohibits a person from securing a discharge under exactly the same conditions. Why this distinction between corporations and persons?

There is now a national law for the government of national banks, which is more rigid and under which they can be better managed than under any bankruptcy law. Do the members of this committee, who join in recommending the Bailey bill to the House, wish to be understood as desiring to have national banks secure discharges in bankruptcy and go on in business?

All debtors, except such as shall have made an assignment within three months before the passage of the bill, are to be discharged; not simply the honest debtors who have surrendered their property over and above their exemptions, but also the fraudulent debtors of every degree of villainy and degradation; the insolvent railroads, the bursted banks, the rotten insurance companies, and everybody else—all are to be discharged; not only those who can not pay, but those who can but will not pay, are to have their debts, in effect, paid by the judgment of a court of equity! There is an exception to the above statement. It is that persons who become indebted as the result of misappropriating money or property in a fiduciary capacity can not be discharged; but this prohibition does not apply to corporations—they may plunder estates in their charge, rob children of whose estates they are curators, and embezzle funds received as trustees, and still be discharged under the incomplete bill.

The fact that honest men want a good law established throughout the United States which shall grant relief to honest insolvent debtors and protect honest creditors in their rights is made a pretext for considering a bill under which all debtors, except those making an assignment within a particular three months, may be discharged and the rascals who profit by fraud may go unwhipped of justice. Why encourage fraud and dishonesty by the passage of this bill, when by the passage of a complete law we can diminish it?

It may be all right, in the estimation of some persons, for parties residing in obscure places to secure discharges from their debts, due to people who are supposed to be rich; we do not believe that the honest people of any part of the country want such an opportunity. How will it be to have live stock and agricultural products sent to market, and have those who are intrusted with their sale secure the proceeds and then make an assignment, and subsequently secure a discharge as provided by this bill? Will the gentlemen who advocate this bill undertake to maintain that it would be right to pass a measure under which such wrongs, or kindred ones, might be perpetrated?

We are in favor of the discharge of voluntary and involuntary bankrupts under such careful restrictions as will prevent dishonest men taking advantage of the law.

Would the passage of the Bailey bill indicate an earnest endeavor on our part to protect the weak and the honest against the strong and the dishonest and enforce the rule of "Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you"? We think not.

The enactment of a voluntary law will subject the people to the greatest dangers incident to such legislation and secure for them only the minimum of good; the enactment of a voluntary and involuntary law would subject them only to the minimum of danger and secure for them the maximum of good. We are, therefore, in favor of defeating the incomplete and passing the complete bill.

JURISDICTION TO BE EXERCISED BY BOTH STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS.

The Federal Constitution not only reserved to Congress the power to establish "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," but prohibited the States from impairing the obligations of contracts. The result is that Congress can, and the States can not, enact a comprehensive bankruptcy law.

The Constitution did not give the right to Congress to require the State courts to enforce its laws, but it did provide for Federal courts, and gave Congress the power to so perfect them as to make ample provisions for the administration of the Federal laws. We could not, if we could, compel the State courts to administer our laws; we ought not to do so if we could. It is the right of the people to have a wise and complete law enacted upon the subject of bankruptcy. It is their right to have it enforced in the courts upon which we can confer jurisdiction and from which appeals will lie to the Supreme Court, to the end that a uniformity of construction and practice may be secured. It would not be right, even if it were possible, as it is not, for us to require the States to pay judges and maintain courts to enforce national laws.

Why require an assignment in a State court as a condition precedent to applying for a discharge in a United States court when the prospective bankrupt has no property to assign?

Why require parties in interest to pay the expenses of proceedings in two courts when by a complete law we can provide for the costs of only one of them?

Congress has been legislating ever since it was first organized, but has never yet passed a law making it necessary for a United States citizen, in order to secure his constitutional rights under a United States law in a United States court, to first begin proceedings under a State law; we do not believe Congress will make any such departure by passing this bill.

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we know that the State governments are different from the Federal Government, and why it is so? That each has its own trial courts to administer its own laws and pays the expenses of maintaining them, and why it is so? That each has a single appellate court to correct the errors of such trial courts, and why it is so? We think not.

We advocate two things: First, the passage of a law contemplated by the Constitution and founded upon precedent rather than one which will constitute an experiment—possibly a disastrous one; and second, the postponement of the Bailey bill until its friends submit a constitutional amendment and secure its passage and ratification, if they can, giving a joint jurisdiction to State and Federal courts of laws passed by Congress, so that there will be no question as to our power to pass this kind of a State-National law.

Can it be said that this proposed law will tend to "promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty," for which the Constitution was ordained and established? If not, let us pass one which will do so.

A CONFLICT BETWEEN STATE AND FEDERAL LAWS AND LAWS OF DIFFERENT STATES.

The second section of the Bailey bill provides as follows:

"Such assignment shall be made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides. * * * The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the debtor resides, subject to the provisions of this act."

Suppose that the laws of the State where the debtor resides and the proposed law shall be in conflict; which will prevail? It is really of no importance to the debtor which will prevail, since the conflict will defeat the objects of the bill; i. e., such conflicts will, without his fault, prevent his securing a discharge.

Suppose that a debtor has property in several States—which is true of a large percentage of all of the debtors in the country—how can the assignments in the different States all be in accord with the laws of the States where he resides, in view of the fact that the laws of all of the States and Territories are diverse?

The report on the bill of Mr. BAILEY, in referring to the administration of estates under present State insolvency laws, says:

"The fraudulent practices so injurious and demoralizing in their effect upon all communities will, in a measure, cease, and many traders whose transactions are now a false pretense will resume their business in an open and honorable way."

There can not be any good reason, so far as we can see, for compelling debtors and creditors to continue to seek, as at present, their rights under such State laws as are here described.

We think it a mighty poor compliment to Congress to suggest that it can not pass a wise and comprehensive law, under which the rights of both debtors and creditors will be secure.

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we had ever read the Federal Constitution? We think not.

If we were to join the author of this bill in formulating a new government we might consider the advisability of giving a joint jurisdiction over this subject to State and Federal courts; we might also try to overcome the possibility of each one of such courts deciding a different way and thereby bringing about a serious conflict between the States and the Federal Government, to be fought out at the expense of the unfortunate bankrupts who might try to exercise their constitutional rights under it. But since the State and Federal Governments have been organized on the basis of each being separate, and each having courts to interpret and enforce its laws, we feel constrained to accept the situation as we find it and advocate a law to be administered in the Federal courts in a plain, simple, and economical way.

There never has been such a law enacted as is here proposed in this or any other country. Why should we make such a departure now, when we can instead enact a plain law which will be administered in the courts which administer our other laws, and thus avoid a possibility of unfortunate conflicts between the State and Federal courts and between the courts of the several States?

When the bill we submit shall have been read it will be found that it can be promptly enforced for the impartial benefit of all parties who attempt to conduct transactions on credit but meet with misfortune.

NEEDLESS AND ENORMOUS COSTS.

Section 5 of the Bailey bill provides:

"That the creditors of the debtor shall be made parties defendant, and shall have thirty days' notice of the filing of the same, notice to be given as in suits in the courts of the United States, and shall have thirty days thereafter in which to answer said petition."

The cost of securing service on the creditors, which an ordinary debtor has, as above provided, would be enormous; it is very doubtful if the insolvent with many creditors could raise the money with which to pay them. In the case of a debtor not owing a very large amount in the aggregate, but owing small sums to a large number of creditors, the costs of securing service on the creditors might amount to more than the indebtedness. Clearly this bill will not be available for a vast army of painstaking, economical, and worthy men, who have become debtors in a small way; it can be of service only to those who have operated on a scale of magnificent proportions. Under the bill we advocate the creditors would be notified at a trifling expense.

If the petition should be dismissed the costs of course would fall upon the petitioner; if the prayer of the petition is granted in the proceedings in which they shall have been "made parties defendant," and of which they have been given "thirty days' notice," and in which they shall have thirty days "in which to answer said petition," would they not be mulcted in the costs?

Why should we require the payment of the costs of two courts by a poor debtor whom we are professedly trying to assist in a financial way, when the costs of one would suffice? The costs of the assignment might be paid out of the estate, if there was one, but if not, the debtor would have to pay them. As the debtor is required to first make an assignment of all of his unexempt property before he can apply for a discharge, it follows that, if he has done so in good faith, he will have only his exempt property with which to meet this outlay, which, if his creditors are numerous, will be enormous.

There is a very large class of honest men now in the country to whom the benefits of a bankruptcy law should be immediately available; they have no property either exempt or unexempt; they could not pay the enormous costs provided by this bill, and hence it would not be of any benefit to them. If a debtor shall file an affidavit with his petition, under the law we advocate, that he is without money and can not raise a sufficient sum to pay the costs in his case, he will be permitted to receive all of its benefits without the payment of any sum.

The chief purpose of all laws is to prevent the strong imposing on the weak; to keep the dishonest from robbing the honest; and to enforce the Golden Rule in the affairs of life. We do not want a bankruptcy law which we may enact to be an exception to the rule. It, therefore, must be a measure which can be cheaply administered so as to be available to all classes.

The complete bill requires strict economy on the part of all officers and others who assist in its administration. It will not apply to the affairs of honest, solvent people, but to the affairs of approximately 1 in 100 each year of those who do business or conduct enterprises, in whole or in part, on credit, i. e., 1 in 100 is about the percentage of those who fail in the course of a year. It is not in any sense a law which will serve as a guide for commencing or conducting business or enterprises, or as a guide in the affairs of everyday life, but is only for the compromise or settlement of the affairs of the unfortunate, or the administration of the estates of dishonest persons, and of unfortunates where a compromise can not be effected.

The bill we advocate will protect the debtor from the avarice of a "shylock" creditor; it will give him an opportunity to secure a fair compromise, notwithstanding it might be opposed by a minority of creditors who are moved by malice or greed, and who, under present laws, may pursue him to the final sale under the sheriff's red flag; it will secure him his State exemptions, and will, if he is honest, give him a discharge. It will protect the creditor from the fraud of the debtor; it will secure him a pro rata share with other creditors of the same class of the debtor's estate promptly and at small cost.

In brief, in the event bankruptcy intervenes at any time from the inception of the transaction by which one party voluntarily becomes a debtor and the other a voluntary creditor, and during the entire time until the debt is satisfied, the rights of both of the parties will be more perfectly preserved and be more readily and cheaply enforced than under the Bailey bill or pursuant to the present State insolvency laws.

Ought we not to pass the bill which will in the best sense and at the smallest cost serve the interests of the whole people?

IT OUGHT NOT BE LIMITED TO TWO YEARS.

Section 6 of the Bailey bill provides that the—

"Act shall continue in force two years and no longer." * * *

Debtors have failed from day to day since the repeal of the last bankruptcy law, but have been unable to secure a discharge. This bill proposes to accommodate some of them, but as soon as two years shall have expired, proposes that thereafter none of those who fail shall be entitled to a like benefit under the law.

We do not see any reason why a distinction should be made between the rights of the debtor who has failed, or who shall fail prior to the expiration of the proposed law, and the one who shall fail after it has ceased to be in force.

The provision of the Constitution is not that we shall enact for a short time a law for the benefit of those who may happen to be unfortunate during such period, but it is "to establish" such a law "throughout the United States."

We maintain that it is the right of every citizen to have the benefit of such a law, and that it ought to be permanently upon the statute books and at all times available to both honest debtors and honest creditors. Such are the provisions of the bill we advocate.

This bill should remain permanently upon the statute books, if it is the embodiment of what was contemplated by the Constitution; if it is not such a law, it ought not to be passed.

Why not make a bankruptcy law as permanent as any other law? What would be thought of us as legislators if we provided only at intervals for the exercise of the other constitutional rights of the people?

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we know that to "establish" the Federal Constitution meant that we were to enjoy the rights secured by it for all time and not for a short period from time to time; or that we know that the word "establish," as used in the preamble, is the same word "establish" which is used in conferring on Congress the power which it is here sought to exercise only for two years? We think not.

Honest men do not fail in classes or only at given periods, nor are they proceeded against by their creditors only in certain years, but from day to day, year in and year out. Rascals do not commit frauds to order, but have done so every night for past ages, and will continue to do so during the ages to come.

We ought, therefore, without further delay, first, to read and then patiently, wisely, and without prejudice to consider the subject, pass the complete bill, and trust to our successors to amend it from time to time, if occasion shall require, so that honest debtors and honest creditors shall at all times find relief and protection under it.

VOLUNTARY AND INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY.

The terms voluntary and involuntary, as used in bankruptcy legislation, apply, or at least ought to apply, solely to the proceedings prior to the rendition of the judgment by which the debtor is declared a bankrupt, i. e., a voluntary bankrupt is one who has filed his own petition, and an involuntary bankrupt is one against whom a petition has been filed by his creditors; after the judgment is rendered the rights and duties of the bankrupt or his creditors do not and should not differ in any respect.

Debtors who may be adjudged bankrupts should be considered under four headings, as follows: First, insolvent honest voluntary bankrupts; second, fraudulent voluntary bankrupts; third, insolvent honest involuntary bankrupts; and, fourth, fraudulent involuntary bankrupts.

The first class embraces honest insolvents who have petitioned voluntarily for the benefits of the law. There is no disagreement, either in the committee or the House, among the members who are willing to exercise the powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, as to the wisdom of providing, without further delay, for the members of this class.

Those who may be placed in the second class, i. e., fraudulent voluntary bankrupts, are those who have obtained or retained property fraudulently, placed it beyond the reach of their creditors, and voluntarily petitioned for the benefits of the law. The only object which a member of this class would have in going into bankruptcy would be to get a discharge and be thereby better enabled to enjoy his ill-gotten gains. We do not believe that there is a disposition on the part of the members of this committee to favor this class of men, and yet we know that they, in large numbers at least, could obtain undeserved discharges under the Bailey bill.

The third class, i. e., insolvent honest involuntary bankrupts, is composed of persons who have become insolvent, are unable to pay their debts or protect their property from being inequitably distributed among their creditors, and have therefore, pursuant to proceedings by their creditors, had their property, over and above their State exemptions, turned over to a trustee to be ratably distributed; they will be entitled to a discharge. There is a disagreement among the members of the committee as to this class.

Our opponents say, in effect, that no relief under the provisions of involuntary bankruptcy should be granted to debtors so situated or to their creditors; that a debtor should be left at the mercy of his individual creditors without an opportunity to deal with them as a class; that it is right and desirable that his estate should be taken by those who seize it first, or be kept by those to whom the debtor may deliver it, and that creditors who have extended credit to a common debtor on equal terms shall not necessarily share in his estate on equal terms or grant him favors on the same basis, but that those who first bring a suit against him shall be paid in full and those who are most considerate to him shall get nothing.

We contend that a debtor who is insolvent and can not pay his debts or protect his estate from an unequal division should have the protection of the complete bill, which will permit him to retain his exemptions, procure a discharge, and enable each of his creditors of the same class to receive their pro rata of his estate. Our opponents say that the possibility of there being such a class will give the cruel creditor an undue advantage over the honest debtor. We show that such is not the case; that the cruel creditor may now pursue, in the ordinary course, his debtor to a final sacrifice sale under the scarlet emblem of the executioner; that such a pursuit may not only be to the financial disadvantage of the debtor but of the other creditors as well. We also show that under the bill we advocate the bankrupt will not be at the mercy of the individual creditor, as at present; that the favors which the bankrupt may receive in the form of an extension of time or a reduction of his indebtedness, or both, will be from his creditors as a class and by the decree of a court of equity; that these favors will not be extended or withheld according to the whim of the creditors, and as a charity, as at present, but will be available for the benefit of the debtor and his creditors alike, and may be enforced as provided by the Constitution.

The fact that debtors may have the protection as above will make men more willing than at present to conduct and extend business, conceive enterprises, and borrow money to promote them, thereby becoming debtors. The fact that creditors will thus be put upon an equal footing with other creditors of the same class will make them more willing to sell property for which they have or have not paid, and to loan money which they have accumulated or borrowed.

It follows, therefore, that the omission of this class, i. e., insolvent honest involuntary bankrupts, would render the system of bankruptcy legislation incomplete and injure debtors and creditors by omitting these provisions for their protection.

There ought not to be, as it seems to us, but there are, differences of opinion among the members about the fourth class, i. e., fraudulent involuntary bankrupts. Their property should be distributed to the extent of the payment of their debts; they should be refused a discharge and punished for their wrongdoing. This should be done not only because deserved in the individual case, but as an example to deter those who are morally weak from essaying the same role.

The Bailey bill does not make any provision for the protection of the people from the machinations of fraudulent involuntary bankrupts; they will be protected under the bill we advocate. This omission from the Bailey bill should be a sufficient reason, even if there were not numerous others, why the complete bill should be substituted for it.

Those who say that there is a demand for any law which is short of a complete and just one have never felt the pulses of the sturdy men whose predecessors framed the Constitution, and whose brains conceive, integrity plumbs, and industry carries on, from day to day, the industrial and commercial transactions of the country.

THE LAW OF THE "POOR ENGLISH GENTLEMEN."

In England in very early times there was no such thing as a voluntary bankruptcy law, but all laws upon that subject were involuntary and applied only to traders. Later there was a voluntary scheme for "poor English gentlemen," and under it they might avoid imprisonment for debt; but if guilty of fraud they were subject to onerous punishments.

A purely voluntary system of bankruptcy, applicable to all classes, has never been in force in this or any other country.

In the evolution of thought upon this subject it was discovered that voluntary bankruptcy might be extended to debtors who were traders, since, if they became insolvent and could not protect their property from an equitable division, or were guilty of fraud, the rights of their creditors could be protected under the provisions of the law of involuntary bankruptcy. As a result the voluntary feature was added to the involuntary law in Great Britain by 6 George IV, chapter 18, and since then the two systems have been one. Prior to 1861 the involuntary system applied only to traders. In that year the complete system, i. e., voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, was extended in England so as to apply, and still applies, alike to all classes.

It does not seem possible that the House of Representatives of the United States wants to go back to the abandoned law of the "poor English gentlemen" as a precedent for legislative action.

The part of a bankruptcy law most difficult to draft is its voluntary provisions; they must not only provide relief for the honest bankrupt, but they must refuse relief or encouragement to the dishonest bankrupt. It would be quite easy to write a bill saying that the court should grant applications for discharges; the passage of such a law would result in good, honest poor men getting discharges, and in so far it would be a good law, but it would also enable a lot of rascals to escape the payment of just debts, and in that respect it would be a bad law. The fact that all debtors might get a discharge, without the possibility of the interference of their creditors, would curtail credits and do untold harm to all of the members of that great class who conduct their various transactions on credit, and in that respect also would be a bad law. All of the scandals under the old law grew out of proceedings under its provisions for voluntary bankruptcy.

The only ways yet discovered to keep the frauds under a voluntary law down to the minimum are to make it possible for parties in interest to interfere, by commencing involuntary proceedings, before the fraudulent plans have been consummated and the property secreted or wasted, to provide adequate punishment for fraudulent acts, and to refuse a discharge to dishonest bankrupts.

The measure in question is an imperfect voluntary bill. It is not provided with effective safeguards for the protection of the rights of honest debtors or honest creditors, but is calculated to encourage every wrong which is known to rascals.

We think that a bankruptcy law ought to apply to all classes of our citizens, as well as be uniform throughout the country.

The "poor English gentleman" law answered a purpose in its time, but it is not adapted to a country where there is no imprisonment for debt; it does not meet the needs of the majority of American citizens, who are all rich—not always in money, but always in integrity, in energy, and in opportunities to promote their own happiness. We of the United States want a fair and complete law, which shall be comprehensive of the subject and under which the rights of all classes will be secure.

ALL DEBTORS ARE NOT POOR NOR ALL CREDITORS RICH.

It seems to us that the most tenable theory upon which a purely voluntary law may be advocated in opposition to a complete law is that all debtors are poor and hence ought to be favored, and all creditors are rich and for that reason ought not to be protected by bankruptcy legislation. It goes without saying that this theory is not true. Most men engaging in either small or large transactions occupy the dual position of both debtor and creditor. One of the largest classes of creditors in the country is the day laborers. The largest class of debtors in the country is the railroads. They owe more than six times the amount of the national debt. The next largest class is the banks.

Let us consider some of the conditions to which it is proposed by our opponents to apply a voluntary law, and to which we propose to apply both the voluntary and involuntary or complete law. Suppose we take cotton and trace it from the raw material on the plantation until it returns as a cloth to be used by the planter, and for the purpose of illustration, say that it is handled on the entire circuit on credit and at the same price. When the cotton is sold to the factor, the planter thereby becomes a creditor and the factor becomes a debtor. The manufacturer buys it and becomes a debtor and transforms the factor into a creditor. The manufacturer makes it into cloth and then sells it to the wholesaler; he in turn changes from a debtor to a creditor, and the wholesaler becomes the debtor. The wholesaler becomes a creditor by selling it to the retailer, who thereby becomes a debtor. The planter when he buys the cloth becomes a debtor and the retailer a creditor. Each person named has in turn been a voluntary debtor and a voluntary creditor. The debit and credit side of every transaction has been exactly equal and the totals are of course equal.

Why should the planter, the factor, the manufacturer, the wholesaler, and the retailer, who have all in turn become voluntary debtors, have any advantages as such debtors, pursuant to national legislation, without at the same time having reciprocal advantages as voluntary creditors with reference to the same transactions and property? Every article of raw material the product of which is used by the producer may be traced in like manner. The example holds good and the reasoning is unanswerable, irrespective of whether the contracts of exchange from the producer through middlemen to the consumer relate to the same article in its different stages or to different articles which may be voluntarily exchanged for the convenience or profit of the people.

Roughly speaking, the planter and farmer must pay for the products of the mills and looms with the products of the fields; the laborer must pay for the comforts of life with the products of labor; the business man must pay his expenses with the profits on his merchandise; and the man of wealth must pay for his luxuries with the income from his fortune. The same is true of everyone of every class, i. e., everyone must pay for everything bought with something produced or acquired. Why, therefore, should anyone who buys or sells on credit be favored by national legislation to the detriment of the other party to the same transaction?

It therefore follows that there is no reasonable theory upon which a bankruptcy law should be passed in the interest of any one class. Such a law, like all other laws, ought to be in the best interests of the whole people. Any class law ought not to be passed.

THE BAILEY BILL WOULD DESTROY CREDIT.

Business and commerce have suffered a paralytic stroke; agriculture and the industries have been seized with the palsy. Even if they shall now recover they will be liable to a recurrence under the present diverse State laws. The votaries of each need a restoration of confidence between themselves, and between them and the possessors of accumulated wealth, to enable them to secure credit and money with which to pursue their callings for securing profit and enjoying happiness. Can this result be accomplished by the passage of a law such as the Bailey bill, under which the poor debtor and the rich debtor may alike secure a discharge, except that individuals can not secure a discharge from fiduciary debts, irrespective of whether they are honest or dishonest, if they make an assignment more than three months before the passage of this bill, or after its passage and before it expires by limitation? We say no. We do say that such confidence can be restored and such results achieved under the bill we advocate, since under it the rights of both debtors and creditors will be more secure than under the present State laws.

The principle of the voluntary bill has been condemned by the people and the press; not only the principle of voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, but the terms of the bill we advocate have been approved throughout the length and breadth of the country by all classes of honest people.

The fact that wrongs may be perpetrated in the industrial and commercial world makes it necessary to erect and maintain expensive safeguards; just in proportion as the laws are complete and wise these expensive safeguards are not necessary; just in proportion as the laws are imperfect and permissive of wrongdoing these safeguards must be fortified. These expenses are not paid by the rascals who occasion them, but by the honest consumers who support the tollers of the industrial and commercial world.

There has occasionally been before the House a bill which, if enacted, would ruin, in a financial sense, a single class of men; but there never has been one before it, to our knowledge, so far-reaching in its destructive qualities as this one, or so well calculated to destroy the credit of all classes, by preventing honest men buying goods and borrowing money, except upon prime security or mortgage. Never before have we had before us such a bill as this one, under which all debtors, except persons who have become such in a fiduciary capacity, might be discharged only to find that they could not buy goods or borrow money, because it would be possible under the law that they might, upon receiving such goods or money, make away with them and again get a discharge, and thereby rob their beneficiaries and bring distrust and bad repute upon all honest debtors.

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we know that the affairs of everyday life, including business and enterprises, can not be extensively and successfully carried on without credit; that credit is founded upon confidence, and that confidence can not exist, in a general sense, except under good and impartial laws? We think not.

Why curtail credit by the passage of this bill when we can, by the enactment of a complete one, extend it?

By reading the bill we recommend it will be seen that it is comprehensive of the best interests of all parties. It will therefore beget confidence in both debtors and creditors, and result in an extension of credit and the increase of the industries and commerce. For these reasons, as well as others, it ought to be passed.

HONEST DEBTORS DO NOT WANT AND THE DISHONEST SHOULD NOT HAVE A PURELY VOLUNTARY LAW.

There are many hundreds of thousands of present helpless, honest, insolvent men in the country who, while pursuing their chosen vocations, have had their property swept away in legal warfare between their creditors. This vast number of men are either out of employment or are serving in menial places at small compensation, unable to make headway against the ever-increasing interest upon their indebtedness or to accumulate property upon which to pay taxes and with the income of which to support their families and educate their children. These men have not been able to secure discharges, because the States can not grant them, since, under the Federal Constitution, States can not impair the obligations of contracts; the State may give them relief from that part of their debts due to creditors of their own State, but not from creditors living in another State. So many of this class of men as become insolvents without fraud ought to be relieved under a wise bankruptcy law.

Honest debtors not engaged in any enterprise or business do not want such a law, because it would destroy or greatly impair credit, and hence after obtaining a discharge under it they would not be able to buy property on credit and borrow money with which to endeavor to repair their fortunes. The enactment of a complete law would enable them to secure a discharge, and would so strengthen credit as to enable them to buy property and borrow money and enter upon and prosecute their chosen callings for their own advancement and in the best interests of the communities in which they live.

The leading characteristic of a bankruptcy law is that it enables a debtor to secure a discharge from his debts—to have his debts paid in effect by the judgment of a court of equity, not a judgment that he has a defense to the claim of his creditor or has paid his debts, but that because of a wise public policy he is excused from paying them. Honest men would, if possible, pay their debts instead of asking for the protection of such a law.

No dishonest man would pay a debt if he could by fraud and perjury get a discharge, and herein lies the one great danger to honest men—the poor and rich alike—of having a bankruptcy law passed. The only excuse for incurring this danger is the great benefit that such a law will be to honest debtors and honest creditors. This danger ought to be reduced to the minimum; it can not be done under a purely voluntary law, not even a plain and simple one; it can only be done by adding to the voluntary law the provisions of the involuntary law, i. e., by putting the debtor and his creditors upon the same basis and giving them reciprocal rights.

It would be bad enough if a voluntary law simply gave to the rich rascal a right to swindle the poor and rich creditors who trusted him, but that is not the half of the wrong done; the success of one rich rascal would beget others; the existence of a class of rich rascals, created and fostered by a national law, would so destroy confidence between men who buy and sell property and borrow and loan money that their transactions would be curtailed, and the price of commodities would be increased to consumers, and the interest on money would be advanced to borrowers.

This class of unfortunates, the members of which arrived at their present state through fraud or dishonesty, ought not to be relieved by a discharge, but ought to continue to be liable financially to their outraged creditors. A purely voluntary law might enable them to secure an unmerited discharge, and hence ought not to be enacted.

It is an axiom in equity jurisprudence that those who invoke the rules of equity must do equity; we might with equal reason establish a rule in bankruptcy legislation that those who would be discharged from their honest obligations must be honest men.

PERSONS WHO ARE BOTH DEBTORS AND CREDITORS DO NOT WANT A PURELY VOLUNTARY LAW.

There are very few men engaged in business, in tilling the fields, in working the mines, in manufacturing, or in any of the other industries or enterprises but who are debtors to a greater or less extent and at the same time are creditors.

As a matter of fact very few of all the transactions had in conducting the entire business and promoting all of the resources of the country are for cash. The greater part of all of them are conducted on credit.

It is of the utmost importance that every one of these men who voluntarily becomes a debtor should have the protection of a law under which it shall not be possible for a single creditor to break him up in business, as is possible under the present laws; that is to say, it is usual for a debtor to have many creditors; they are frequently residents of different States and strangers to each other. Any one of these creditors may hear a rumor, either founded or unfounded, as to the solvency of a common debtor; and if so, he must in financial self-defense, under present conditions, act promptly and in a way to prevent other creditors from obtaining a priority. The result is that great numbers of honest, competent men, who, on a fair showing, are solvent and with a little time could pull through, are needlessly driven into liquidation.

Persons who are both debtors and creditors, in so far as they are creditors, are interested in preventing the commission of fraud and the giving of preferences by their debtors. They are themselves debtors, and as such must pay the amounts which they owe in that capacity, and in order to do so they must be able to collect the amounts which are due them in their capacity as creditors. They must avoid, if possible, suffering a total loss of any of the claims which they have against other debtors. Since only about one in a hundred of those who owe them becomes a bankrupt in the course of a year, they would be practically out of danger if the law we advocate were in force, so that they might be secured against total losses.

The foregoing class of debtors do not want a purely voluntary law, because it would destroy or impair the credit which now enables them to buy property and borrow money, and would hence prove of untold injury to them; a complete voluntary and involuntary law would not harm them in any way, but would help them in every way. The opportunities of this class to enjoy prosperity ought not to be sacrificed because a voluntary law might prove beneficial to dishonest debtors, who would use it to swindle alike their poor and their rich creditors.

Those who are thus always members of both classes do not want, in their capacity as debtors, any rights, without having at the same time, in their capacity as creditors, reciprocal or corresponding rights. The bill we advocate conforms to their wants, and hence should be passed in their best interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DINGLEY having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8110, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed last evening ordering that there be reprinted the usual number of Senate Executive Document No. 51, first session, Fiftieth Congress. I wish now to enter the motion, and will call it up afterwards.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1336) for the relief of John Mellifont and Ellen Rior-don; and

A bill (S. 506) to correct the military record of John Fox, of Albany, Oreg.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 5853) granting a pension to Arminda Stucker, of Gallatin, Mo.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 1336) for the relief of John Mellifont and Ellen Rior-don—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 506) to correct the military record of John Fox, of Albany, Oreg.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PÈRE MARQUETTE STATUE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communications; which were read, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed:

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, D. C., April 29, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a communication of the governor of Wisconsin, at his desire, and to advise you that a similar communication to the President of the Senate was this day laid before the Senate.

Very respectfully,

WM. F. VILAS.

The Hon. THOMAS B. REED,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, Madison, Wis., March 19, 1896.

SIR: It gives me pleasure to inform you, and through you the honorable body over which you preside, that the State of Wisconsin, in response to the invitation extended to the States of the Union under section 1814 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and in accordance with the resolution passed at the first session of Congress in 1893, has placed in old Hall of the House of Representatives, at the Capitol of the United States, a marble statue of Père Marquette. This statue was made in pursuance of an act of the legislature of this State passed at its biennial session in 1887, and is the work of the Italian sculptor, Mr. G. Trentanove, of Florence, Italy.

I have the honor, in behalf of the State of Wisconsin, of presenting this statue to the Congress of the United States.

I am, sir, very respectfully, yours,

W. H. UPHAM,
Governor of Wisconsin.

Hon. THOMAS B. REED,

Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MRS. FLORENCE E. MAYBRICK.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States; which was read, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, in response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, addressed to the Secretary of State, a report of that officer, accompanied by copies of the correspondence in regard to the imprisonment of Mrs. Florence E. Maybrick.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

Washington, April 30, 1896.

CONTESTED ELECTION CASE—RINAKER VS. DOWNING.

At the request of Mr. MOODY, for the Committee on Elections No. 1, a reprint was ordered of the views of the minority in the contested-election case of Rinaker vs. Downing.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of J. L. Cochran, administrator of William Brooks, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of W. P. Mason, administrator of Henry Gorman, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. TRACEWELL (by request): Remonstrance and petition of John C. Warner and 29 other citizens of Jeffersonville, Ind., asking for the removal of the Marquette statue from Statuary Hall—to the Committee on the Library.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 1, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Vice-President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

On motion of Mr. HILL, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will stand approved, without objection.

NIAGARA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. HILL. While we are waiting for Senators to gather, and before taking up the appropriation bill, I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 2936, a bridge bill, reported yesterday from the Committee on Commerce. It is desirable that it shall be passed immediately. It will take but a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 2936) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Niagara River in the town of Lewiston, in the county of Niagara, State of New York; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 8, after the word "thereto," to strike out the words "on the east bank of" and insert "across"; so as to read:

That the Lewiston Connecting Bridge Company, a corporation created by the laws of the State of New York, being chapter 340 of the laws of the year 1896, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge, and the necessary approaches thereto, across the Niagara River at or from some point in the town of Lewiston, in the county of Niagara, State of New York, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 17, after the word "War," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That any bridge constructed under the authority of this act shall be so kept and managed as to offer reasonable and proper means for the passage of vessels and other crafts; and if said bridge be constructed as a drawbridge, the draw shall be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats; and whatever kind of bridge is built, the owners thereof shall maintain thereon, at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights and other signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 5, after the words "New York," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of the law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers or to exempt this bridge from the operations of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the beginning of section 6 the following:

That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same and over the approaches thereto upon payment of reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties: Provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ERIE (PA.) HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of a joint resolution approved April 24, 1896, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, together with a report from Maj. Thomas W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, relative to the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pa.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the Manufacturers' Association of Kings and Queens counties, New York, praying for the adoption of a single gold standard; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Massachusetts Library Club, of Cambridge, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the better publication of the public documents of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PEPPER presented the petition of W. J. McBane and 175 other citizens of Thornton, Ind., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 239, to prohibit the collection of special liquor taxes from persons other than those who are duly authorized by State laws to traffic in intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLEN presented a petition of the faculty of the University of Nebraska, at Lincoln, Nebr., praying for the establishment of a permanent board of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HILL presented resolutions adopted by the assembly of the State of New York, relative to the claim of the Ogden Land Company to the lands of the Seneca and Tuscarora Indians; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN ASSEMBLY, Albany, April 23, 1896.

On motion of Mr. Matteson:

Whereas by resolution of the assembly, dated March 21, a committee was appointed and "charged with the duty of investigating and ascertaining the social, moral, and industrial condition of the several tribes of Indians in the State; with ascertaining the amount of land, cultivated and uncultivated, on their respective reservations; with the investigation of their several tribal organizations and the manner in which they assume to allot their lands among the several members of their tribes; with the investigation of the title to their lands on their several reservations; with the investigation of the claims of the Ogden Land Company to said lands and the claims of any other companies or organizations or individuals; with the investigation of all treaties made with the State of New York and the Indians therein, and of all the treaties made with the United States and said Indians, and with the investigation of such other matters relating to said Indians as will afford valuable aid to the legislature upon which to base future action;" and

Whereas said committee made a very thorough and exhaustive examination of the matters committed to its charge, and submitted its report thereon February 1, 1896, as will more fully appear by reference to assembly document No. 51; and

Whereas said committee for various and cogent reasons set forth in its report recommended:

"1. That the compulsory-attendance school law be enacted.
"2. That the legislature request the General Government to take action to extinguish the claim of the Ogden Company to the lands of the Senecas and that portion of the Tuscaroras covered by it.

"3. That the lands of the several reservations be allotted in severalty among the several members of the tribe, with suitable restrictions as to the alienation to whites and protection from judgments and other debts; but such division not to go into effect as to lands affected by the Ogden Company's claim until the claim be removed. This allotment in severalty ought not to be limited to a division of the possession of the land, but should comprise a radical uprooting of the whole tribal system, giving to each individual absolute ownership of his share of the land in fee.

"4. The repeal of all existing laws relating to the Indians of the State, excepting those prohibiting the sale of liquors to them and intrusion upon their lands, the extension of the laws of the State over them, and their absorption into citizenship;" and

Whereas it is believed that the best interests of the Indians and their future prosperity and welfare demand that the title of the Ogden Land Company, so called, to the lands occupied by them be extinguished and the lands allotted in severalty to said Indians, and that they be made citizens and absorbed in the body politic: Therefore

Be it resolved by the assembly, That the Government of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to extinguish the title of the Ogden Land Company, so called, to the lands occupied by the Indians within this State, so far as such lands are affected by said title, and to then allot the said lands in severalty to the Indians, and confer upon them all the rights, privileges, immunities, and responsibilities of citizenship.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to each of the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, and they are hereby requested to use every effort and endeavor to bring about the extinguishment of the title of said company to the lands in question and the allotment thereof in severalty to the Indians as hereinbefore set forth.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior.

By order of the assembly.

A. E. BAXTER, Clerk.

Mr. HILL presented a petition of Gouverneur Grange, No. 808, Patrons of Husbandry, of Gouverneur, N. Y., praying for the passage of House bill No. 8008, defining cheese and imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of filled cheese; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Monroe County, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter, and also to reduce letter postage to 1 cent per half ounce; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PLATT presented the memorial of Rev. E. A. Kinmouth and 28 other citizens of Ledyard, Conn., remonstrating against the introduction of military training in the public schools of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Winona, Minn., of Polish descent, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnson immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. MORRILL presented the memorial of S. J. Somerville, John N. Gale, and sundry other citizens of St. Johnsbury, Vt., remonstrating against placing the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present the petition of Andrew Wylie, ex-justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and various other citizens of the District, praying that Senate bill 1553, relating to the subject of vivisection, may be enacted into law.

In the same connection I present a memorial, which has been sent to me, of the Medical Association of the District of Columbia, addressed to the American Medical Association, on the same subject. I regret to observe that the officers of the Medical Association of the District of Columbia state that the enactment of that bill into law will prohibit vivisection or animal experimentation in the District of Columbia and effectively close the biological laboratories connected with the Surgeon-General's Department of the United States Army, the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, and the Marine-Hospital Service, and prohibit all illustrative experimentation on living animals in the medical colleges of this District.

I will state that either the officers of the Medical Association of the District of Columbia are entirely ignorant of the provisions of the bill that is now before the Committee on the District of Columbia, which purposes simply to regulate and supervise vivisection in the District, or else they have misstated the provisions of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition and memorial will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a petition of sundry citizens of the Lake View land district, of Oregon, praying that investigation be made into the administration of the land office in that district; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of the St. Louis Reed, Rattan, and Willow Workers' Union, No. 6454, American Federation of Labor, in which the petitioners state that "We, the undersigned officers, by direction of the above-named organization and its members and as a constituent body of the American Federation of Labor, do hereby most respectfully request that the United States Senate pass a law giving to the people of the United States free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation. We are of the opinion that to do so would relieve the present monetary stringency and contribute toward bringing to us a return of national prosperity."

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of the Hoffman Crusade Union of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Kansas City, Mo., praying for the enactment of a law raising the age of consent in the District of Columbia from 16 to 18 years; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Commercial Club of St. Joseph, Mo., praying for national recognition of the transmississippi exposition to be held at Omaha, Nebr., in 1898; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association of St. Louis, Mo., and a petition of Meyer Bros. Drug Company of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation relative to a rebate on alcohol; which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the memorial of the committee for philanthropic labor of the Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends, remonstrating against the passage of the bill for the introduction of military drill into the public schools, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the annual convention of the Missouri Roads Improvement Association, favoring the passage of the bill (H. R. 6452) to establish engineering experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under act of July 2, 1862, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. HARRIS on the 30th ultimo, providing for the payment of certain claims reported favorably by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the Bowman Act, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, reported it with an amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. COCKRELL April 30, 1896, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, the amendment proposing to pay to Charles B. Choteau, survivor of Choteau, Harrison & Valle, of St. Louis, Mo., the sum of $174,045.75, reported it without amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, the amendment providing for the purchase of Analoastan Island, in the Potomac River, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1170) for the relief of Morgan Everts, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself April 27, 1896, intended to be proposed to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, the amendment providing for an extension of highways in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3544) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish not more than four pieces of condemned cannon to the village of New Rochelle, N. Y., reported it without amendment.

Mr. GEAR. I submit the report of the majority of the Committee on Pacific Railroads on the bill (S. 2894) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; and also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864; and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and other acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and to provide for the settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain companies therein mentioned heretofore reported to the Senate. I wish to notify the Senate that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] reserves the right, if he wishes to do so, to make a minority report as to the Union Pacific.

BERING SEA FISHERIES ARBITRATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report a bill to provide for the fulfillment of the stipulations of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain signed at Washington on the 8th day of February, 1896. As this is a matter of urgent importance, I am requested on behalf of the Secretary of State and the executive authorities that immediate action be taken upon the bill, and I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to ask unanimous consent that the bill be put upon its passage. I make that request.

The bill (S. 2997) to provide for the fulfillment of the stipulations of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed at Washington on the 8th day of February, 1896, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, with the approval of the President of the United States, in fulfilling the stipulations of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed at Washington on the 8th day of February, 1896. And the commission constituted by said treaty, when sitting at San Francisco, shall have power to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses by application to the circuit court of the United States for the ninth circuit, which said court is empowered and directed to make all orders and issue all processes necessary and appropriate to that end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. I shall not object if it does not give rise to debate. There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 2998) for the relief of Joel A. King; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 2999) granting a pension to William L. Grigsby, of Belvidere, in the county of Thayer, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3000) granting a pension to Thomas C. Kelsey, of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3001) granting a pension to Alfred Bigelow, of Norfolk, in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 3002) granting a pension to S. H. Pierce; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAKER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3003) for the relief of John S. Friend, of Eldorado, Kans.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3004) granting a pension to Jacob Saladin; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 3005) to protect American producers, manufacturers, and shippers from unjust discrimination in transportation charges in favor of foreign producers, manufacturers, and dealers, and to prohibit preferences to foreign merchandise over American commerce; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. McBRIDE introduced a bill (S. 3006) to provide for the examination and classification of certain lands in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 3008) authorizing the employment of day labor in the construction of certain municipal buildings and works in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3009) to increase the pension of Mrs. Annie Gibson Yates, widow of Capt. George W. Yates, Seventh United States Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 3010) relating to the landing of any new submarine telegraph cable line or system in this country; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COINS A LEGAL TENDER.

Mr. BUTLER. I introduce a bill, and ask that it be read in full for information.

Mr. HALE. How long a bill is it?

Mr. BUTLER. A paragraph.

Mr. HALE. Let it be read.

The bill (S. 3007) making certain foreign and domestic coins full legal tender, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Mexican silver dollar, containing not less than 371 grains of pure silver; the Japanese yen, containing not less than 371 grains of pure silver, and the trade dollar shall be each equal in value to the standard dollar of the United States, and shall each be a full legal tender to any amount for all debts and demands, public or private.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, a word in explanation of the bill before asking its reference.

Under the Constitution of the United States we have frequently passed laws making foreign coins a legal tender. The act of February 9, 1793, over one hundred years ago, made the Spanish milled dollar and certain other foreign coins a legal tender. Since that time we have passed numerous other acts to make foreign coins a legal tender in this country, including the Mexican dollar. For over half a century the bulk of the silver coin in circulation among our people was foreign coins which had been made a full legal tender by acts of Congress. Our people were more prosperous then than they are now. Now we neither coin silver nor do we make foreign coins a legal tender. Our people are in distress on account of the scarcity of those dollars.

This bill, it will be observed, provides for making three coins a legal tender. The first is the Mexican dollar. The Mexican dollar contains 371.17 grains of pure silver, or 419.08 grains of standard silver, and is therefore heavier than our standard silver dollar.

The Japanese yen, the next coin proposed to be made a legal tender, contains 374.40 grains of pure silver, or 416 grains of standard silver, it also being heavier than our standard silver dollar of 412½ grains.

The next coin that it is proposed to make a legal tender is the trade dollar of the United States. The trade dollar, as we all know, contains 420 grains of standard silver of the same fineness (900 parts fine) as our standard silver dollar.

All of these coins are heavier by from 4 to 7½ grains than our standard silver dollar, and therefore there can be no objection on the part of those who hold to the intrinsic-theory fallacy of the goldites to coining these dollars, which contain more pure silver than our standard full legal-tender silver dollar.

Of the trade dollars there are now outstanding, according to a report of the Director of the Mint which I hold in my hand, 27,330,131. There were coined in all 35,965,924 of them. Of this amount 7,689,036 were redeemed under act of March 3, 1887. There have been deposited and purchased as bullion at the mints 944,757, making the total number redeemed and purchased as bullion 8,633,793. Therefore leaving outstanding over 27,000,000 of them, as I have stated above.

I wish to call attention in this connection to an extract from a speech made on this floor by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] day before yesterday, in which he said, in replying to what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said the same day about "50-cent dollars":

The fact is you have a two-dollar dollar now, and that is what is the trouble with this country. The dollar of this country to-day measures twice what it used to measure; it commands twice the products. There are several countries in the world that have free coinage, notably Mexico and Japan, and neither of them has a 50-cent dollar. It is a notorious fact, which no one will deny who is at all acquainted with the conditions (and if anyone doubts my statement he can take the consular reports from Mexico and Japan and find that I make a correct statement), that the purchasing power of the Mexican dollar and the Japanese yen, which is equivalent to a dollar practically, is as great now as it was thirty years ago.

It will be seen that this bill provides for making a legal tender the Mexican dollar and the Japanese yen, which have the same purchasing power now that they had thirty years ago, and both of which are heavier than our standard silver dollar. Continuing, the Senator from Colorado said:

That is true of the Mexican dollar, which circulates all over Asia, in the Straits Settlements, in China, and to some extent, though not much, in India; it will buy as much as it ever bought. The India rupee, equivalent at its face value to about 2 shillings of English money, will buy just as much as it would ever buy. There has been no depreciation, or, in other words, there has been no rise of prices when measured by the three kinds of money that I have mentioned in the countries in which they circulate. The Japanese money, which is the standard there, is about the same as the Mexican dollar, and it buys just as much as it used to buy. When the Japanese pays his workmen he pays them just what he used to pay them in silver. When the Mexican pays his workmen he pays them just what he used to pay them in silver. If he wants to buy material for his manufacture, he pays the same price if it is home raised and home produced. The same may be said of India.

Mr. President, this bill provides for making a legal tender of three coins which are to-day 100-cent dollars. They are 100-cent dollars, and more than that, as measured in the products of the country, and as measured in the muscle, bone, sinew, and blood of humanity. These dollars can only be called 50-cent dollars when measured by the dishonest yardstick of Shylock and the goldites. They are only 50-cent dollars when measured by the blighting, congesting, and paralyzing 200-cent gold dollar. They are only 50-cent dollars when measured by the cruel measure which makes cotton 5 cents a pound and doubles every debt and all taxes, both State and national.

About one month ago, in fact, on April 1, exactly one month ago, I introduced a bill to prohibit gold notes and mortgages in this country; that bill has not yet been reported. If Congress will not pass a bill making these coins a legal tender; if Congress will not pass the bill which I introduced on April 1 to prohibit gold notes and gold mortgages, which discriminate against a part of our own money and make gold dearer and debts harder to pay, then I call the attention of the country to the fact that the States have the right to do this under the Constitution. The States have as much right to prohibit gold mortgages as the States have to regulate interest that shall be paid on a note or a mortgage. It is also clear that the States can make gold and silver coins a legal tender.

I quote from Article I, section 10, subsection 1, of the Constitution of the United States:

No State shall * * * make anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender in payment of debts.

What does that mean? It means that the States can make gold and silver coin a legal tender in payment of debts. If it does not mean that it means nothing. It is clear that the States have the right to make these foreign coins a legal tender. If the Constitution did not mean that, why was this clause put in it? I do not think the framers of our Constitution meant when they framed this section that the States would ever make United States coin a legal tender, for who could have ever supposed that the United States would coin money and then demonetize it? But since the United States has done so, I believe the language of this clause of the Constitution applies legally, by every fair construction, with as much force to the trade dollar as it does to foreign coin; and no man will question that that clause of the Constitution gives to the States the right to make these foreign coins a full legal tender when they contain more silver of the same standard fineness than our standard dollar.

If Congress, which has the delegated power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, will not make its own coin which it has coined a legal tender, if it will not make these foreign coins according to this bill a legal tender which are heavier than our own dollar, then I say the States have that right, and I hope the States of this Union will proceed on this line if Congress will not give them this relief. In my opinion it is unconstitutional for Congress to refuse to coin silver. The States delegated to Congress the great and important function and duty to coin both gold and silver. Congress violates this trust when it refuses to coin silver. But the States did reserve the right to make gold and silver coins a legal tender, and certainly it seems that the hour has come when the States should proceed to exercise this reserved power in the interest of stagnated business and a suffering people.

But the surest way for the people to get relief and restore good government is for them to drive the gold gamblers from power next November.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance. The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BLACKBURN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DANIEL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

THE RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. WHITE. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That 300 extra copies of the views of the minority on House bill 7977 be printed for the use of the Senate.

I will state that the same number was ordered printed with reference to the majority report.

The order was agreed to.

EMPLOYEES ON THE MALTBY ROLL.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay any employees of the Senate now or hereafter borne on the Maltby roll at the salaries now assigned to the places on said roll until otherwise ordered.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator from Maine will indulge me for a moment, I should be glad to have put upon its passage Senate bill 2522, which I called up Tuesday morning, to incorporate the Alaska Transportation and Trading Company. It was read at length; it need not be read again, and its passage will occupy but a moment. It was objected to then, but I believe that now upon examination there is no objection to the bill.

Mr. HALE. I will not object if it does not give rise to debate. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2522) creating a corporation known as the Alaska Transportation and Trading Company, and granting right of way for the construction and operation by that corporation of a turnpike and post road from Taiya Inlet to Lake Bennett, in the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. QUAY. The bill was read at length the other day.

Mr. HALE. If the bill does not give rise to debate I do not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILSON. The bill, it seems, will provoke considerable debate.

Mr. HALE. Then I must object, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. QUAY. I did not hear the remark of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. HALE. He says the bill will give rise to debate.

Mr. QUAY. I did not so understand it. I did not know there was to be any debate upon the bill. Of course, I withdraw the suggestion.

A. T. HENSLEY.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask for the consideration of a bill of only seven lines, which will occasion no debate. It involves but four hundred and some odd dollars.

Mr. HALE. If it gives rise to debate, the Senator will withdraw it?

Mr. BURROWS. I will. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7200) for the relief of A. T. Hensley.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay $432 to A. T. Hensley, late of Lavaca, Tex., in full compensation for dressed flooring and rough boards furnished to the United States in August, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. J. LINTS.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator from Maine who has the appropriation bill in charge if he will permit me to call up the bill (H. R. 145) for the relief of J. J. Lints. It is for the relief of a very old man and it has been pending many years. If it occasions any debate, I will, of course, withdraw it.

Mr. HALE. I will yield to the Senator from Colorado.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to J. J. Lints, of Syracuse, N. Y., $1,289.33, in full for his services as custodian of the public property at Erie, Pa., from the 8th day of April, 1857, to the 10th day of September, 1859, inclusive.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN VALVERDE COUNTY, TEX.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent to call up a little bill to which there will be no objection, I feel sure. If any debate should develop, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HALE. I yield to a matter not giving rise to any debate.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7395) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to reconvey to the former owners a certain tract of land in Valverde County, Tex. The bill has already been passed by the other House, and it was reported here from the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. It has occurred to me that if this property is to be reconveyed, as it is now used for military purposes and was conveyed for that purpose, the conveyance ought to be made subject to the approval of the Secretary of War. Will the Senator from Texas consent to that amendment?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly, sir. I should be glad to have the Senator prepare the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. After the word "authorized," in line 4, I move to insert "subject to the approval of the Secretary of War"; so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America is hereby authorized, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, by proper deed, to reconvey by quitclaim deed all aforesaid land to said aforesaid company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

JOHN STULL.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to call up the bill (S. 1288) for the relief of John Stull? It will take but a minute to pass the bill.

Mr. HALE. I will yield, and after that I shall ask that the appropriation bill be proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to revoke and set aside Special Orders No. 144, paragraph 1, of the War Department, dated April 11, 1864, dismissing from the service John Stull, late captain of Company M, Third Regiment New Jersey Cavalry Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge as of date April 11, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. GUYTON.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1860) for the relief of John M. Guyton, late postmaster at Blacksburg, S. C. If it excites any debate I will withdraw it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay $484.79 to John M. Guyton, former postmaster at Blacksburg, S. C., being the amount deposited by him to cover a deficiency arising in his office in the year 1890, which deposit was made to meet a loss by the embezzlement of a clerk on or about the 30th day of January, 1890, without blame or fault on the part of Guyton.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. E. GILLINGWATERS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 65) for the relief of J. E. Gillingwaters. A similar bill has been favorably reported heretofore and passed by the Senate in a former Congress. The bill was reported favorably at the present session from the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that notwithstanding the records of the proceedings and sentence of the court-martial in the case of Private James E. Gillingwaters, late of Company H, Twelfth Missouri Cavalry Volunteers, the Secretary of War is directed to issue to Gillingwaters an honorable discharge of the date of his release from military control.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 1191) to provide for the disposal of public reservations in vacated town sites or additions to town sites in the Territory of Oklahoma. I will state that I have the consent of the Senator who reported the bill to call up the bill and it has the unanimous report of the Committee on Territories.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to ask what committee reported that bill?

Mr. TURPIE. The Committee on Territories.

Mr. CARTER. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF JACOB R. DAVIS.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. After the Senator from Nebraska has disposed of the bill he desires to call up, I give notice that I must insist upon going on with the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1367) for the relief of the heirs of Jacob R. Davis.

Mr. HALE. Not to give rise to any debate?

Mr. ALLEN. Not to give rise to any debate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $1,500, to be paid to the heirs of Jacob R. Davis, as full compensation for services rendered by him as agent and judge of the Freedman's Bureau at Augusta, in the State of Georgia, from June 1, 1866, to June 1, 1867, inclusive.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 515) granting a pension to William Grose; and

A bill (H. R. 7668) to establish a term of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Roanoke, Va., in the western district of Virginia.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Now let the appropriation bill be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the pending amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment, submitted by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, line 19, before the word "seagoing," it is proposed to strike out "four" and insert "two"; so as to read:

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract two seagoing coast-line battle ships designed to carry the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance upon a displacement of about 11,000 tons, to have the highest practicable speed for vessels of their class, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $3,750,000 each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. PERKINS. Is this the question upon the four or six battle ships?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is upon the four or two.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is to strike out "four" and insert "two," so as to provide for two battle ships.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was called from the Chamber a few moments ago, and asked me to announce a pair with him. If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] has voted?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota has not voted.

Mr. PALMER. I am paired with that Senator and withhold my vote. I should vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], but I will transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], but with the consent of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], who has the pairs on this side in charge, I transfer my pair to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I transfer the general pair I have with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TILLMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I am just informed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], to whom I transferred my pair a moment ago, is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], but as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] is absent and not paired on this vote, I transfer my pair to him.

Mr. BLANCHARD entered the Chamber.

Mr. TILLMAN. I see the Senator from Louisiana has come into the Chamber, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MARTIN. On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. DUBOIS. I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. BLANCHARD. I inquire if the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has voted.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Then I vote "yea."

Mr. CALL. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. I do not know whether it be correct or not, but I am told by the Senator in charge of the bill that the Senator from Vermont would vote "nay" upon this question, if he were present. If that be so, I shall vote "nay."

Mr. DUBOIS. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that he transfer his pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], which will allow each of us to vote.

Mr. CALL. I will make that transfer and vote "nay."

Mr. DUBOIS. I vote "nay."

Mr. GORMAN. I fear that is not exactly accurate. The Senator from Vermont, I think, would vote for the amendment for two battle ships, at least his speech clearly indicated that, and I understood that to be his position from personal statements.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt the Senator from Vermont, from what I have heard, would vote "yea," if present.

Mr. GORMAN. He would vote "yea," and therefore, if this transfer be made, he would lose his vote.

Mr. BERRY. And so also would the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CALL. Then I withdraw my vote, and announce that if the Senator from Vermont were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DUBOIS. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who is necessarily out of the Senate Chamber for a few moments. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea." I withdraw the vote I have already cast.

Mr. BATE. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is temporarily absent, but was in the Chamber a short time ago. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair on political questions with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. This not being a political question, under our arrangement I feel authorized to vote, and therefore, although he has not voted, I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BURROWS (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. BURROWS. Then I am obliged to withdraw my vote and announce my pair with him.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Allen,	George,	Pasco,	Vest,
Baker,	Gorman,	Peffer,	Vilas,
Bate,	Hill,	Pettigrew,	Walthall,
Berry,	Jones, Ark.	Pritchard,	Warren,

NOT VOTING—31.

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Palmer,
Allison,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Proctor,
Brice,	Dubois,	Jones, Nev.	Smith,
Burrows,	Elkins,	Lindsay,	Thurston,
Caffery,	Gordon,	Martin,	Tillman,
Call,	Gray,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Cameron,	Hale,	Morrill,	Wetmore.
Chandler,	Hansbrough,	Murphy,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. If in order, I now move to strike out the entire paragraph authorizing the construction of battle ships.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska offers an amendment, which will be stated:

The SECRETARY. After line 16, on page 50, it is proposed to strike out the paragraph as amended, down to and including the word "and," in line 24, as follows:

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract two seagoing coast-line battle ships, designed to carry the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance upon a displacement of about 11,000 tons, to have the highest practicable speed for vessels of their class, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $3,750,000 each; and.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Nebraska does not wish to strike out the first three lines. He wants simply to strike out all after the word "contract," in line 19, down to and including the word "and," in line 24. The words "that for the purpose of increasing the naval establishment," and so on, the Senator does not wish to strike out, for after that follows the provision for torpedo boats.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Maryland, I think, is correct. I have not the bill before me, and therefore can not indicate the precise words. The purpose of my amendment, however, is to strike out everything which pertains to an appropriation or a contract for the construction of battle ships, and permit the remainder of the paragraph to stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair requests the Senator from Nebraska to reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. ALLEN. I will do so, Mr. President.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator wishes to strike out all after the word "contract," in line 19.

Mr. GORMAN. That is it.

Mr. LODGE. Does the amendment propose to strike out all of that?

Mr. HALE. The Senate has stricken out the provision for four battle ships and left the provision providing for two. Now the Senator from Nebraska proposes to strike those out.

Mr. ALLEN. Let the amendment begin after the word "contract," in line 19, striking out down to and including the word "and," in line 24.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "contract," in line 19, down to and including the word "and," in line 24, as follows:

Two seagoing coast-line battle ships designed to carry the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance upon a displacement of about 11,000 tons, to have the highest practicable speed for vessels of their class, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $3,750,000 each; and.

Mr. HALE. That strikes out the battle ships. I suppose that is the object the Senator from Nebraska has in view.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I hope we may have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to have a yea-and-nay vote upon that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHITE. I desire that the question may be stated.

Mr. HALE. It is simply on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to strike out the provision for the two battle ships.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and vote "nay."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], and withhold my vote.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DUBOIS. I am informed that the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], with whom I am paired, if present, would vote "nay." Therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. WALTHALL. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] upon this question. I ask that this announcement may apply to all the yea-and-nay votes taken during the day.

Mr. BURROWS. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired generally with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. I supposed he would probably be able to return to the Chamber before the result of this vote was announced, but, as I see he is not here, and knowing he would vote differently from the way I do, I withdraw my vote. The Senator from Iowa, if present, would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—13.

Allen,	Jones, Ark.	Pettigrew,	Walthall.
Berry,	Kyle,	Roach,
Chilton,	Pasco,	Vest,
George,	Peffer,	Vilas,

NAYS—44.

Baker,	Davis,	Irby,	Pritchard,
Bacon,	Dubois,	Lodge,	Quay,
Bate,	Faulkner,	McBride,	Sewell,
Blackburn,	Frye,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Blanchard,	Gallinger,	Martin,	Squire,
Burrows,	Gear,	Mills,	Teller,
Cannon,	Gorman,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Turpie,
Carter,	Hale,	Mitchell, Wis.	Warren,
Chandler,	Hansbrough,	Nelson,	White,
Clark,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Wilson,
Daniel,	Hill,	Platt,	Wolcott.

NOT VOTING—32.

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	Jones, Nev.	Pugh,
Allison,	Cullom,	Lindsay,	Shoup,
Brice,	Elkins,	Mantie,	Smith,
Brown,	Gibson,	Morgan,	Stewart,
Butler,	Gordon,	Morrill,	Thurston,
Caffery,	Gray,	Murphy,	Tillman,
Call,	Harris,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Cameron,	Hoar,	Proctor,	Wetmore.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations by striking out all after the word "each," in line 24, page 50, down to and including the word "dollars," in line 4, on page 51, as follows:

And 3 torpedo boats, to have a maximum speed of not less than 30 knots, to cost in all not exceeding $300,000; and not to exceed 10 torpedo boats, to cost in all not exceeding $500,000.

And insert:

Torpedo gunboats and torpedo-boat destroyers with a minimum speed of 30 knots and torpedo boats with a minimum speed of 26 knots, 30 in number, to cost in all, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $4,500,000.

Mr. HALE. It will be utterly impossible to build so many boats for the amount of money indicated in the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, and I suggest that we strike out "thirty" and substitute the word "twenty."

Mr. CHANDLER. I will not object to that modification, but I think that the Senator from Maine is mistaken. The highest boat costing $300,000 and the lowest $75,000, I think you could get the 30 for an average of $150,000 each.

Mr. HALE. You can not get a 32-knot gunboat for less than $350,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear the amendment to the amendment again read. I want to reserve the point of order on it. I do not think it is in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not make the point of order. We have stricken $10,000,000 from the bill this morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. How many millions does the amendment ask for? If it is only four or five millions I may not object. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. If the number of boats is reduced from 30 to 20—

Mr. HALE. I do not think you can get a 32-knot gunboat for less than $350,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. Possibly not. The English estimate includes armament, and this excludes armament. I do not object to the modification suggested by the Senator from Maine. I hope the Senator from Missouri, when the European powers have a thousand of these boats and we have only one, will not make an objection to providing for 20 at least at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator from New Hampshire desires to explain his amendment I will withdraw the point of order for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to accept the modification suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I will be pleased to say a few words about the torpedo boats. Now that two battle ships are supposed to be all that the Senate wants, and probably that amendment will be concurred in by the other House, I think we ought to have more torpedo boats and that we ought to give the right kind. I have given some little attention to this matter in the past six or eight months. It so happens that torpedo boat No. 8 is now being built in the town in which I reside. That is the last contract made by the Government, and I believe it will afford the best torpedo boat yet constructed by the Government.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from Washington spoke of torpedo boat No. 8 being constructed.

Mr. SQUIRE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] says we have but one.

Mr. SQUIRE. I am very glad the Senator from Colorado has raised that question.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New Hampshire meant one in commission.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Others are being built?

Mr. LODGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SQUIRE. There is now in commission only one such boat, the Cushing. She is a torpedo boat having a displacement of 105 tons, a speed of 22.5 miles, with indicated horsepower of 1,720. She was authorized on the 3d day of August, 1886, at a cost of $82,750. The next torpedo boat which was authorized is the Ericsson, of 120 tons displacement, 24 miles speed, and 1,800 indicated horsepower. She was authorized on the 30th of June, 1890.

Since that time there have been authorized torpedo boats Nos. 3, 4, and 5, at a cost of $97,500 each. They were authorized on the 26th of July, 1894. None of the last three has been built. They are being constructed at Baltimore by the Columbia Iron Works. The Ericsson, which I mentioned just prior to speaking of the last three boats, has never yet been put into commission, although it has been many years since she was authorized. There have been some difficulties, I do not know of what character, whether of a mechanical nature or of a financial nature, and it happens to be a fact that up to the present time there is only one torpedo boat in commission, that is the Cushing, and she has been built a great many years.

The last Congress authorized the construction of torpedo boats Nos. 6, 7, and 8. Nos. 6 and 7 are being built by the Herreshoff Company. The contractors have large liberty, I understand. They do not adopt the specifications of the Navy Department. They are allowed to have a free hand in their plans.

The construction of torpedo boats is something of an experiment. It seems that there are but few firms in the world that are able to be successful constructors of this class of vessels. There is the firm known as the Thornycroft firm, in England, which is very famous, and the firm alluded to in the letter quoted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] yesterday, that built the Sokol—Yarrow, of England. The Yarrow firm and the Thornycroft firm are the great firms of England in this line of business. It seems to require a special kind of ability to build vessels of this class, and I am very glad that we have shipbuilders in America who are willing to undertake the construction of these vessels, which are of superior power and speed. Of course their adaptation is peculiar for the purpose. It requires time to develop the ability to build well vessels of this class.

It seems to me that if we are going to engage in the business of building torpedo boats we ought to build the best. I have here a little memorandum which I have prepared from notes given me by officers of the United States Navy, which I will be pleased to state to the Senate.

The number of torpedo boats of and above 115 feet in length, belonging to foreign governments, is as follows:

Great Britain.....	131
France.....	108
Germany.....	116
Italy.....	106
Russia.....	78
Spain.....	36

Of the British boats, 62 are torpedo destroyers, with a speed of from 27 to 30 knots; 1 of the French, a speed of 30 knots; 1 of the Russian, 30 knots. The remainder are boats of from 20 to 26 knots.

Five or six years ago almost all foreign governments built what were termed first-class torpedo boats, varying in size from 125 to 150 feet, and in speed from 22 to 28 knots, but during the past two years they have been abandoning this practice and going to boats of larger size. This is the result of experience gained with the smaller boats. The English contracts provide now for boats of about 300 tons, 200 feet long, and a speed of 30 knots. We read not long ago of a trial of one of these boats which developed a speed of over 31 knots.

It seems to me if we are going to enter upon the business of constructing torpedo boats that we do not want to commence where the other nations have left off. We want to build first-class torpedo boats and build enough of them so as to regard them as an efficient adjunct to our Navy. I am very well satisfied from inquiries made by me at the Navy Department that it will be impossible to build anything like 30 torpedo boats of the proper character for the amount indicated in the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not believe it is possible to build those vessels for the figure named. I do not believe the amendment in the form presented will do any good. If it should pass I believe we would have an instance such as we had a few years ago, which I desire to mention to the Senate. The law provided that a torpedo cruiser or gunboat of 750 tons displacement, with 23 knots speed, should be built for $350,000. That was the act approved June 30, 1890. The bids received were in excess of the appropriation, and the vessel has not yet been let by contract because nobody will build it for the appropriation. Even for a boat with so low a speed as 23 knots, when $350,000 is authorized by law, we have not been able to find anybody, the Navy Department can not find anybody, to undertake the construction at the price named in the law. Therefore I think it useless to undertake to construct 30 torpedo vessels of the best kinds for the sum of $4,500,000. Let us see what these other vessels will cost. The torpedo boats I have referred to—torpedo boats Nos. 3, 4, and 5, I believe—cost $97,500 each. Torpedo boats Nos. 6 and 7, which the Herreshoff firm are to construct, are each to cost $144,000. I have a copy of the contract in my pocket. All latitude is allowed to the Herreshoff Manufacturing Company. This firm is a free lance, and there is no one undertaking to control it. An officer of the Navy—I believe a lieutenant—stays there looking at the work. But the Chief Naval Constructor tells me he does not know anything about what those people are doing; and so does the Chief of Engineers of the Navy. They know very little about it. Here is a copy of the contract [exhibiting].

Now, what is the price in that case? One hundred and forty-four thousand dollars for each of these two boats. But in the case of the Moran Brothers Company, of Seattle, the specifications were prepared by the Navy Department. Torpedo boat No. 8 is to have a displacement of 182 tons, a speed of 26 knots, and indicated horsepower of 3,200. What is the cost? One hundred and sixty thousand dollars. I personally know this firm very well. I took a great interest in their obtaining the contract. I know they have taken the work at a price that will leave them no profit. I am satisfied they will not be able to make much, if anything, on the contract. They took it more for the sake of prestige. The Morans are able, noble men, who are doing great work for the Government. I am proud of them and of their ability to take such work at such a low price. I do not believe it is possible to build a good 26-knot torpedo boat of such a kind as the Navy Department will present the plans and specifications for a less sum than $160,000. Let us see. Suppose every one of the 30 boats that the Senator from New Hampshire mentions in his amendment to the amendment was to cost $160,000. That would be $4,800,000. So you can see readily that it would be impossible to build any of the great torpedo-boat destroyers or torpedo gunboats for any such money; that is, if 30 vessels are to be built for the money. Four million five hundred thousand dollars will scarcely build 30 boats of the 26-knot class. Then how can any of the torpedo-boat destroyers be built unless the total number is decreased? I suggest that the total number be reduced to 20.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington how many torpedo boats are now being constructed?

Mr. SQUIRE. I have gone over the list.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I did not understand it.

Mr. SQUIRE. Very well.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator state the number for my information?

Mr. SQUIRE. The number of torpedo boats now being constructed is eight altogether, including one submarine boat.

Mr. WOLCOTT. So if nothing is appropriated at this time we still have coming into use, now being built in our different yards in the country, eight new torpedo boats. Is that the fact?

Mr. SQUIRE. It is a fact. One of them is a submarine boat, which I believe all naval authorities agree is an experimental vessel.

Mr. GORMAN. The Secretary of the Navy in his report shows that we have two torpedo boats already in commission and seven under construction. In addition to that there is under construction a very remarkable boat, if it succeeds, known as the Holland boat, that will make ten all told.

Mr. SQUIRE. That is the submarine boat to which I referred.

Mr. WOLCOTT. How many are estimated for in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, if the Senator from Maryland remembers?

Mr. GORMAN. I think ten or twelve. I can give the number to the Senator.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Ten new boats in addition to the seven now being constructed?

Mr. GORMAN. That is my recollection. I can give the exact number to the Senator in a moment.

Mr. SQUIRE. I think, if the Senator from Maryland will pardon me, that there is an error in regard to there being more than one torpedo boat in commission.

Mr. GORMAN. There are two.

Mr. SQUIRE. I understand the Ericsson never yet has been in commission.

Mr. GORMAN. On page 26 of the Report of the Secretary of the Navy the Senator will find a statement giving the total number of torpedo boats constructed by all countries, and the Secretary puts down two as completed by the United States and seven under construction.

Mr. SQUIRE. I think the Secretary must have looked forward with expectancy to the early coming into commission of the Ericsson. I do not think she has yet been put into commission. As a matter of fact, I understand from personal conversation with officers of the Navy Department that the Cushing is the only one actually in commission.

The point I wish to make is simply that if we are to enter upon the construction of torpedo boats and torpedo-boat destroyers we ought to have the best. Does anybody doubt that? If we are to have the best, let us appropriate enough money to get the best. If we can not get so many, let us have a less number, but let them be of the best.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Washington, who has given to the Senate his views—with which I agree—will allow me, I will put the number of boats at 20 and propose to appropriate $4,000,000 for that purpose.

Mr. SQUIRE. I hope the Senator will keep the sum $4,500,000, as it is.

Mr. CHANDLER. Two hundred thousand dollars for each boat on the average.

Mr. SQUIRE. I beg to say to the Senator that I have just come from the Bureau of Construction of the Navy Department. I visited the chief of that Bureau and the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, and they tell me that it will be impossible for this class of torpedo-boat destroyers to be built for less than two hundred and fifty to three hundred thousand dollars apiece, and that the torpedo boats, so called in the amendment of the Senator, to have a speed of 26 knots, will probably each cost at least $160,000.

Mr. WOLCOTT. How much does the Senator from Washington figure it altogether?

Mr. SQUIRE. If we build 10 torpedo-boat destroyers at an average of $275,000 each, and 10 26 or 27½ knot torpedo boats at $160,000 each, it comes to a little less than the amount named by the Senator from New Hampshire, $4,500,000. In fact, it comes to exactly $4,350,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will modify the amendment by reducing the number to 20 and the amount to $4,000,000.

Mr. SQUIRE. That is much better; though I would prefer to keep the figure at $4,500,000 as an outside limit. You allow considerable leeway when you fix the outside limit of the cost of battle ships. Why not allow a reasonable margin in the case of the torpedo boats and torpedo-boat destroyers, so that the Department need not be crowded into impracticable or impossible conditions, such as I have referred to as already existing in reference to the torpedo cruiser or gunboat authorized in 1890, for which the Government could not get a bid at the price authorized by law? It is true that a few of the smaller and poorer torpedo boats can be built for less money. Do we want any more of that class? I doubt it. My wish is to have the very best modern vessels of the respective classes.

The character of the English torpedo destroyers is of an exceedingly high class. If we are to have ship destroyers let us have those that are equal to the best English vessels of this class. They are very elaborate in their construction and as delicate in their mechanism as a watch. I have before me a copy of the Naval and Military Record, published in London, April 2, 1896, in which I observe, under the heading of "The Royal Dock-Yards," the prominent headline "Vagaries of the Destroyers," as illustrating the delicate and complicated character of these vessels. I will quote one or two sentences, as follows:

One destroyer is cured of distemper and two more take her place, and so the world wags. At present we have the Daring, Sturgeon, Handy, Surly, and Havock all in hand, each having kicked over the traces in some unaccountable fashion. The Daring was run into at Dover; the Sturgeon carried away her stanchions and behaved in a more or less erratic fashion; the Handy was deceived by her water-gauge, and her boilers suffered in consequence; the Surly, after some ugly defects had been made good, has made several attempts to achieve the prescribed 27 knots, but without avail; the Havock, having had a smashup through the bolt of the crank-head breaking, shipped the star-board engine of the Hornet, but at her basin trial after the refit was not a success, owing to the overheating of the boilers. Officers who have had considerable experience with these vessels tell me that to lay up for one week in seven is not enough, as, if these crafts are to be relied upon for hard steaming and sudden spurts, it is necessary that the machinery should be overhauled and tightened up at least one week in four, otherwise these delicate vessels will be worn out long before their time.

I have quoted this to illustrate the character of the vessel that it is proposed we shall construct if we would emulate the English navy. Such vessels can not be built for a song. I doubt if we can build vessels to compete with the English counterparts for less than $300,000 each, and we have yet to learn the trade of building this class of vessels.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the word "thirty" and insert "twenty," and strike out the words "five hundred"; so as to read:

Torpedo gunboats and torpedo-boat destroyers with a minimum speed of 30 knots, and torpedo boats with a minimum speed of 26 knots, 20 in number, to cost in all, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $4,000,000.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, line 19, after the word "contract," it is proposed to strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three"; so as to read:

Three seagoing coast-line battle ships.

Mr. PERKINS. The amendment will leave the bill as it now stands, merely substituting three battle ships for the two which have been voted for by the Senate. I offer what I have sent to the desk as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from California will wait a moment. That is not a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment of the Senator from California is not in order as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question as to battle ships has been passed upon by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I will speak to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The bill, as proposed to be amended by the committee, provides for 13 torpedo boats, 3 of which are to have a maximum speed of not less than 30 knots per hour. Ten of them are not to cost exceeding $500,000, without any limit as to their maximum or minimum speed. A subsequent clause provides for the building of the Holland submarine torpedo boats, one of which is now under construction in Baltimore.

The question of torpedo boats is one of great importance to any government for its coast defenses. Marked improvements have been made in such boats within the past few years. The world was startled a year or two since by the achievement of a torpedo boat built for the Russian Government, called the Sokol, I think. She attained a speed of 30 knots an hour. Only last year Her Majesty's torpedo boat, the Desperate, attained the marvelous speed of 31 knots per hour, or equal to 36 statute miles. They have been making this wonderful progress in speed and great power which is entirely at the sacrifice of space. The power necessary to propel at such speed a vessel of 300 tons, which I think is the displacement of the Desperate, can not be less than 7,000 horsepower. It seems to me that in this age of improvement the authorization we propose to give for the construction of 13 new torpedo boats is amply sufficient.

If the experiment as to the Holland torpedo boat is a success, it matters not whether the boats go 6 or 8 miles an hour. Nothing can compete with them, for they are submerged and can attack the most formidable battle ship without any possible way for the latter to resist.

Not only is the Holland boat now in process of construction, but I noticed by the press only yesterday that a company has been formed in San Francisco, the president of which is a retired engineer officer of the United States Army, for the purpose of constructing torpedo submarine boats. More than that, scientists tell us that aerial navigation is not improbable, and perhaps when you have built a boat that will go 35 or 36 miles an hour we will have a balloon which will sail over and drop dynamite on board a battle ship, and the submarine boat will not be heard of further. It is the part of wisdom for our Government to profit by the experience of other nations. Let us go on and build the boats we have provided for in the bill, and then at the next session of Congress we can make additional improvements.

I am sorry that the Senate has stricken out four battle ships and substituted two therefor. I yesterday listened to the speech of the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], as I always do, with much interest, and gained some instruction.

That we have not sufficient revenue to-day, perhaps, to build all these battle ships is as much due to a bill for which he is responsible as to any other cause. But the building of these ships can not be done in a day. The building of a great line-of-battle ships means two and a half to three and a half years' labor. The bill provides that after it becomes a law the contract for the construction of these ships can not be let for four months. It will be a year and a half before they are in frame, and it will be three years and a half before they are completed and ready for service.

It seems to me that the wise policy is for us to authorize the building of these ships. We would not send our money to Europe to pay for luxuries, for silks, for wines. We would distribute the money among our own people, giving them employment. Every dollar that goes into the construction of a great battle ship represents labor. The iron ore that comes from the mine, which is run into pig iron, and pig iron into ingot steel, and ingot steel rolled into plates, and there planed and fashioned into the frames and siding of the ship and into her machinery, all represent the result of labor. The money is kept here among our own people and distributed among them. We do not use the money this year or next year or the following year, but spread it over a period whereby we are all benefited.

It is wise policy, too, for us to do this, because battle ships are a bond for peace. Recently there assembled in this city a convention of representative American citizens, leading divines, leading philanthropists, able citizens of the country, who have no object in view but their country's good. They met in convention and petitioned our Government and European governments to submit differences, when they arose, to international arbitration for adjudication. That is a wise policy, but the strongest auxiliary, the most able assistant of arbitration, is for us, the Congress of the United States, to provide battle ships and armored cruisers to show that if they will not arbitrate we have the power to protect our rights. I was deeply impressed a few weeks since when I received by mail an illustrated paper from London, and I presume other Senators received the same paper. It was perhaps 36 inches square. It was headed "England's first line of defense; her great royal navy." There was on that sheet a lithograph of perhaps 250 of the most beautiful vessels that ever floated upon the water. It was an object lesson from which I think we may all derive profit. It was at the time we were having our differences, and the paper was simply sent to us as a friendly message: "See what we have; why should we arbitrate?"

England, with a formidable navy, has appropriated this year $110,000,000 to build new ships, and yet she has already afloat 87 first, second, and third class battle ships and armored cruisers, the average displacement of which is 9,950 tons, while we hesitate here about building three battle ships which it will require more than three years for us to complete.

I think, Mr. President, it is an unwise policy on our part; I think it is narrow-minded for us to be niggardly in this respect. If we must economize let us economize in some other directions. Each one of these battle ships is a fortification in itself. It is a floating fort that is almost impregnable. It can be taken from Boston to New York, from New York to Philadelphia, and from Philadelphia to Baltimore, and so on to any port where defense is required.

The way to have peace, the way to avoid war, is to be prepared to meet war if it comes. There is no respect like the respect of fear, or if not fear the knowledge that your antagonist is your equal. I remember an incident that occurred in my own business a few months since which perhaps illustrates it more forcibly than anything else I could say. The engineer of one of our ships, a very capable, skilled mechanic, but of a pugilistic temperament, was continually at fault with one of the deck officers and on one or two occasions had assaulted him. Both officers were excellent men. We sent for them to come to the office, and after catechizing this man and that man, "Why did you do this?" the pugilistic one said, "I really could not resist it; it was an uncontrollable desire to strike the first officer." We did not care to dispense with their services, and we transferred the officer who had been assaulted to another vessel, and in his place we placed one physically superior to the officer who remained. No trouble followed, and a month or two later we sent for him. "How do things progress with you in your department?" "Oh, very pleasantly; we have no trouble whatever." "But are you not now seized with that irresistible desire to strike the deck officer?" "Well," he said, "I have learned to control myself." It was well for him that he did. It was because there stood arrayed against him one physically his superior. So it is with governments as well as individuals. If you have not the power to defend yourself upon land and sea, if you have not the courage to stand up and maintain your position if it is right, you will be assailed to your disadvantage.

I believe, as I have said before, that the construction of these 13 torpedo boats is all that it is wise for us to do at this time. I hope, however, most earnestly that when the bill is taken out of the Committee of the Whole into the Senate, the Senate will do that which I am sure the conference committee will do if we do not, and we will sooner or later consent to it—order the construction of three ships instead of the two that we have already decided upon. This, then, will give employment to hundreds of American mechanics. It will keep our machine shops teeming; it will find a market for the farmers' products, and general prosperity where the vessels are being constructed will ensue, for the laborer will find remunerative employment.

I believe it the part of wisdom in Congress when times are hard, when business is depressed, and when people are discouraged, to foster great internal improvements, to build up our Navy, to construct public buildings. I think we have made a mistake at the present Congress in not making appropriations for the erection of public buildings in the different States. The Committee on Commerce have reported a bill here, enormous in extent so far as dollars and cents are concerned, and I am not prepared to say at this time but that they are wise recommendations. Certainly they have distributed the appropriations generally throughout the different States of the Union. It is wise policy for us to do this, and if we have not the funds now, after the 4th of next March we propose to take some of the profits at present being made by the great sugar trust of this country that go into their treasury and place them in the Treasury of the United States. We propose to take some of the business that is now being done in foreign countries, transporting to this country the products of their factories and looms upon vessels flying the foreign flag, and transport it to this country in vessels that fly the Stars and Stripes at their peak.

I believe, Mr. President, this is wise policy. I believe it an American policy, and it should find a responsive echo in the heart of everyone who believes America to be, as it is, the first nation and the first people in the world.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in regard to the amendment concerning torpedo boats, I desire to say that I hope the Senate will agree to put it in the bill. There is no branch of the Navy in which we are so completely unprovided as in this important matter of torpedo boats. France leads in the possession of torpedo boats, with 218 in service and 54 building. Great Britain has 189 in service and 62 under construction. Spain is doubling her torpedo-boat force, and Japan, taking a lesson from her experience in the late war, and having already (with those captured from the Chinese) a total of 40 in service, is building 17 more.

These figures will show that while the 15 other countries mentioned have altogether 1,206 torpedo boats in service (Argentina, with the smallest number, showing 21), the United States has only 2. In the navy list which I have here before me we find the Cushing and the Stiletto, and those two only, as torpedo boats in commission. The Cushing is a fast boat according to the standard of speed of some years ago. The Stiletto is little more than a launch. We have really only one torpedo boat in commission, and that is the Cushing.

Now, torpedo boats, as I have said, are an exceedingly important branch of naval defense. They are particularly useful for harbor defense. They do not require a great addition to the enlisted force of the Navy. England keeps but few torpedo boats in commission, I think not more than half a dozen, although I have not the figures here. They are laid up and kept at the different yards. It is easy to keep them in condition. They are taken out and the machinery moved at different times in the year, but they do not involve the great running expense which battle ships and cruisers demand. In case of war, they can be all put in commission at once and are all useful.

Of late years, also, they have developed the torpedo boat into the torpedo destroyer; that is, the boat that carries a torpedo is fitted with an armament in order to be able to fight other boats of the same class. We have practically none of either kind. They are the most advantageous boats that can be built for harbor defense and for the fleet likewise, and yet it is with us an entirely neglected branch.

The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] speaks about submarine boats. Inventors have been trying to solve the problem of a submarine boat ever since our war. It has never yet been solved; it still remains in the experimental stage. There is no reason to suppose that the last device is any better than the first. They may invent a successful submarine boat any day, but it has not yet been done. In the meantime we are without this important branch of naval defense.

Mr. SQUIRE. Is there a successful submarine boat anywhere?

Mr. LODGE. There is no successful submarine boat in existence and there never has been, or a successfully controlled submarine torpedo. They may come. There is no possibility of saying what the limit of invention is, but it is certain that they have not been reached yet.

The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire for twenty torpedo boats, instead of being excessive, is extremely moderate. We ought to have at least a hundred torpedo boats, and I am especially anxious that this amendment will be added, as the Senate has seen fit to strike down two of those battle ships.

I do not understand, Mr. President, from my point of view, this system of economy in national defense.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Are these torpedo boats recommended by the Department?

Mr. LODGE. The Department recommends twelve. I do not understand, as I was saying, this theory of economizing in national defense. If there is a deficit in the revenue, it is not owing to extravagant appropriations. The last Congresses, Republican and Democratic, have met the growing needs of the country and no more. We have a deficit because we have insufficient revenue, and insufficient because we have a bad tariff. It is a matter of very little interest to the country how we distribute responsibility for this insufficiency here. We may get up and argue back and forth who is to blame; the fact is there; and the people of this country will lay the blame for it where it belongs next November. But all that does not in the least concern our duty in making appropriations for national defense. The question of national defense stands apart and alone from all other issues. If we must economize, let it be on public buildings and rivers and harbors; let it be on something that can wait if it is necessary. I do not see any reason for making any proper appropriation wait, but to take the provisions for national defense and make those the subject of economy seems to me utterly wrong and unpatriotic. Whether we have sufficient current revenue or not, we ought to provide for coast defense and for the naval armament, which is part of it. If we have not the money in the Treasury, there is nothing more suitable to borrow money for. But now we are met with the cry of economy, and all the evils pictured by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] are to be met by striking down two of the battle ships. That is, we should begin to economize, and economize only at the very point where money should never be considered, because it concerns national safety and defense.

Mr. President, if we can not get four battle ships, I hope the amendment of the Senator from California will be adopted and that we shall get at least three. It is of very little consequence whether we have a deficit or a surplus in the Treasury if we are going to leave our coasts undefended and our country in a position where we may be put to expense by foreign invasion and attack compared to which all that can be expended for an efficient Navy and for proper coast defenses would be but a drop in the bucket.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will at least make the battle ships three, and that they will also add the necessary number of torpedo boats, as proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as a member of the Naval Committee I have attended all of its sessions when in the city and endeavored to inform myself so as to act intelligently. I have not had the opportunity to get the full knowledge of the condition of the Navy that I ought to have, and it may be that I have been led into error in some opinions which I have formed; but let those opinions be just or unjust, true or untrue, I feel that I shall at least be excused if I give the Senate and the country the benefit of some "remarks," to use the ordinary phrase in use here, on this important question.

There are some very strange and anomalous things existing in regard to the Navy and the Navy Department, and all the other Departments here, for that matter, and I will try to point out some of them. As far as I have been able to judge the condition which exists, I will say that the Navy of the United States is suffering more from red-tape, from bureaucracy, so to speak, from official dry rot, than anything else. We find that in certain years there is great clamor for great navy-yards, for great preparations and equipments for the Government to be able to build its own ships, and we have the Bureau of Construction, the Bureau of Steam Engineering, the Bureau of Ordnance, and all that kind of thing—eight bureaus in all. From the little association I have had with some of those officers I think most of them are thoroughly competent and are creditable representatives of the United States Government. But I find that in the construction of vessels, after the different bureaus have taken charge and seasawed with one another and corresponded, and they have had the thing up and down, twisted and turned, they have nothing to do with them except to furnish the plans and superintend construction.

Complaints are coming in from mechanics who have been in the Government navy-yards and those who have been employed there that the ships are being let out to private contract, that bread is being taken out of their mouths, and that they can not get work; that they must move out and move off from their homes to hunt work in the yards of the private contractors.

The Chief Constructor, who is a very accomplished engineer and a very practical man, has advised and urged upon the Government the necessity of a change in the method of constructing our naval vessels. He pointed out very forcibly before the committee the division of responsibility which now exists, and, if possible, the creeping in through this division of responsibility of abuses, and urged that a vessel when contracted for should be contracted for like you do for a coat; that you let the whole garment be completed by one man, all the buttons sewed on, all the lining in, the collar and everything, and turned over to you complete. But instead of that we find that one bureau designs and supervises the construction of the hull, another bureau designs and superintends the building of the machinery, another regulates the quality of the armor, and each works at times independently of the other. I have arrived at the conclusion that the whole scheme, summed up in a few words, is to get as much money out of the taxpayers as possible, and thus make the vessels very costly.

On the other hand, when you come to catechise them to find when they have built these navy-yards at such enormous expense and equipped them with all the costly machinery why they do not let the Government build its own ships, they say, "Well, we tried to build one and it is a monumental failure. It has cost more than you could buy them for by a private contract." Why has that been the case? Simply because business and politics have been brought together and the cries of certain men have been heeded, who think there ought to be reduced hours of labor. It is the eight-hour labor system and military routine prevailing in the Government industrial establishments, and one thing and another, with incompetence in the managers and overseers, that produce this undesirable condition.

The cry on this floor is: Labor must be given employment. We must give our people work. We must become a stepmother and feed them by giving them work.

Ah, Mr. President, there is a certain kind of labor that has a very strong pull, to use a colloquialism, but there are millions of other laborers who are considered as nothing more than hirelings, as hewers of wood and drawers of water, too ignorant or of too little concern, rather too debased, too far apart, to have any consideration in this Chamber.

Now, I come back to the question under discussion, for I shall wander from it in imitation of the bad example of other Senators, and shall, before I get through, discuss the general conditions and the diseases at work in this country. It seems to me that we are in this position, if we want to act as intelligent legislators and patriots: Our seaport cities, with their vast accumulations of wealth, are practically, so we are told by the army officers, defenseless; a hostile navy could come in and bombard them, burn them, or lay tribute, and there would be no means of defense. Well, Washington told us, "In time of peace prepare for war"; but I think any country in Christendom will think once, twice, and thrice before it goes to war with this country, unless we, just out of pure cussedness, so to speak, and aggression, which is un-American, shall go forth to force other people to fight for their rights.

But suppose we are defenseless, with the record or catalogue just read to us by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] as to the strength of European navies, I ask you in all candor, is it the purpose of this country to try to emulate those old countries in getting up a navy that will cost us four or five hundred million dollars? Have we any need for such a navy? I think every statesman will agree with me that we need enough ships to have our flag respected wherever it may go and to have the nations of the earth consider us as being one of the powers that will let everybody else alone if they will let us alone, but that will be ready when the time comes to defend its honor and to enforce its will. How many vessels would that take? It is mere guesswork.

I believe we ought to have a respectable Navy, but with the rapid advance in the art of naval architecture, with the changes, lightning-like, going on from year to year, old guns and old systems of warfare becoming almost obsolete, it is a question which should be considered very carefully whether it is wise and proper for us to spend untold millions in the equipment of vessels that in a few years may become useless.

Without having any figures, I am prepared to say that since the time of the battle between the Merrimac and the Monitor in Hampton Roads, which revolutionized naval warfare, there have been billions of dollars spent by the governments of Europe and this country, most of which has been practically wasted. The history of this development has been that the engineers and the experts and the scientists have gone on making armor that was impenetrable, and then turning around and making a steel cannon that would penetrate it. They have perhaps reached the verge of extreme possibilities in that direction. But the mechanism of handling the enormous steel cannon and the other ingenious and mechanical contrivances which are necessary even to load the guns, all that kind of thing is being improved on every day, and we find that, as I said a moment ago, what was up to date ten years ago is now absolutely out of use.

Let us look at the record of the great battle ships that the world has spent so many millions on. According to my remembrance, the Japanese and Chinese and the Chileans and the Peruvians are the only nations that have ever made battle with the great ships.

Even during the Franco-German war, when both navies could have gone to sea and gone to fighting, what did they do? They remained in their own harbors. The only exploit of the English navy, which has cost, perhaps, nearly as much as all the others put together, that I can recollect is that they did bombard the defenseless city of Alexandria and burned it.

A hostile fleet might bombard New York. I dare say they would in case of war. Therefore if we are to attempt to protect New York the question presents itself as a practical one whether it is best to undertake to defend it with battle ships, or defend it with torpedo boats, or defend it with land batteries on the coast at the mouth of the harbor. With submarine torpedoes buried under the channel so as to be touched off by electricity I do not doubt if war were declared to-morrow between this country and any foreign nation, in a very brief while the engineers of the United States Army would have every one of our seacoast cities that can not be reached from outside in the open ocean, as a few may, defended by such mines of torpedoes as would prevent any destruction or injury to property.

The aspect of the question which presents itself to me (I have thrown out these general observations for what they may be worth) is the one as to where the ships are to come from. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] tells us more ships mean more bonds. If more ships mean more bonds, then, Mr. President, I am opposed to any ships. The Navy of the United States, which at the close of the war was the equal or the superior of any navy of the world, was built with greenbacks. If you bring in a proposition to build and equip a Navy to defend this country by issuing more greenbacks, or provide a proper system of coast defenses by issuing greenbacks, I will vote for it. But, sir, in the impoverished condition of our people, with millions out of employment, with the products of the farmers so low that there is nothing left with which to pay taxes and get a bare living, with the knowledge, which is brought home to me with more telling force than to any other man in this Chamber, that agriculture is languishing and dying, I can not vote for any such measures, and I can not stand here and remain silent while the proposition is made to continue in this hellish progress toward bankruptcy and universal ruin.

Therefore, while I am discussing in some degree the question of the Navy and its enlargement and the defense of the country and so on, I will follow, as I said, the bad example of others who have injected into their speeches a discussion of finance. What I shall say will be in answer to various speeches made by various men at various times and places, some Senators and some not.

I shall not undertake to go into the matter of the legality of the issue of bonds. I have denied, and I still deny, the right of the President of the United States to issue bonds to carry on the Government. I do not believe any lawyer here will dispute the proposition. All agree that there is no law which gives the President the right to issue bonds for current expenses. Is there any law which gives the right to the President to accomplish by indirection what he can not accomplish by direction? Is there any law which gives the President the right by hocus-pocus and legal legerdemain to get money out of the Treasury which it is unlawful for him to take otherwise? Some Senators say there is. They talk about the endless chain by which greenbacks are redeemed in gold, the greenbacks then going into the general fund and becoming subject to draft for general expenses, and in that way they have been used.

The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], who I see is not in his seat, in a speech made on the 17th of April had this to say in regard to the interests of the Democratic party:

I wish to protect the best interests of that party. It would have been better had extreme counsels not prevailed then. It would be better for our party if extreme counsels did not prevail now. Therefore, I say it does not lie in the mouths of the friends of the Wilson Act to object because bonds have been issued for legitimate purposes, namely, the redemption of greenbacks, and because, incidentally, those bonds have furnished sufficient money to support the Government. How else would the Government have been supported? What chaos would have resulted without it! What a spectacle would have been presented to the country and its opponents! What a weapon we would have put into their hands if this Government had ceased operations because without enough money to support it! This very power, exercised under the act of 1875, properly, regularly, duly exercised, has been the means by which the Administration has floated the Government along. Any other course would make the failure of the Wilson Act more apparent and emphatic. We had to have some revenue. The House and Senate were deadlocked. How else was it to be procured to supply deficiencies? Not that anyone had proposed to issue bonds to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government; but as we had to have the gold with which to redeem the greenbacks, incidentally that very situation furnished us the revenue to meet the deficiency occasioned by the Wilson Act.

The tyrant's plea of necessity, Mr. President. With the representatives of the people in session, with the duty imposed upon them by law and by the Constitution to supply the ways and means to carry on the Government, a President overrides all decency, overrides the will of his own party, and accomplishes by indirection what he had no authority to do otherwise.

We are told further by the Senator from New York that this demand for the investigation of the bond sale, to which I shall not address myself, is a Populist measure, and he went on to catalogue me as being one of a coterie of four farmers, so to speak, who denied the legality of this action, and as being the only ones who denied it, and with biting sarcasm he alluded to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER], who claimed that the people desired this investigation, sneeringly alluding to us as "we, the people," "we, the tailors of Tooley street," are alone angry at the issue of bonds in time of peace. I deny the right of the Senator from New York to pass upon or give a nomenclature to my politics.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator understand that in the remarks I made the other day I classed him as a Populist?

Mr. TILLMAN. I come along in the catalogue of Messrs. PEPPER, STEWART, ALLEN, and TILLMAN. I am one of the coterie of four.

Mr. HILL. I was referring to those who claimed that the President had no right and the Secretary of the Treasury had no right to issue bonds; and as the Senator had previously taken that position, and the Senator from Nebraska had taken that same position, and the Senator from Kansas had taken that position, it was that coterie to which I referred. I have not referred to the Senator from South Carolina as a Populist in any remarks which I have had the honor of presenting to the Senate. The Senator has a right to define himself, and with that definition I shall be entirely content.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not wish to do the Senator from New York any wrong.

Mr. HILL. The Senator has before him my remarks.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have the Senator's remarks before me, and I shall read them and leave it to those who hear them as to their proper interpretation. The Senator from New York said:

The Senator from Kansas said further:

"Senators denounced the proceeding as unlawful."

Who? The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], to whom has been added the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. This coterie of Senators denounced it as unlawful.

He does not make any exception, leaving me out; he simply goes right on, and after mentioning three others, with me at the head, he says:

This coterie of Senators—

Well, I think I was in very good company. I certainly feel I was in better company than I am with some Democrats who go around on this side labeled "Democrats," and are nothing but Republicans in disguise. [Laughter.] I shall prove that they are Republicans before I get through. The Senator from New York further says:

The people! These Senators always speak in the name of the people, as if the Populist party represented the people. Mr. President, I am tired of hearing these men talk in behalf of the people. They represent but a small fragment of the people.

I do not know how much or how many we represent. I know I represent a State, and I represent it so thoroughly and so fully that I can stand here and claim to give its voice and say where its vote is going. You can not do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator mean to say further that he can take the Democratic State of South Carolina over into the hands of the Populists? Does he mean that?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will tell you what I propose to do with the Democratic State of South Carolina, or rather what the Democratic State of South Carolina proposes to do with itself.

Mr. HILL. I understood the Senator to say that he was proceeding to state what he would do with the State of South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I recollect what I said—I know what I meant—it was that I could speak as to what the State would do, and you can not state what your State will do. But whether I represent the people of South Carolina or not, I want to show whom the Senator from New York represents, and whom he claims to represent. In this same speech of his on the 17th of April the Senator from New York went on to say:

I looked to see how the bonds were subscribed for. The total subscriptions to the recent loan were $551,026,515, of which New York subscribed the modest sum of $450,898,850. I thus speak of New York and its interests here as one of the reasons why I manifest interest in this question. I do not propose to have the bonds which my constituents purchased discredited by any such bogus, trumped-up resolution as this if I can prevent it. Massachusetts alone subscribed $42,891,650; Pennsylvania, $11,690,200; Ohio, $9,398,950; Illinois, $5,154,100; Maryland, $3,729,500; New Jersey, $3,305,200. Then Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Connecticut in all subscribed $6,897,250.

Now, listen. Here I want you gentlemen who represent these States, you Senators, to consider, because you are making of this thing a sectional issue, and you know what sectionalism produced in this country once—

Then come Texas, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Delaware, District of Columbia, Virginia, and West Virginia, all together, $5,200,035. Then comes another group of States, Nebraska, Missouri, Arkansas, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Kansas, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, and Wisconsin, $5,570,850. Then comes another group of States which were going to take all the bonds before they were issued at 2½ or 3 per cent—

A slur at the silver representatives of the Republican party—

Arizona, California, Indian Territory, Montana, Nevada, Idaho, Colorado, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wyoming, and all others, $6,289,330.

Out of the $551,000,000 New York subscribed for $450,000,000; New England and the States east of Ohio ran it up to $500,000,000, and the rest of the pauper States of this country subscribed for the other fifty millions.

You represent the "people." Yes, you represent the bondholders, the bankers of New York City, and nobody else on this floor. There are no more men, or very few more people, on Manhattan Island than there are in South Carolina. Of course it goes without a reason that the great metropolis of this country, which is its depot for the entry of imports and its principal port of export, that there the money will be. I have no objection to that. What I do object to is that after having by unjust legislation legislated all the millions of this country into your pockets, legislated all the railroads into your pockets, legislated all the bonds into your pockets, you say to the rest of us, "You have got to pay the interest on this in gold, and if you impoverish yourselves and have to go to the poorhouse to do it, you must do it." That is what I object to, and that is the fight.

Mr. HILL. Is the fight to pay the interest, or are you going to repudiate the interest?

Mr. TILLMAN. If you go on with your policy and drive the people to desperation and bloodshed, it will be repudiation of bonds and interest both, I fear.

Mr. HILL. If you can not do that, you will have bloodshed, I suppose?

Mr. TILLMAN. If you force the people to bloodshed, let the blood be on your hands, not on mine. I stand here as one mouthpiece of the agricultural interests of this country, and I tell you we are desperate.

Mr. HILL. That is very evident. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, and before we starve we will make somebody else desperate, my friend. I have been in the West. Do not consider that this is a fire eater from South Carolina, who has lost his head. I know whereof I speak. There is to-day more hatred and anger in the hearts of the people west of the Mississippi for New York and Wall street and the bondholding, bloodsucking East than ever they had for the South.

Mr. HILL. I supposed my friend a few moments ago was trying to avoid sectionalism.

Mr. TILLMAN. I said that the people who were forcing this gold issue are producing sectionalism; and I take occasion now to reproduce, or rather to paraphrase, the words of Charles Sumner, that gold monometallism is sectional, and bimetalism, or free silver, is national.

We heard the argument—and everyone will acknowledge that it was a very luminous and able argument—of the Senator from New York as to the legality of the bond issue. He dwelt with great unction and emphasis upon the old laws of 1875 and 1878, the one to issue bonds to redeem greenbacks, and the other prohibiting the retirement of the greenbacks when redeemed. He says they must be construed together. That is all right. Why do you not go to the Stanley Matthews resolution, which is also an old law, and which should have some weight in your judgment as to how this paper shall be redeemed? That is rubbish, I suppose, and has been superseded by the parity clause of the act of 1890. You make laws to suit yourselves; you construe laws to suit yourselves, and you are oblivious of any act you choose to leave out of your mind. You plead as a special pleader for the interpretation of laws to suit yourselves, and when people come to you for relief you say it is unconstitutional.

Mr. HILL. Do I understand the Senator to speak of the Stanley Matthews resolution as a law of Congress?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is an expression of the idea, of the interpretation by Congress, of what the law is. It was passed by a two-thirds vote of both parties in both Houses, and it ought at least to have as much weight as the Sherman law, which was repealed by a combination of the gold bugs of both parties.

Mr. HILL. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that it was simply a concurrent resolution of Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, forgive me if I am ignorant of the technical meaning and legal effect of a concurrent, a joint resolution, and all that sort of thing. [Laughter.] At all events, it got the necessary votes, which just as easily could have made it an act instead of a resolution, and it should have some weight in morals, if not in law. We could have had a similar resolution or act passed here by a heavy majority if it had not been that this bamboozling process has gone on on this floor by the representatives of monopolies and railroads and banks, and if you had permitted it; but you talked it to death and put it upon the Calendar. [Laughter.]

I have been governor of a State, and I know something about the feeling of official responsibility and as to the weight which presses on the executive head of a government who has imposed upon him the execution of law. I have been accused of even overriding some laws of South Carolina in connection with our dispensary or whisky law, but I can not go aside now to make any explanation of that. I have left that to be determined by my own people, who have passed on my record there twice as governor and once as Senator in sending me here. People may criticize the provisions of that law and my actions as governor as much as they please, but I leave it to my own people to answer that by their votes. I say this, however, that no Executive with a due regard for his oath of office would, in the face of Congress in session, do that by indirection which he could not do by direction, and had no authority at all to do.

We had in the past an illustration of a conflict between the Executive and Congress in the time of Jackson. When he vetoed the recharter of the banks, he gave his reasons, and to me they always seemed cogent; at least he appealed to the people and they reelected him by an overwhelming majority. The only vetoes which this President of ours has given are the vetoes of some pitiful little pension bills for some poor devil of a Union soldier, maybe a tramp or a deserter—I do not know—but anyhow it was a pitiful and contemptible exertion of that great power of the veto to keep a pension out of the hands of some poor devil and then turn around and with the other hand give $10,000,000 to one syndicate of bankers. [Laughter.]

The difference between the two men and the difference between the Democracy of the two men is, that Jackson stood as the champion and defender of the masses of the people, while Cleveland stands as the exemplar and tool of the classes—one representing the blood, bone, brawn, and industry, and the other representing money—the almighty dollar. [Laughter.]

The point, however, which I wish to emphasize here, though it has already been in effect brought out by the Senator from New York, is that Grover Cleveland is the tool and instrument of Republican policies. He has had no policy as President except that of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in dealing with our finances.

The people turned the Republican party out of office in 1892 because it had grown intolerable; they turned the Democratic party out in the House of Representatives and mighty near got it turned out here because the Democracy had grown more intolerable. Now the Republicans come forward and say: "Here, these Democrats have shown themselves incapable of governing this country; they have closed your mills; they have stopped all the factories; they have put laborers out in the road and made tramps of them; now put us back in power."

Well, it so happens that the apostle of Republican finance, the man who has persistently day by day and night by night for a quarter of a century schemed and worked and plotted and planned and compromised, fooled the Senators from the West in that act of 1890, as stated by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] the day before yesterday, and as soon as he got things in shape joined the so-called Democrats to undo it, leaving them in the ditch. That Senator can be called as a witness. Here is the testimony of the Senator from Ohio as to Mr. Cleveland and his policy:

The President and the Secretary of the Treasury were perfectly justified in pursuing the course they have followed. They could not have done otherwise. Suppose they had refused payment of United States notes in gold. The result would have been that our money would have at once fallen below par and a disturbance in foreign and domestic trade would have occurred. They did right. Though I hold far different opinions from them on many questions, yet I stand here and say boldly and openly that in managing our financial affairs during the present condition of things I think the Secretary of the Treasury and the President have done their full duty, and I could say no more if there were a Republican President in office.

"Praise from Sir Hubert is praise indeed;" and when Grover Cleveland, if he ever dare go before the people again asking the indorsement of the Democracy, of the true Democrats, he can bear on his brow the certificate of the Senator from Ohio that he has simply done his full duty, and that a so-called Democratic President has carried out that policy which a Republican would have done had he been in the Presidential chair. You are linked together, gentlemen. Grover Cleveland and JOHN SHERMAN and John G. Carlisle are a trinity of public enemies, and you can not separate them. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Ohio the day before yesterday said to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who helped him to repeal the Sherman law, "We intend to put you out." Indeed they do. You Democrats get no credit and no thanks for having carried out his policy. They stand ready to come forward, and if they can fool the people again to trust in them they intend to take the entire control of the Senate and the House, as well as the Presidency. It is simply a question with them as to whether the people will ever be so damnably foolish as to trust them again.

And what do they propose to do when they get in? They are already laying the wires here now, forcing these enormous appropriations. They are to have either a heavy increase of taxes or more bonds. Who are going to pay the taxes? Who are the ultimate payers of taxes? The laborers of the United States, because those who sit in their offices and clip coupons, who manipulate Congress and State conventions, do not labor. They produce nothing. It is the toiling farmer who plows with horses and the sweating laborer in the machine shop and the factories of this country who produce its wealth, and they will be the ones who must either pay your bonds, if you issue them, or pay the taxes which you propose to levy.

In 1893, on the 30th of August, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in urging the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law and the total destruction of silver as a money metal, used this language:

Let us not deceive our people as to the reasons for this repeal; for when the purchasing clause is repealed you will still have to deal with the real causes of the prevailing stringency and distrust. I do not vote for this repeal with any expectation that it will in any considerable degree relieve us from the industrial stagnation that has fallen upon all kinds of business and production, and that has thrown out of employment hundreds of thousands of laboring men and women. They care little about the kind of money that is paid them, provided that it is equal in purchasing power to any other money, and is backed by the United States. They do not study the question of ratio, or the difference between silver and gold, and, if left to choice, prefer the notes of the United States to either coin.

What they want is employment, fair wages for home industry, reasonable protection against undue competition with foreign laborers miserably paid, fed, lodged, and treated. Give them these, and you may make your standards of value as you choose.

Why do you not give them the greenbacks if they prefer them? They were good enough during the war, according to your own testimony, and made this country prosperous. Why are you unwilling to loosen your grasp from the throat of industry and give our people the opportunity, by having some circulating medium that will transact the business of this country, to renew their employment? How can the factories start up when their products can not be sold because of the poverty of the farmer? One-half of our population are farmers or dependent upon farmers. They are one-half of the consumers. How can they consume the products of your factories if you bankrupt them by your financial policy of restriction and contraction and the maintenance of the gold standard?

In the same speech the Senator from Ohio further said:

We ought to encourage in every way possible the exportations of our products. I do not precisely see how this can be done. If any measure whatever can be devised to facilitate transportation, even if possible by the use of American vessels, in various ways, it ought to be done. We ought to pour the wealth of our country into the lap of all Europe and sell them our products in order to avoid any difficulty. I do not say precisely how we could aid the Treasury, but the people of the United States are an ingenious people; they will devise ways and means of meeting any demand that is made upon our resources by the people of Europe or any other country.

He testified over here first as to the ignorance of the people and to their indifference and carelessness with respect to what kind of money they have so that the Government is behind it. Then he turns around and says we ought to pour the products of our country into Europe. In other words, knowing that two-thirds or three-fourths of our exports are raised on the farm, he says we must compete with other nations by selling lower than they do, so as to send our products to England and fatten and feed the British and let them grow wealthy. At whose expense and for whose benefit? Talk about the Tories whom we were supposed to have driven out of this country in 1776! They are here in full possession of the Government to-day, and our financial policy and the conduct of this Government are as much English as though we were a part of the Dominion of Canada, or more so.

Pour our products abroad; send them away; give them away. Then, when the farmer wants some reciprocity, wants the right, if he must sell in the cheapest market, to buy in the cheapest market, the Senator says, "Oh, no; we must protect American industries; we must protect American labor." Mind you, now, whenever I say Carlisle I mean SHERMAN. They are interchangeable as political entities, except that one has been honest and consistent and the other has proved treacherous.

Here is the famous speech which the Secretary of the Treasury delivered in Chicago a couple of weeks ago to a so-called laborers' meeting. I have seen it stated, I have letters from there so stating, and I have the best kind of information to the effect that he was not invited there by any of the actual laborers of Chicago at all, but that it was a bogus crowd that got in the hall, and that when some of the actual laborers went in and tried to catechise him and ask him some questions, so as to elucidate some of his points, he had them hustled out by the police. [Laughter.] We have it out of the mouths of JOHN SHERMAN and John Carlisle, for they are both alike. Here is what he said:

The naked proposition is that the United States shall coin, at the public expense, for the exclusive benefit of the individuals and corporations owning the bullion, all the silver that may be presented at the mints into dollars containing 371 grains of pure silver, or 412 grains of standard silver, worth intrinsically about 51 or 52 cents, deliver the coins to the depositors of the bullion, and compel all the other people in the country to receive these coins at a valuation of 100 cents each in the payment of debts due them for property sold, for labor and service of all kinds, for pensions to soldiers and sailors and their widows and children, for losses sustained under policies issued by life and other insurance companies, for deposits in saving banks, trust companies, building associations, and other institutions, for debts due to widows and orphans by guardians, executors, and administrators of decedents' estates and other trustees, for salaries of all civil, military, and naval officials, and the compensation of private soldiers and seamen, and, in short, for every kind of obligation recognized by the laws of the land, except only in cases where the prudent capitalist has taken the precaution in advance to contract for payment of debts due to him in gold or its equivalent.

Now, here is SHERMAN:

Nowhere in the world does the laboring man get as many dollars of as high purchasing power as are paid to him for all kinds of labor in the United States of America. No one will suffer more severely than he by a lowering of the standard of value. Every laboring man can buy more under this system with his money than any other. It seems to me we ought not to disturb the parity of the two coins of silver and gold.

I ask the Senator from Ohio to tell me, if the wage earners to whom he was addressing himself and to whom Carlisle was addressing himself get their rations and bread and meat cheaper than they ever got them before, from whom do they buy them? Will the Senator be kind enough to answer? If he knows anybody in this country who makes bread and meat except the man who plows with a mule or horse, I am unacquainted with him. They take cognizance of every class of society—Carlisle cataloguing them, SHERMAN appealing to them; both ignoring that great agricultural interest which pays your foreign exchanges with its hard earnings. There is no farmer in it. He is not worthy of consideration. He has been sold bodily, as much as slaves were sold in the South, to English syndicates, to the bondholders and bankers and corporations of this country. He is a slave. They depend upon his ignorance, to which they have certified. They hope to bamboozle the laborers in the cities into voting the Republican ticket while depending on the ignorance of the farmers in the country to vote the Republican ticket, and thus hope to restore themselves and their people to power. Perhaps the people will do it. The fools are not all dead yet. But they are getting awful restless. You have burned them mighty hot. Take care you do not burn them so hard and so hot that when you count your votes in November you will not find enough to put you back. Every interest, however, is catalogued by Carlisle, as I said, in maintaining this iniquitous gold-bug policy of giving 2 pounds of cotton or 2 bushels of wheat for what ought to be bought with 1.

The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] has served notice upon the country and the Senate that it is about time for the Democrats and the Republicans to join forces against this poor little coterie of three Populists in here. [Laughter.] Having destroyed utterly all hope of the Democratic party as now organized regaining its prestige or having anything to do with the Government for the next quarter of a century, having done it to death—for it is dead unless it can purify itself of the corruption and rottenness that now hangs around its neck like Sinbad's old man—he says, "Join with us; it is time to join. We must not have any investigation of bond sales, or it might throw a cloud on the title of my New York constituents, who are 'the people.'"

But here comes another "offensive partisan." Way back yonder, when we were blessed with a surplus rather than a deficit and the first Democratic President we had had for many years was laboring to convince the people that civil service reform was a dear thing to his heart, he used the words that he would not permit offensive partisanship in any office of the Government. What a spectacle has his Cabinet presented during the last year or more to all of us who disagree with them, who cling to the principles of Jefferson and Jackson and who swear by hard money, who are called "silver cranks," "lunatics," "wild-eyed people from the West." Do you blame us for being wild-eyed when they are trying to make us farmers especially contribute to support the whole business? Is it not time to get wild-eyed?

Mr. Herbert has a speech in this morning's paper which was delivered in Cleveland to some commercial gentlemen, some bondholders and coupon clippers. He comes from an agricultural State, with a few iron mines and a little coal. Carlisle comes from an agricultural State. Here is what Mr. Herbert has to say about the horny-handed sons of toil:

Against all such tendencies, against every contention between classes that might disturb the internal peace of our country, against every scheme that should tend in the remotest degree to affect the rights of property, against any interference by government with the principles of absolute justice between man and man, it was once supposed that the American farmer, in defense of his own home, would forever stand as an immovable bulwark; but a change has come over the spirit of many of our farmers. They have heard so much of industries built up and fortunes amassed by legislation, so much of wages said to have been increased by law, that they are naturally asking why something can not be done for their benefit by the Government at Washington. There is no other way in which to account for the change of sentiment among them. Many schemes have in recent years found favor in their eyes that would not for a moment have been entertained in the earlier days of the Republic.

Then he goes on and tells us what fools we are and why:

THE FREE-COINAGE CRAZE.

First the demand was for the issue of unlimited greenbacks, then it was for the issue of subtreasury notes upon a deposit of farm products, making the Government every man's banker, and now comes the demand, participated in by a very large number of farmers and others, for the unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, when the ratio of the values of gold and silver is as 31 to 1. It never occurred to Alexander Hamilton, who represented one of the great parties of the country, when parties were forming, or to his great rival, Thomas Jefferson, who represented the other, that Congress had the authority or the power to make 50 cents' worth of silver equal to a dollar. Hamilton and Jefferson both understood that the bullion in a silver dollar and the bullion in a gold dollar should equal each other in value as tested by the markets of the world. When Jefferson was President he stopped the coinage of the silver dollar because a difference of 3 or 4 cents between the value of our silver dollar and the value of the cheaper foreign coin, then in circulation, was driving our silver dollar out of circulation. Later, when in the days of Jackson it was seen that there had come to be 3 cents difference in the bullion value of the two dollars, the ratio was readjusted to meet that difference. In those days the idea that Congress could legislate out of existence a difference of 50 cents in the value of the two dollars would have been deemed chimerical; but now that we are accustomed to look to the Government for material help in so many directions in our daily business—those who make these demands are claiming that Congress has already done things for special classes quite as beneficent and quite as marvelous as the keeping of gold and silver together at 16 to 1.

He says it never occurred to Hamilton or Jefferson that this Government could by law make 50 cents' worth of silver equal to a dollar. In other words, having by legislation, which debarred silver from the mints, hammered it from 103 down to 51 or 52, they take advantage of their own wrong and undertake to parade before the people of the United States the claim that silver is low because it is so in the markets of the world. It is so by law and nothing else. There is no man who dares to deny it. More; we hear talk of "fiat" money. Oh, the gold-bug papers have howled, and howled, and howled for years on the matter of fiat money. What is fiat money? Every dollar of this Government is fiat money. No man here dares to dispute it. How do I prove it? Fiat, of course, as every man knows, means be it enacted or so be it. There is no dollar in circulation that is not a dollar simply because it is a dollar by act of Congress.

We are told that we have bimetallism now because there is more silver in circulation than ever before. It is not a question of how much silver circulates. It is a question of the standard of value. Every man here knows that the silver would not circulate as a dollar under the law discriminating against it at the mints if it were not redeemable in gold. They say, "Law does not affect value. Law has nothing to do with it. You can not legislate on this matter. You can not do anything by law." Let me illustrate. Let us take three dollars—one in gold, one in silver, and one in greenbacks. They are interchangeable, and everybody prefers the paper dollar. It is a dollar, however, because it is redeemable in coin. It is a promise, a note. The silver dollar used to be a dollar because it was worth a dollar. It is now a dollar because it is redeemable in gold. Otherwise it is nothing more than 50 or 52 cents. Let us burn these three dollars, if you please. The paper goes up in smoke; the other two melt. Being indestructible, they become bullion. What a moment ago was a dollar in silver is now a commodity. It can be sold in the markets for what it will bring, like wheat or corn. Why is the gold still a dollar? Because the nations of the earth receive it as a dollar? No. Because it has the right of way to the mints by enactment and can come and get itself a new frock and be coined back into its old dress. If silver were allowed also to go and get a new frock it would be worth a hundred cents in a very few years, as soon as we get back into a condition of equilibrium between the two metals which has been destroyed by legislation.

Yet these wise men try to bamboozle the people by saying, "The law has nothing to do with it. It is a matter of interchange between the nations of the earth. It is fixed by commerce." I am bound to acknowledge that if we had free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 possibly our gold would disappear. Suppose it does. Being a coward and a thief, it always leaves when there is anything to do for the people. I have been out West, and I took some hand primaries to see how many there were who had seen any gold in a year. The result showed about 1 in 16. Talk about $620,000,000 in gold in circulation now which will disappear and create a vacuum and a panic! Where is it going? Who is going to give it away? If silver coinage were instituted by Congress I dare say there would be a rush and an effort made by the shylocks to foreclose their mortgages and reap the fruits of their roguery before the country could get on its legs again. They are swallowing us by degrees now, and if we have to go it at one dash or go it in four or five years I prefer to take it right straight and have it over. I prefer to go inside the whale all at once, like Jonah did, than be slowly swallowed with the accompaniment of crocodile tears.

No man here who is honest will deny the proposition that with the recognition of silver as money, with the right to mintage like gold, silver will bound away yonder somewhere approximately on a par with gold. I do not know whether the ratio would be 20 to 1 or 16 to 1 or 17 to 1, or what it would be, but silver would just as inevitably rise and get to a par with gold in a year or two as air rises when you uncork a bottle where you have had it confined. You can not keep it down, and you know it. You talk about law having nothing to do with it. You take the fool farmers for such idiots that you think you can stuff it down them, and that you can continue to make them sell their products cheaply to Europe and to pay the bonds and the difference in exchange.

What is the matter with gold that it has been going away? It went to Europe simply because our exports were so low in price that they did not equal the imports and interest on our foreign debt. That sent gold to Europe to meet the foreign balance. There are those who undertake to say that you can rehabilitate this country and restore it to prosperity by increasing the taxes upon people, by levying more taxes, by building all these enormous vessels, by making a deficit, by issuing bonds. If that is your Carlisle-Cleveland-Sherman policy, and if the people take it, I say let them fry; they deserve to fry. If they have not sense enough, if they do not realize their duty as citizens to investigate, if they follow false leaders who sell them out here, let them suffer; it is their lookout. But where is it going to end?

Let us look down the vista and see where it is going to end. I shall not portray it. I once gave a picture here of what I consider is coming. I can see it. I may be one of those Cassandra's who can see things that nobody else can see and who grieves over them. But it has been the history of the world that those who were pressing the people—pressing, pressing, and oppressing—never did see anything. Belshazzar saw nothing. None of them ever took any warning. They go relentlessly and blindly forward to their doom. The only thing I have as a consolation is that I hope and believe there is a God in heaven who has some regard for this country, who has some care of it, who for wise purposes is bringing about this condition of unrest and panicky desperate feeling, so as to bring some relief other than the simple financial one. We need other things besides the rectification of finances. We need a purification in official life. We need an uplifting and upbuilding of American patriotism. We need a constitutional convention to adopt new guarantees for the liberties of the people, to tie the hands of the tyrants and the thieves who now govern them. You dam up water and you dam it up until you get a full head on, and then, in the words of old Jere Black when he was talking before the Electoral Commission and was lamenting the degradation to which his country had come:

Wait until there is a full head on; go on with your tyranny and your robbery, your cheating of the people; overthrow the foundations of republican liberty here; wait until there is a full head on and the flood gates open, and you will see some fine grinding done.

So I say you people are going to see some fine grinding done in 1896 or within the next four years.

Here is my friend the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], whom I dearly love. [Laughter.] You know his slogan. His brag when he gets before an audience is, "I am a Democrat!" Whenever I am labeled as a Populist, as newspapers have done and as the Congressional Directory even did, though fixed up by a Democratic clerk, I say that Populism, which, of course, is derived from the Latin word signifying the people, ought to be good enough for anybody. In other words, the People's Party—having reference to those grand Democratic principles of the greatest good for the greatest number, the rule of the majority, local self-government, and the other cardinal principles which Jefferson and Jackson taught us—ought to be a party we all could join. I say to the Senator from New York, I am a Democrat after the manner of Jefferson and Jackson. He has departed from the faith. He prates sound money; I cry hard money. He stands here as an exponent of the proposition that the national banks shall take the paper money and issue it all; I stand here as an exponent of the proposition that the National Government should issue all the money and nobody else have anything to do with it. If we must have some paper to supplement gold and silver, well and good, but let us have gold and silver first.

As I said, there is a trinity of financiers who dominate and control, and who propose to control, our financial policy, no matter which party wins, Republican or Democratic. Nobody, however, has the slightest idea that the Democrats will win. This trinity is composed of Cleveland, Carlisle, and SHERMAN on the one hand, and in opposition I place Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln on the other. There they are. If the people can not see and will not see it; if the farmers of this country, after the plain, open, palpable statements by these three gentlemen, can be longer fooled into voting that ticket, they deserve it.

The Senator from New York asked me a while ago what I was going to do with South Carolina. I will say to him that I expect to go to Chicago as a delegate to the national convention. I expect to do my level best as a Democrat to call my party back out of the woods of Republicanism and get it to throw up and slough off all the corruption and rottenness it has had in the last four years. If we have to bid good-bye to New York, the State that has stood by us so long, and tell Tammany's chieftain adieu, I expect I will shed a few tears. But if they succeed in buying some more delegations, as they did in Michigan day before yesterday, as I am told; if the money from the New York boodlers can secure enough delegates at Chicago to say we must have what they call "sound money" and indorse Grover Cleveland's Administration and put that in the platform, then I will take my hat and bid the Senator from New York and all the Democrats like him a long farewell.

As to where I will go I do not know. I can not go to Populism, for Populism is simply an explosion of wrath and anger on the part of disgusted Democrats and disgusted Republicans at the rottenness and corruption and cowardice and treachery of both parties. They have had a bad chance. They threw out a platform that did not appeal to the business interests of the country, did not appeal to American common sense, and did not catch anything much except to carry a few States.

The Populists see their errors now. They are recognizing that they tried too much and simply spattered themselves on the wall. The Southern Democrats, those of us who have not been debauched or who do not allow our greed to control our principles, will line up somewhere, but we will not be at Chicago under a gold standard. If there are any traitors in the South who go there and profess to represent the Southern people and undertake to indorse Grover Cleveland I say they are liars before they start, for their States will not indorse them and they will not get any votes. If we do not get a recognition of silver and return to genuine Democracy at Chicago, then the Democratic party is dead and gone forever. A new party will spring into existence. I am prophesying now. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] shall not monopolize the business of making the prophecies. A new party will spring into existence and it will in a short time be able to beat you and your machine. A great army disorganized, without generals, can not marshal itself like a compact and organized and skilled body. But so help me God, if we can not beat you this time we will serve notice on you that under some banner that will have on it America for Americans, and to hell with Britain and her Tories—we will serve notice on you if we do not beat you in 1896 that we will interest you in 1900.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I do not know that the remarkable performance which we have just witnessed calls for any special notice or reply upon my part. Had the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] not gone out of his way to speak of some suggestions which I had the honor of making the other day, I would not have deemed that anything he has said here to-day called for any particular reply. Possibly it would be wiser for those who differ with him to have given the Senate and the country the spectacle which we witnessed the last time he edified the Senate of no Senator of either party thereafter alluding to anything he had said.

Possibly, sir, I err to-day in noticing some of the suggestions which he has made. His remarks have not been wholly addressed to the naval appropriation bill. He has discussed the question of parties, the question of finances, the bond issue, the bond investigation, not yet before the Senate. He prophesied about the future, and wound up finally by forming a new party all by himself in South Carolina. With much that he has said I have no concern. To much of his criticism of the present Administration I do not propose to reply.

I have, sir, as the Senate knows and the country knows, little in common with the present Administration, at least so far as being consulted in its policies or shaping its actions is concerned. I have not been the recipient of its patronage or its favors. I am under no obligations to it. I have many times been under its displeasure. I therefore do not propose to notice except very briefly some of the gratuitous, uncalled-for, undignified remarks pertaining to that Administration of my friend from South Carolina, who says he "loves" me.

The other day when the bond resolution was properly before the Senate I addressed the Senate upon the legal question which had been raised as to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds for the purpose of procuring gold with which to replenish what is called the gold reserve. It was an old question, it is true. The power was undoubted. It has been scarcely denied in all the old debates we have had in this Chamber for the last ten or fifteen years. Yet it has been denied in recent debates by a few Senators whom I facetiously term "farmers" because they saw fit to call themselves such. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] said he was a farmer; the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] abdicated his position as a lawyer and said he was a farmer, and then came last but not least the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and he said he was a farmer, and all of them united in giving their combined wisdom, legal wisdom, upon the question, concurring and concluding that Secretary Carlisle had no authority to issue bonds. It was against that contention that I spoke. I did not call the Senator from South Carolina a Populist. He has not accurately quoted from my remarks or properly construed them. I wonder a little, however, at his virtuous indignation, because if what he said to-day does not carry him right on the straight road that leads to Populism it must be to some worse place.

The Senator seems to feel indignant that I should have placed him in the honorable company of the few Populists who are in this Chamber; and honorable men they are, from whom I differ in opinion upon many public questions of the day, but who are, nevertheless, honorable men, serving their party as their judgment seems best. After the expressions of the Senator from South Carolina, to-day I was not very far out of the way, even if I had gone to the extent that he says I did, in putting him in the Populist list, because he himself says that while he may not land with the Populists after the Chicago convention, he has no idea where he is going to land.

Mr. President, it is not necessary that I should defend the Populists from the indirect, covert, insidious attack of the Senator from South Carolina, who does not want to be placed in that category. They have views which even he can not stand. He used a figure of speech that they have "bespattered" the walls with something; I do not know what; he did not tell; but he said that they "bespattered" the walls with something, and he looked right straight at the Populists. I do not know what he meant exactly. But he says he can not join them. Even he rebels against alliance with them. He did not say he would join the cohorts of the abominable Wall street. No; he does not say that; but in one part of his speech he served notice upon us distinctly that he was not going to the Populists.

Now, I will hold my good friend from South Carolina to that promise. I am not going to prophesy in these troublesome political times what may occur in the next six months. Sir, no one can tell; things are changing rapidly day by day. The present political campaign is unprecedented in both parties. There are some Senators on the other side of the Chamber who recognize that fact as well as I do.

Mr. President, there has been a cyclone sweeping through the country in the Republican circles that all their leading statesmen pretty nearly combined have been unable to check. A nomination is likely to occur, strengthened by the events of the last few days, which six months ago no one could foretell. Changes are likely to occur rapidly. Events are likely to occur in the Democratic party which may change the present situation. I therefore decline to make predictions. But, sir, I say to the Senator from South Carolina if he has that love for Jefferson and for Jackson that he professes, and if he really and in fact still represents his people, I think and I hope that he will have no occasion to leave the old party which he has served so well in the past.

Mr. President, I do not propose at this time to discuss the bond question, because I hope at some time in the future—in the "sweet by and by"—we shall have the bond resolution up, and then I can express my views fully upon the great question involved, the tremendous question, the momentous question, as to whether we shall have a Senatorial investigation of the issue of the bonds of the Government during the present Administration. There are Senators around this circle, including the Senator from South Carolina, who are looking to that great hour when it shall arrive. That is the thing they are hoping for, praying for. The present Administration is then to be condemned, to be damned. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] the other day, it is true, withdrew and amended his resolution, taking out of it the only reasons that had really been alleged for the investigation, namely, that there were some charges of irregularity and misconduct, and so on. But he withdrew all those, and thus deprived the resolution of any vigor or any force. But nevertheless, Mr. President, when we reach that resolution and Senators see fit to express themselves on the resolution rather than on the pending naval appropriation bill, I shall then continue my few brief remarks upon that subject and express myself again upon the points involved.

The Senator from South Carolina has alluded to me as one who had represented New York, but he doubted whether I could speak for it to-day. There is considerable truth in that statement, I regret to say. New York continued for eight or nine years in the Democratic column. I do not propose at this time to speak of what took it out. Sir, the regular Democracy of New York can not wholly be charged with the responsibility of that.

I recollect that in 1892, and I will be pardoned for speaking of it now, State after State in the South instructed their delegates for free silver and Grover Cleveland. They have not gotten free silver, but they got Mr. Cleveland. [Laughter.] They nominated Mr. Cleveland over the heads of the regular Democracy of New York, who protested against it. After the nomination was made, loyal Democrats as they are, they went back and supported the ticket, and I joined them in giving New York again to the Democratic cause.

Sir, no matter what may be in store for us in the next campaign, come victory or defeat, come sunshine or shadow, come weal or woe, there is where I will be found again in behalf of whoever may be the Democratic candidate and whatever may be the national Democratic platform in the campaign. I do not expect to have my Democracy strained in so doing. I have confidence in the wisdom of the Democratic masses and the Democratic party.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The reason (if the reason should exist at the time the convention meets) why there will be a split in the party such as occurred in 1860 will be because States which can not give us an electoral vote, which are as hopelessly Republican, as Pennsylvania, seek to come to us and give us poison under the name of Democracy. They have changed the tenets of the party, they have changed its principles, they have deserted all those grand principles which Jefferson and Jackson gave us. They give us Cleveland and his rottenness, and we will not have such Democracy.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I will come to Jefferson and Jackson pretty soon. I was speaking of what took place in 1892. I was forecasting a little what might possibly occur in 1896.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator just recall to his memory that South Carolina and New York were the leaders in the fight to try to keep Mr. Cleveland from being nominated, and we went back home and gave him the largest vote of any State in the South?

Mr. HILL. I have not reflected upon the Democracy of South Carolina. I owe that State much. When under much misrepresentation and other influences other States yielded and forced upon New York a candidate against which its regular Democracy protested, I acknowledged the fact, and shall always feel grateful that South Carolina joined with the regular Democracy of New York and maintained its rights and dignity and prerogatives.

But, Mr. President, having stood together before, there is no occasion for any departure or division now. Neither shall I be led into any attack upon the Democracy of those States which, perchance, can not give an electoral vote for the Democratic candidate. While Pennsylvania can not give probably a single Democratic electoral vote, she may not in that respect be unlike some of the other States in this coming campaign, but nevertheless there are in that State several hundred thousand loyal, true Democrats who have maintained the cause of tariff reform against great obstacles, against powerful influences, corporate and otherwise, and are still ready to fight for the old Democratic cause upon that and other issues. I say, sir, for one, that while I have not had and did not have anything in common with that State in 1892 and have little in common now with its organized Democracy, I recognize their right to come to the national convention and express their choice and declare their principles. What folly it would be for our Republican friends to read out of the party States like Virginia, Alabama, Texas, and other Southern States where probably, with but few exceptions, they can not get a single Republican electoral vote.

Sir, our party, as I have already said, is, or ought to be, a national party. It must have representatives from each and every State; and those States, wherein there live as true Democrats as live anywhere, States which are less fortunate in condition and situation than others where the Democratic vote is larger, are not to be repelled; they are not to be cast aside; their views are to be consulted as well as the views of those States which can cast their electoral votes for the Democratic candidates. I protest against the effort to make the Democratic party a sectional party, composed only of States where victories are absolutely certain.

As I said a few moments ago, I do not wish to discuss the bond question proper, nor the silver question at this time. I was rather amused, though, to hear the Senator from South Carolina seek to place certain leading Democrats of this country in a position of entire harmony with the views of the distinguished gentleman who in part represents Ohio upon this floor. Mr. President, I heard the words of praise from the lips of the Senator from Ohio the other day. Because a man who has been a Republican all his life, who has given honor and credit to the party that has honored him, who has been its chief financial adviser through perilous times in our history, and to his great and everlasting credit and renown, when he chooses to say that he thinks a Democratic President and a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury have performed their full duty with regard to this whole question of finance so far as bond issues are concerned, I am not to be frightened away from the Administration or from the Democratic party on account of it. I welcome such terms of approval from distinguished Republicans. If our policy has been right in that respect, I am willing they should commend it.

I do not propose to repeat what I said the other day, and what I think I established, that under laws which the President and the Secretary of the Treasury inherited, laws for which they were not responsible, they have endeavored to administer the affairs of this Government during the present financial crisis fairly and for the best interests of the country. There were grave difficulties to encounter.

The mere fact that upon certain features of the financial question there may be harmony of views between two of the great parties is nothing to the discredit of either of them. Both the political parties are in favor of the rights of this country as against foreign aggression. Are we to run because every Republican vote in this House and in the other House was given in favor of the measure recommended by President Cleveland for the maintenance of the honor of this country on the Venezuelan question? Shall we run simply because it is said that the two parties are agreed upon the great questions of foreign affairs? I differ from many of the views expressed by the Senator from Ohio, as he well knows; but when he said that in the emergency which has existed during the past year or so the President and the Secretary of the Treasury had performed their duty honestly and faithfully, I say he was right. There was no middle ground; there was no other course to take. On the other side there was repudiation, it is true; there was discrediting the currency of our country, it is true; there was what the Senator from South Carolina calls "desperation," but the course which the President and the Secretary of the Treasury marked out was the true, the correct, and the right path so far as the simple question of the issue of the bonds was concerned.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. With Congress in session and the duty imposed upon it under the Constitution to provide the ways and means for running the Government, do you think it the duty of the Executive to take the law into his own hands, to ignore the representatives of the people because they will not let him have his own way, and just go forward anyhow to provide ways and means of his own?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I do not live in a State which has ever approved of taking the law into its own hands. The President of the United States sent a message to Congress in which he detailed the whole financial situation. He asked for legislation to relieve the condition of the country. Congress refused to act. Did the Senator from South Carolina expect that we were to provide additional revenue when the Senate was deadlocked and the two Houses could not agree? Senators may rise in their places and say majestically and loftily that when Congress is in session the President ought not to take the law into his own hands; that it is the duty of Congress to provide some ways and means to support the Government; but if Congress refused to do it, and when under a law passed in 1878 it was provided that the greenbacks must be reissued, and there was in existence the law of 1875, which provides that when they are presented they shall be redeemed, the President and the Secretary of the Treasury properly proceeded to discharge that duty.

Mr. STEWART. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. HILL. I draw the line on the Senator from Nevada. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. You may draw the line on me, but I ask the question, if the failure of Congress to make provision for revenue authorizes the Executive to raise revenue?

Mr. HILL. I expect to discuss this subject with my good friend from Nevada when we reach the bond question. Do not get impatient.

Mr. STEWART. You dare not enter the discussion with me on the proposition that the failure of Congress to provide revenue transfers the power to the President, as you intimated in your argument.

Mr. HILL. Nobody has said any such thing.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator withdraw that remark? Did the Senator not say that if the President called upon Congress to provide revenue and Congress had not done it, the President did right in going ahead and selling bonds?

Mr. HILL. Not for the purpose of supplying revenue.

Mr. STEWART. Ah!

Mr. HILL. I said the other day, and I repeat now, that for the purpose of supplying gold with which to redeem the greenbacks, the President had a perfect right to sell bonds, and then, when the greenbacks were thus redeemed and placed in the Treasury, he had a right to use the greenbacks. There are not two sides to the question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Were not the funds for which the bonds were sold somewhat in the nature of a trust? Would you not think if a banker had your money put into his bank as a friend, or who held it in a fiduciary capacity and misused it, that he had stolen it? And when the President takes a fund, which has been replenished by the issue of bonds, and when the law says no bonds shall be issued except to redeem the greenbacks, and when he takes that fund and spends it, and has spent $150,000,000 of it, or something like that, does the Senator still say he was justified? Ah, you lawyers can split hairs, but you can not get that into the head of a farmer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I should despair, after the exhibition of my friend here, of getting anything of that nature into his head. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Another thing, if you will allow me.

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to read you what the President himself said. This is from Grover Cleveland's message of December 4, 1893:

I desire also to earnestly suggest the wisdom of amending the existing statutes in regard to the issuance of Government bonds. The authority now vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds is not as clear as it should be.

There he acknowledges that there is grave doubt in his mind as to whether or not he had a right to issue bonds; yet when he wanted to bolster up his friends and get a chance to issue more bonds, of course he took it.

Mr. HILL. The act of 1875 is clear enough. It might be clearer. It is not exactly clear that my friend from South Carolina is going to land in the Populist party, but still it may be clear enough, not wholly clear.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before I land in the Populist party you will land in the Republican party if you keep on. You are going that way as fast as you can. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I tell my friend that if he does not go to the Populist party until I go to the Republican party he will never get there. [Laughter.] Mr. President, if the Senate is to take the protestation of both my friend from South Carolina and myself, you could not kick either of us out of the Democratic party. But he seems to take delight in assailing the Senator from Ohio; and simply because some one may be disposed to agree with some of the views of that Senator he therefore says that there is a departure from Democratic principles.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from New York allow the Senator from Ohio to defend himself and not give him a certificate of Democracy?

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Ohio is entirely competent to defend himself, but he need not defend himself, for I do not give him a certificate of Democracy.

My friend from South Carolina said a few moments ago that he wanted, in addition to gold and silver, a paper currency; that he was opposed to the retirement of the greenbacks.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am. I want about a billion of them.

Mr. HILL. About a billion? What is the use of making it so small a sum as that? Why not make it several billions while you are about it?

Mr. TILLMAN. Just wait a minute.

Mr. HILL. Give me a little chance. [Laughter.] I want to demonstrate how you and JOHN SHERMAN stand exactly on the same platform on the greenback question. I read from the speech to which you refer, the speech of January 3, 1896, of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, when he spoke about the revenues, finances, etc. He then referred to the greenback currency. He is just as strong an admirer of that blood-stained greenback as you are. He may not want over $1,000,000 of them, but still he stands upon the greenback question just the same as you do. What does he say? As one of the reasons why he protests against the retirement of the greenback currency, and a retirement which Mr. Cleveland urges, a retirement which Mr. Secretary Carlisle urges, what does he say?

Another reason, founded upon belief—

He is stating why the greenbacks should not be retired—is that the national banking system could not long endure if the United States notes were withdrawn.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is just the difference between the Senator from Ohio and myself. I want the national-bank system destroyed utterly. I wish to pull it up root and branch.

Mr. HILL. Yet you join hands, and you said a few moments ago you prided yourself upon the fact that you are a hard-money Democrat, you prided yourself that you want the greenbacks kept in circulation, and the Senator from Ohio says the principal reason they should be kept in circulation is because, if you destroy them or retire them, you destroy the national-bank system. Now, my friend, you can fight it out with the Senator from Ohio as to which of you is the better Democrat or which is the better Republican.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is no fight in it at all. We are just as far apart as the poles on the question of the greenbacks. The policy of the Senator from Ohio is to keep the greenbacks in the Treasury in case there is a raid, to keep from issuing bonds; in other words, he would contract the currency for the purpose of keeping the greenbacks there; and Mr. Cleveland wants to pay them off and burn them and issue bonds instead. Therefore, the Senator from Ohio is a better Democrat than Mr. Cleveland, and, I believe, a better Democrat than you are. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. My friend from South Carolina is now defending, as I understand him, the Democracy of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. I am, as against you.

Mr. HILL. There is where I wanted to get you. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I say the Democratic party never was a greenback party. Go back to the record when the greenbacks were issued, and you will find that they were issued against nearly the whole Democratic vote.

Mr. TILLMAN. You go back to Jackson's veto message and you will find that he said the Government should retain the function of making money in its own hands, that nobody should make its notes; that if anybody made them, let the Government make them; and that is what I want.

Mr. HILL. Jackson never recommended in any public paper of his or in any document or speech the issuing of notes of this character—never.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will please suspend for one moment. It is an opportune time for the Chair to call the attention of Senators to Rule XIX:

No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the presiding officer.

Good order and decorum in the Senate absolutely require a strict observance of that rule.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I apologize for having overstepped the rule. I have seen it done here a thousand times since I have been in the body; but, however, as you call it on me, I will try to obey it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not undertaking to call attention particularly to the Senator from South Carolina, but to-day scores of times other Senators as well have without any authority interrupted the speaker when he was debating.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury in recommending the retirement of greenbacks were acting strictly in accordance with Democratic principles, and Democrats who antagonize that policy are antagonizing Democratic principles. A man can not be a paper-money man and a hard-money man at the same time.

Mr. TILLMAN. How can he be a sound-money man and a national-bank man at the same time? [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. No Democrat has proposed the continuance of national banks. The Democratic party, sir, has never placed itself upon any such distinct ground. Such banks have been tolerated or accepted only until something better could be provided as a currency. Besides, national-bank notes are not legal tender—are not money. But the ground upon which greenbacks are kept in circulation is for the very purpose of keeping up the national-bank system, as Mr. SHERMAN claims, and my friend from South Carolina and those who act with him are playing into the hands of those who desire the continuance of the national banks. It is useless for my friend to attempt to escape the responsibility of the admission which he has made. What is the admission? That he favors a scheme for more greenbacks. This is the grand, momentous, gigantic scheme of finance that he is proposing—issuing a billion or perhaps several billions of greenbacks.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am satisfied with one.

Mr. HILL. Very likely. I do not want any. The Senator ought to be able to see, and those who follow him in his extreme views upon this question ought to be able to see, that they are playing right into the hands of the national banks. The retirement of the greenbacks, as recommended by Secretary Carlisle and the President, would create a necessity for more hard money. The Senator seems to have forgotten that the President in his last message made the suggestion that if the greenbacks could thus be retired there would arise, probably, the necessity to supply the vacuum thus created by the issuing of more silver money; and yet, Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina, and those who agree with him, stand stubbornlike upon the position, not for hard money, but stand upon the position of more money, paper money. And these so-called, misnamed hard-money Democrats, who pride themselves on the principles of Jefferson and Jackson, stand here and ask for a billion more of paper currency. Out upon such Democracy! That is not true South Carolina Democracy; it is not New York Democracy.

I am not going to enter into any argument in favor of cheap products; I am not going to harrow up the feelings of those who listen to me because of the fact that our laboring men are enabled to get the food upon which they live cheaply at the expense of the agriculturists. Of course, Mr. President, the interests of the farmer and of the mechanic are somewhat diverse—more or less so—but the law of supply and demand must regulate this matter. We should not legislate upon the financial question either to put prices up or to put prices down. We should legislate according to certain fixed principles of finance, irrespective of the question whether it puts the prices of the products of the farmer up or down.

Mr. President, considerable has been said by the Senator from South Carolina upon the principles of Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln. One of the principles enunciated by Mr. Jefferson in his first inaugural address was that the will of the majority should be observed. Jackson followed that same precept. In the approaching Democratic convention, which the Senator from South Carolina has announced in advance that he is to attend—and he does not even say by the leave of the Democracy of South Carolina, but he is going to attend it anyhow—when he goes there I suppose he will enter that convention with the true spirit of a South Carolina Democrat and agree to abide by the will of the majority of that convention both in its declaration of principles and in its nomination of candidates. If he goes there, Mr. President, with any other idea he ought not to be admitted, and he will not expect to be admitted.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I just want to call the Senator's attention to this fact, that parties are voluntary associations of men who think alike, or who think that they think alike, and who come together for the purpose of enacting into law, by getting control of the Government, the principles and policies which they advocate. The Democratic party has split once before on questions of policy and principle, and it seems inevitable to me that it is bound to split again, because the rule of the majority has not governed in the past. Take the House of Representatives here in 1893. A majority did not govern there because the minority of gold bugs from the Northeastern States, oblivious of the platform upon which they had been elected, refused to go into caucus and be bound by the will of the majority. Take the Kentucky legislature. The men who were elected there as Democrats have refused to ratify the action of the caucus and to vote for the caucus nominee, thereby refusing to obey the majority rule. And now you ask us to take your gold-bug policy and call it Democracy because you say a majority will give it to us. I say we will not have it, and that the Southern Democrats and the Western Democrats are going there with one idea and with one policy; and if we can not get it, then we will bid you good-by, or tell you to get out yourselves if we are in the majority. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, neither the Democracy of any Northern State nor the Democracy of the South are going to the convention with simply one idea. I recall the words of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] in a speech delivered here in December last. When he was taunted about the fact that some flippant man had said he was untrue to silver, the old veteran Democrat from Tennessee said, "Sir, I belong to a party that has more than one idea." So, sir, the Democrats of the South and of the West will go to that convention with more than one idea; they will go to that convention to compare views; they will go to consult and to reason together; they will go there with a determination to avoid the foolishness which characterized our party in 1860, when I do not think the party split upon any very great principle. That was unwise action, and it would be unwise now for that party, which has done so much in the history of this country in the past, to quarrel, to split, to divide, over the details of financial legislation.

There is more, sir, in the Democratic party than simply the silver question. There is the great question which overshadows all others, the great question of paternalism; there is the great question of the centralization of power, against which we of the North and of the South have stood together and protested during all the history of this Republic; there is the great question of the fundamental principle upon which taxation shall be imposed, namely, for public rather than for private purposes; there is the great question of the personal liberty of the citizen, which the Democratic party has always maintained. No, sir; I resent the insinuation that either the South or the North—I observe that my friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is whispering some Democratic ideas, I suppose, to my good friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and I tell him not to get his Democratic principles from the Republican-Populist of Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Will you allow me?

Mr. HILL. Not now.

Mr. STEWART. Will you not allow me to tell you what I was saying?

Mr. HILL. Later. I object to the combination, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I think the Senator from New York owes it to the Senator from Nevada to hear him.

Mr. HILL. I do not owe him anything.

Mr. TILLMAN. You owe it to me, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of Senators to the rule which requires them first to address the Chair.

Mr. HILL. The Senator can explain afterwards, when we come to the bond question. [Laughter.] I want to hear him on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York declines to yield.

Mr. HILL. Yes; for the present.

Mr. STEWART. It is well for the Senator that he does. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I will hear the Senator if he wishes.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator will?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HILL. With great pleasure.

Mr. STEWART. I said, and I repeat it—

Mr. HILL. Do not repeat it.

Mr. STEWART. I said that the argument of the Senator from New York, when he speaks of the Democracy being opposed to the concentration of power, seems a little out of place when we have the object lesson of the Executive of the nation concentrating in himself the entire power of legislation, of controlling both Houses of Congress, of disposing of the entire patronage of the Government to rule Congress. Never since this Government began has there been so much danger of concentration of power as is exercised this day and this hour by the Executive. Furthermore, the reason why it comes with bad grace from the Senator from New York to make such a statement is that on every occasion, in season and out of season, he stands by every usurpation of power that emanates from the White House. Nothing can be done there but what he will indorse, even to the extent of raising revenue without authority of law—raising revenue without consulting the two Houses of Congress. Raising revenue is the very act for which Charles I lost his head. [Laughter.] There is concentration of power. He says, "We raise this revenue for another purpose." The Administration did it for another purpose. That is, they call it for some other purpose, but they raise revenue by selling bonds without authority of law when the Government to-day has a surplus in the Treasury—

Mr. HILL. Allow me.

Mr. STEWART. When the Government has a surplus in the Treasury of $273,000,000 by the exercise of arbitrary power—

Mr. ALLEN. Without any power.

Mr. STEWART. Without any power. And then the Senator speaks of being opposed to the concentration of the Government in the hands of the Executive and to consolidation. Charles the First consolidated the English Government and lost his head. Grover Cleveland consolidated the American Government and receives the eulogy of the Democracy.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator from Nevada want us to understand that he whispered all that to the Senator from South Carolina? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. I want the Senator to understand I whispered the substance when I said "speak of consolidated power," when the Senator was defending every act of usurpation whereby the President is raising revenue without authority of law and in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me say just one word.

Mr. HILL. I wish to answer the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to have the Senator answer both of us at the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to impress upon the Senator the very sorrowful acknowledgment, if he will make it truthfully, that so far as the concentration of power is concerned this President of ours is the Democratic party, and that the Senator himself has no more voice and never had in New York in distributing patronage or doing any other thing that a Senator usually does since this man has been in office than some bootblack on the street.

Mr. HILL. Neither, sir, is our party a party of a single idea. Neither is all of Democracy the distribution of patronage. I did not intend to speak of that question. If the Senator thinks I have any grievance of which I publicly complain of the President of the United States or this Administration he is mistaken.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not say the Senator had.

Mr. HILL. I do not say that the President or the Administration in all respects have treated my distinguished colleague or myself as Democratic Senators possibly ought to have been treated, but I make no public complaint of it. I care nothing about it. I think possibly that so far as we personally are concerned it is better that we have not had to do with the matter of patronage. I care nothing about it. If all there is of Democracy is the distribution of petty patronage that falls from the Administration, then, sir, I care nothing about being a Democrat. We kept up the Democratic party in New York during the whole four years of Mr. Harrison's Administration, and we had nothing whatever of patronage. In the previous Administration of Mr. Cleveland we kept up the Democratic party during our State administration with little or no aid. Patronage does not make a party; it is usually the curse of a party.

Mr. President, having said that, I was about to proceed to speak of the fact that the Democratic party of every State in the Union would send their representatives to Chicago in the usual way when I was interrupted by my friend the Senator from South Carolina. We will not imitate the unwise example of our fathers, who quarreled over immaterial things and split the party, brought on a war, and kept our party out of power for nearly thirty years. No, sir; those of you who are expecting such a feast will be disappointed. We appeal from you in such a view to the masses of the party, who care little for leaders, but who think more of the party and its principles and its policies. There must be conciliation; there must be mutual agreements. Men can differ upon the details of policies of the Democratic party, and such of you as think that the party will die this year are mistaken.

I do not pretend to be a prophet or the son of a prophet. I am unable to say upon what exact lines our platform will be based as to the financial question. It is not for me to say. You have a right in your State conventions to frame your platforms without help from the outside. In 1892, if you will permit me to allude to a personal matter, New York had its candidate. Its convention met early, only a week or two or three weeks earlier than usual, but it was said that we were attempting to influence the Democracy of other States. A clamor was raised in regard to it. It is true that primaries had been held in Pennsylvania and adjoining States at that time, but a great furore and a great clamor were raised, and much criticism of the Democracy of New York was indulged in because it was said that the New York Democracy was attempting improperly to influence the Democracy of the rest of the country. Although it is said that the Democracy of New York desire to impress their financial views upon the Democracy of the rest of the country, I call attention to the fact that the same loyal organization which controlled the party in 1892 controls it now. It will be one of the last States to hold its State convention.

We are not seeking to impress our views upon our brother Democrats of other States improperly or prematurely. Probably, and I do not speak authoritatively, it will be one of the last conventions held. You are holding your conventions in the South and West in your own good time. You are passing your platforms and declaring your principles, as you have a right to do, but you have no right to say, when you come with your platform to the national convention, that the national convention shall not cross a "t" or dot an "i"; that it shall not be changed in any essential particular. What kind of a party can you keep up with that discipline which forbids and prevents conciliation and mutual concessions? What kind of an organization can you have with that spirit being fomented throughout the country by good loyal Democrats, or those who have been such in the past? Our party—and I am speaking now altogether to this side of the circle—should arouse themselves. There is, and we might as well admit it, an honest difference of opinion upon the currency question. Speaking for myself, personally, I have never assailed a man who has differed with me upon that question. I have used no improper words. I have indulged in no words of abuse. I have avoided every offensive epithet possible in speaking on the question.

The financial question is a great one, about which honest men, Republicans and Democrats, may well differ. Sir, it is, however, like all other great questions, one as to which there should be a harmonization of views. It is not for anyone to fix the precise lines upon which it shall be done. I have confidence in that party in which I was born. I inherited my Democracy from my father and my grandfather, and I am willing to live in that party still. I am willing to trust its great advisers when they shall meet in council, and I am willing to abide by the result. All other Democrats should do the same. We will express our views, which may differ with yours. You represent yours. We come to the great council at Chicago, and there, if wise counsels shall prevail, we will adopt a platform, and the moment the convention adjourns every loyal Democrat will swing into line. I hope that my friend the Senator from South Carolina and I will not part company at the doors of the convention. I do not even know that I shall be there as a delegate to represent in part the Democracy of my State. I can not speak as affirmatively upon that question as the Senator from South Carolina speaks of his State. I may be so honored and I may not be; but I will go there with no threat; I will go there with no menace; I will go there expecting to have my say, to speak my sentiments, and to abide by the result of the convention when it shall be ended.

I am not going to say that the great State of South Carolina will pursue a different course. I do not believe that the party which so loyally followed Jefferson and Jackson and Calhoun will now take itself out of the Democratic column. Of course the world is wide. Men have a right to change their political relations if they desire to do so. But I think no true Democrat will go to that convention uttering the sentiments of my friend, the Senator from South Carolina, with a sort of threat that their particular views are to be sustained or else they will part company with their political associates.

The Senator has alluded to some party affairs. When we are washing the Democratic linen we may as well have it out. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] alluded to my defense of the Administration and its policies, as he said, I think, upon any and every question. The Senator drew upon his imagination. I have said but little upon the policies of the present Administration. Upon the financial policy, so far as the Administration was attacked for the issue of bonds, I believed it my duty to defend the Administration, regardless of patronage, regardless of the fact that I have no special relations with the Administration and have had no consultation with any of its members. I have endeavored so far as I could to mark out a policy which would strengthen and not divide the party. That is all. I am not pledged either to the head of the Administration or to any member of it who may be a candidate for public position.

The Secretary of the Treasury is concededly an able man; I believe he is a thoroughly honest and competent man. He is a man of great ability, who has been in public life a great many years, one of the men who have reflected honor upon the section of the country they have represented, and while in reference to his financial policy I have seen fit to sustain him, in part, I will say this much, and I say it freely, that in reference to the contest before the Kentucky legislature, I think the Secretary of the Treasury made a mistake. A Senator near me says it was a grievous mistake. I say so. I said so to my brother Senators around the Senate. I did not take occasion to proclaim it publicly. While I differ with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] upon the financial question, yet he was the nominee of his party caucus, fairly, duly, and regularly nominated, and whatever his views were upon the details of financial legislation, he had served the party during a long career of nearly thirty years at home, in the other House, and in this body. He had been true to Democratic principles in the main. When he went back to his people, an old and faithful public servant, and asked that he should receive again the nomination of his party, submitted to the majority of the Democrats of the legislature, and was fairly and duly nominated, I say he deserved the support of Secretary Carlisle and of every follower of the present Administration.

I say this because that is the only way to keep up a party, to support the regular nominee. While I differ with the distinguished Senator from Kentucky upon this financial question, there is more in Democracy than the mere question of finance. No true, faithful Democrat, no matter in what State of this Union he may be, is to be proscribed because of his financial views, especially upon details.

Mr. ALLEN. They are being proscribed.

Mr. HILL. My friend the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] need not become the guardian of the Democratic party. We can take care of our own troubles and our own squabbles. Sir, what did your Populists in the legislature of Kentucky do? They took a position first upon one side in the Kentucky legislature and then on the other side, just as you do here, trying to stir up strife, peddling your votes upon one side or the other for a little mess of patronage. You have no right to take any hand in a suggestion that the Democracy did wrong to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] in the contest in Kentucky. If your men had been so favorable to free silver as you pretend to be, at one juncture they could have elected Mr. BLACKBURN as Senator from Kentucky. I do not blame my friend the Senator from Nebraska, however. He is the prospective candidate of the Populist party for President, unless the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] gets over pretty soon and crowds him off his platform. Of course the Senator from Nebraska wants to stir up all the trouble he can. He has more sympathy—

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HILL. With great pleasure. I knew the Senator would be in the fight before we got through.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to correct the Senator from New York, and I hope that before he concludes his remarks he will modify the statement, because I know he does not mean it. While the two Populists in the Kentucky legislature were under no greater obligation to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] than they were to the member of any party to which they did not belong, they, in consequence of being silver men, gave him their votes at a time when, if he had received the full Democratic strength, he would have been elected.

Let me correct the Senator also as to another matter, because I know he does not mean what he said. I call his attention to it and give him an opportunity to correct himself. The Senator from New York certainly does not mean that the Populists in this Chamber have peddled their votes to anybody.

Mr. HILL. As my friend—

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator mean that?

Mr. HILL. As my friend said once, when he stated that a Senator on the other side lied, metaphorically speaking—

Mr. ALLEN. Oh!

Mr. HILL. So I say, metaphorically speaking.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me to say a word, I will subside. It has got to be a funny thing, a common thing, a smart thing for some one who is ignorant of the facts, because he wants to say something at the expense of a person or a party that he thinks is incapable of caring for his or its rights, to lay all the isms and things of that kind to a particular party or person. It has become so in the galleries in reference to a Senator who has spoken. It certainly is a disgraceful thing. But it has become popular in this Chamber to speak of the Populist party peddling its votes and dickered between the two old parties.

I wish to say to the Senator from New York, to the Senate, and to the country that there have never been any negotiations, directly or indirectly, between the Populist party in this Chamber and the Republican or the Democratic party upon the subject of the reorganization of the Senate or upon the subject of patronage—not a particle more than there has been between the Populists and the Czar of Russia. I feel confident that when the Senator from New York understands this he will not think it is very witty or wise or a thing to be laughed at or a charge to be made with impunity that the Populist party has dickered and peddled its votes.

Mr. HILL. That depends upon which way you look at it. I recollect—my recollection is fairly good in regard to political matters—that all at once the Democracy was surprised that our Republican friends, although they had not, as they said, a majority in this body, were going to take possession of the committees and, in plain words, run the Senate. It came to us as a matter of some surprise. We supposed they would think it wiser to wait until they were exactly certain that they had the requisite number of ironclad Republicans. We called the roll, and our friends on the other side, the Populist Senators, remained silent in their seats and allowed the Republicans to take the responsibility of organizing all the committees of the Senate, thereby enabling them largely to shape and control legislation. That may have merely happened so.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from New York permit me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. HILL. Let me get through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I think he will be satisfied.

Let it be understood, and let the Senator from New York understand, if he never has understood before, that the Populist party in this Chamber is not under the slightest obligation to the Democratic party or to the Republican party. There is no kinship existing between the Populist party and either party. We are here to accomplish what we desire to accomplish. I stated at the time and I repeat that it was the deliberate judgment of our caucus—there are not many of us, but we have a caucus occasionally—that the Republican party being in power in the House should be in power here and be held responsible for the legislation of this Congress, the Democratic party having failed to do anything. I call upon the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] now to bear testimony to the fact that a week or more before the reorganization I voluntarily said to him, as the leader of his party, that we would not vote and would not help the Democratic party retain the organization. Is not that true?

Mr. GORMAN. That is unquestionably true. I will make it broader than that and state that I have never known at any time since the Senator from Nebraska has been a member of this body that he has sought to make any arrangement or has had any arrangement suggested to him in relation to this matter.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, Mr. President, one more thing, and I will yield to the Senator from New York and not interrupt him any more. That was true. We called attention to the fact, and I call the attention of the Senator from New York and the country to it, that if the Democratic party had pursued the same policy we pursued, namely, not to have voted, to have refrained from voting on that occasion, they had it in their power to defeat the reorganization, because the Republican party did not have a majority, and therefore did not have a quorum. But they saw fit to vote, and they lost the organization.

Mr. HILL. I do not think, Mr. President, that the last statement is borne out by the facts. I do not see how the Democrats could have defeated the Republicans from organizing the Senate, I mean taking the committees, if our friends on the other side had remained quiet.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Democrats had remained quiet—

Mr. HILL. That is because we were paired.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, if the Democrats had remained in their seats and not voted, as the Populists remained in their seats and refused to vote, then the Republicans did not have a quorum in the Senate and they could not have disturbed you in the committeeships. The responsibility is with your party, not with mine.

Mr. HILL. The difference is this simply: You were not paired with anybody.

Mr. ALLEN. And we would not be.

Mr. HILL. No Democrat who was not paired declined to vote, and the mere fact that on that one vote there would not have been a quorum, simply on account of pairs, amounts to nothing.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, no, if the Senator will permit me; not that.

Mr. HILL. What is the point, then?

Mr. ALLEN. Although every Republican had voted, it takes 45 to constitute a quorum here. The Republicans have 44. It requires a majority to constitute a quorum in the Senate. If every Republican had voted, and if the Democrats had joined the Populists and remained silent, that fact alone would have defeated reorganization.

Mr. HILL. There are various ways of defeating measures as well as a reorganization. You can leave the Chamber and not come in. That is a breach of the rules. You can come in and remain quiet and not say anything when your name is called. That is another breach of the rules. You are obliged to vote; and Democrats, in accordance with the rules, voted. Our Populist friends remained silent and allowed the Republicans to take control. They knew the responsibility incurred. That is all I care to say in regard to that question.

Mr. ALLEN. That part is true.

Mr. HILL. That part of it is true. So is the other statement. I referred to the fact the other day, and I heard my friend from Nebraska say his party was founded upon principle. It complains of the rottenness, the corruption, the misdeeds of the Democratic party and of the Republican party. The other day I heard my friend from Nebraska get up and offer to vote for the Republican tariff bill which had been denounced in this Chamber, provided a provision in reference to silver should be placed thereon. He offered to vote to put a tariff upon wool that the Senator had voted before to take off. He offered to vote against every principle involved in the Wilson bill. I speak of the word "peddle" because he stood right here in his place and said: "I now tender"—tender—"the votes of the Populists in this Chamber; we will vote for your tariff bill."

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from New York does not intend to misrepresent me or misquote me.

Mr. HILL. I do not intend to do so.

Mr. ALLEN. I am perfectly willing to be put in as small a light as it is possible for the Senator from New York to put a man, and I know his great capacity in that direction.

Mr. HILL. Wherein do I misrepresent you, pray?

Mr. ALLEN. Let me state it. I did stand in this Chamber, and I stand here now for the third time and repeat it, and I will be very brief—I did stand in this Chamber and say to the Republican party, and I repeat it right at this moment, that whenever they see fit to take up their tariff bill, which they call the Dingley bill (I do not know why it is called that, but it is called that and known to the country as the Dingley bill), and put it upon its passage here, with the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 attached to it as a part of it, they will get 6 Populist votes here to assist in the passage of that bill. I never have said anything to them privately about it. All my statements have been made in the open; they are made in the open now. There is not a Senator on the other side who can say that I have ever talked with him privately upon the subject or communicated with him or with their caucus.

Why did I say it, Mr. President? Not because there is any dicker, for we have no occasion to dicker with the Republican party or the Democratic party. We are the hinge upon which the door swings, and we are conscious of it.

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly, if the Senator from New York will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HILL. With great pleasure.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that as far as I represent this side of the Chamber and as far as I am concerned I am entirely willing to accept the proposition.

Mr. ALLEN. I know there are some loyal men on that side of the Chamber, some good men on that side of the Chamber, as there are on this. I said that for two purposes. I said it not because I am committed to the policy of the Dingley bill, not because I am a believer in the principles that underlie it, if it has any principles, which I very much doubt, but because I believe that the free and unlimited coinage of silver in this country would overshadow and wipe out every evil that could spring from the tariff feature of that bill, and that benefit would come to the country and come to the people whom I represent in part in this Chamber.

I did it, Mr. President, for another reason, and I will be entirely frank with you, Mr. President, because you can read my thoughts whether I express them to you or not on this subject. I did it for the purpose of proving to the country, as I think I have conclusively proven, or we have proven, that when the Republican party claims to be a party in favor of bimetallism it is guilty of fraud and false pretenses; and you do not dare to-day to introduce that bill with silver upon it, for you know very well if it gets your own votes it will become a law. Your platform of 1892 was a fraud, a snare, and a delusion. You are not bimetallists; you are not in favor of free silver. Those are the reasons.

Mr. HILL. The Senator has stated the reasons very well, but that does not change the facts. The facts, as I understand them, are substantially as I stated them. As I understand it, he agrees with the Senator from South Carolina that there is but one principle mainly involved now in this campaign. In other words, there is but one idea which must predominate all other political ideas at this time; and therefore he and his friends will vote for a tariff bill or they will vote against a tariff bill; they will vote for free wool or they will vote against free wool; they will vote up or down a tariff schedule anyway to effect the one single question, although he himself knows from reading the platform of his party that they have a large number of other principles involved. Therefore I think I was substantially right when I said that they peddled them all off for one single principle and tendered those votes to the Republicans, and they to their credit or to their discredit, as you may think, declined the proposition to dicker.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I certainly did not intend to get into any controversy here with the Senator from New York. I supposed that when I corrected him, or called his attention to the mistake, there would be no backing and filling here.

Mr. HILL. What was the mistake?

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is attempting to put the party of which I am a member in an incorrect light.

Mr. HILL. I did not intend to misrepresent you.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator says now that there was an offer here on the part of the Populists, or upon my part, to abandon in favor of free silver everything that was in the Populist platform. That is not true. There is no truth in that statement, Mr. President: it is a mistake.

There are a great many gentlemen in this Chamber and outside of it who have been giving out in interviews and letters and speeches their views of Populists and Populism. A great many of these gentlemen have spoken of the socialistic features and the paternalistic features of the Populist party and of Populism. I challenge any Senator in this Chamber, or any man outside of it, I care not who he may be, if he be a gentleman and a truthful man, to point out in any authentic document issued by the Populist party a solitary thing that is paternalistic or socialistic in its faith.

I accompany that statement with my solemn conviction that nine men out of ten of that class, not excluding from my statement the members of this Chamber, have never read the Populist platform. If the truth were known, there are not seven Senators out of ten in this Chamber who have read it or know a word it contains outside of the silver plank.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I do not know whom the Senator is aiming to hit. I have expressed no views in regard to the Populist party outside of this Chamber; but I hold in my hand a letter written by a distinguished gentleman upon the other side of the Chamber, in which he says:

The Populist party—

favours free coinage, but only as a means to secure more currency, and as a stepping stone to unlimited paper money; and it unites with its free-coinage advocacy socialistic and paternalistic doctrines which are dangerous in tendency, and which would be, if adopted, destructive of free institutions.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from New York permit me?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. Is the author of that letter a Populist?

Mr. HILL. No, sir. I said it was written by a distinguished Republican on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, but not a Populist?

Mr. HILL. No, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. We do not accept his interpretation of the Populist platform.

Mr. HILL. He is not only a distinguished Republican, but a distinguished free-silver man, an earnest, sincere, free-silver man, who expresses those views.

Mr. ALLEN. It is gratifying to learn that he is right on one point—that of free silver.

Mr. HILL. I notice that his views as thus expressed seem to agree entirely with the views of my friend from South Carolina, who, however, favors unlimited paper money.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did I say unlimited? Did I not stop at a billion? Just about half, mark you; just what we issued during the war, when there were less than one-half the number of people in this country that there are now. I was willing to stop at one billion in paper. You see we have about a billion dollars in silver and gold, or would have if you let us coin the trash you have in the Treasury, and we certainly could maintain $1 in paper with $1 in coin.

Mr. HILL. The trash in the Treasury of which you speak—
Mr. TILLMAN. Of which you speak. I do not call it trash. It is good enough for me, as it is good enough for my people.

Mr. HILL. I have never called it trash. I have no doubt that they take it in South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. We would be glad to get it.

Mr. HILL. I never have spoken of silver as trash as the Senator has. I use his own expression.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator tell us just where he stands on silver?

Mr. HILL. Yes; when I speak on the bond question I will. It would be a little premature now. I want to wait until we come to that. The "trash" in the Treasury which you speak of could be coined with entire safety if such Democrats as my friend who combine with such Populists as my friend in front of me did not want to have unlimited paper money, and yet claiming all the while to be hard-money Democrats. That is the difficulty. The President in his message marked out a line. I have it here and I ask my friend to read it. He points out that if the greenbacks were retired, the trash, as you call it, the bullion as he calls it, which is in the Treasury could be safely coined.

Mr. ALLEN. No; he says it would be replaced by national-bank currency.

Mr. HILL. Only a part, he says—in part to be supplied that way, and the rest to be coined.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am not to be diverted into a discussion of the gold and silver question at this hour of the day. I simply speak of this now for the purpose of showing that my friend, who says that he is a Democrat, is wrong upon one of the fundamental, elementary principles of Jefferson and Jackson. He quoted a few moments ago something from Jackson and Jefferson from which he was willing to claim that Jackson was a paper-money man. It would make old Jackson, who had a sort of affection for the people of South Carolina—you know on one occasion especially—

Mr. TILLMAN. He was born there. Having been born there, he had an affection for his birthplace.

Mr. HILL. And of course he was a good Democrat. But my friend quotes him as though he was in favor of the unlimited issue of paper money.

Mr. President, the Democratic party is not a paper-money party. Greenbacks were regarded when they were issued as a temporary matter. What there was of the Democratic party left in those days voted against them. But when the war was over and the Republicans saw that it was necessary to restrict and contract the currency and do away to some extent with the greenback currency the Democrats flopped over and became greenbackers. There has always been an element—

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator—

Mr. HILL. I am talking about Democrats, not about the Populists. You are not obliged to defend the Democrats.

Mr. ALLEN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator has repeated here what I have heard fifty times in this Chamber during my incumbency of this seat, the stale statement that the Populist party is in favor of a limitless volume of irredeemable paper money. I have taken occasion frequently to deny that. I now take great pleasure in giving the Senator the national platform of the Populist party of 1892, and I ask him to read it.

Mr. HILL. I have read it.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator has read that platform—

Mr. HILL. Over and over again.

Mr. ALLEN. Over and over again, as he says; then there is no earthly excuse for his making the statement he has made.

Mr. HILL. Are you in favor of greenbacks? What is your limit? Is it a little trifle like a billion, like the Senator from South Carolina, or several billion?

Mr. ALLEN. I knew the Senator from New York had never read the Populist platform.

Mr. HILL. I have read it.

Mr. ALLEN. He talks like a man who has never read it. What does it say, Mr. President? If the Senator would not regard it as an offense, I would read the entire platform.

Mr. HILL. I would not want to speak of that as my friend did about the silver in the Treasury, as trash.

Mr. ALLEN. No; but here is a magnificent opportunity to educate a lot of ignorant people upon this platform, and the opportunity ought to be embraced. I hope the Senator will let me read it.

Mr. HILL. I think you had better not read it.

Mr. ALLEN. You do not want education on this subject.

Mr. HILL. Because, my friend, you may change your platform at the next convention, like your votes here change, first to one side and then to the other, and we can not keep track of it.

Mr. ALLEN. No; Mr. President—

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. Let me say to the Senator from New York that if it had not been for the Populist party in this Chamber and the Populist party in the other Chamber there are a great many measures which have become laws that never would have been enacted. But let me return to this question—

Mr. HILL. I do not yield to the Senator. I am willing to yield that he may ask a question; but I can not yield to the Senator that he may read the Populist platform.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from New York, like his party, declines knowledge when the opportunity is open to him, then I will take occasion when he is done to put this platform in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HILL. The idea of expecting to get any light about public questions of the day from the Populist platform! Among all the things said here to-day that is the worst.

Mr. President, my friend from South Carolina, who expressed his affection for me, was repeatedly speaking—

Mr. ALLEN. Who loves you.

Mr. HILL. Yes; he said he did. He spoke of the people of the two old parties, to one of which he belongs now, but he is going to rebel pretty soon because of the corruption, and he wanted something new; he wanted some change to induce him to go with the Populist party. I do not know what they want. The free coinage of silver will not give to any man who has no money, and has not anything with which to procure money, more money than he has. Money must be earned, whether it is gold, whether it is silver, or whether it is paper. There have been hard times in this country in the past and there will be hard times again. Hard times will produce all sorts of financial heresies, all sorts of financial schemes. I am not here to say that the free coinage of silver is a financial heresy; I do not say that. I say it is advocated by men of intelligence, some able students and able financiers, as I have said before. I treat it with respect and always have, and it is a question about which men may well differ. But, sir, I protest against Democrats who profess to be Democrats offensively arraigning members of their own party because they do not pursue a public policy exactly in accordance with their views.

Mr. TILLMAN. What about the platform, Mr. President?

Mr. HILL. The platform of 1892 stands. Would my friend be content with the platform of 1892 if it should be readopted by the next national Democratic convention?

Mr. ALLEN. As interpreted by Cleveland?

Mr. HILL. I pause for a reply.

Mr. TILLMAN. No, I want "16 to 1 or bust." [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. My friend will "bust," then. [Laughter.] That reminds me of the fellow who started for Pikes Peak. On his way one of the horses ran away and the other got sick and died, and he himself was injured and much disfigured, while his wagon was all broken to pieces, and he had a sign up: "To Pikes Peak or Bust." We have here reiterated again "16 to 1," the same single idea all the time. You are going to found a great national party upon a single idea; that is all.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. What founded the Republican party, which has governed this country since 1860 with the exception of eight years? The one single dominant idea of freeing the slaves, and nothing else. Great parties are not founded on more than one idea.

Mr. HILL. Very soon after the Republican party was organized they adopted their policy in regard to free homesteads; they adopted their policy in regard to protection. Of course the war soon came on, which rendered the tariff question somewhat obscure, necessarily so, because there had to be a large tariff.

Sir, I do not believe it is possible for a party to succeed very long upon a single idea. The Prohibitionist party, a small dwindling party, only containing a small number of votes, does not grow, because it is based upon one idea. Sir, I do not believe the Democrats of South Carolina will follow my friend. I do not believe they will follow him from other States. I am not going to reiterate what I said before upon the point of there being other questions involved. My friend wanted me to read the platform of the Populist party, and as I am addressing the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Nebraska, and about half the time they are so mixed up in their views, he will pardon me—

Mr. TILLMAN. Not so badly as you and Mr. SHERMAN are mixed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. SHERMAN and myself are not mixed at all. Mr. SHERMAN and my friend agree upon the one great vital question of the retention of the whole five hundred million of greenback currency, and you want to increase it a billion more. The matter of a billion does not amount to anything with men of one idea when discussing great financial questions.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. Not now.

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply want to drop a little side remark. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I can not yield just yet. I will yield in a few minutes. My good friend from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] introduced at the beginning of this session a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Here is section 2.

Mr. ALLEN. Read the entire joint resolution.

Mr. HILL. The first section is a mere matter of form, but the second section is as follows:

SEC. 2. No law to change or alter the established policy of the United States in any great matter of administration, and especially respecting our foreign relations, the public lands, taxation, and our monetary system, shall take effect until it has been approved by the people at an election held for that purpose.

Mr. ALLEN. That is right.

Mr. HILL. The people, Mr. President!

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. HILL. In a moment. I suppose the Senator will defend this last Populist plank, which must be orthodox, because it was presented by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not dealing with the referendum now. I am dealing with that billion dollars on paper. You people in New York, or your people in New York, sell and buy twenty, thirty billions of agricultural products based upon nothing. I do not know how many billions of Southern products, and wheat and corn, dealing in futures; you speculate in air—

Mr. ALLEN. They gamble.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, they gamble; that is it. They gamble in the products of labor in this country, based on nothing, and when the laborers and farmers of the country come to Congress and ask to have this stopped by law the attorneys of corporations, the bondholders, the bankers, and the money sharks of New York have more influence here than 85,000,000 of us.

You said in your speech the other day that you subscribed $450,000,000 to this loan.

Mr. HILL. I did not subscribe.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is a mere bagatelle. Why should you grumble if we and all of the rest of the people of the country want a billion of greenbacks to do our business, when you have gobbled up all the money of the country, when you have a tollgate on it, and when you have contracted it, so that you can handle and hoard it, and hammer our products down and prevent the blood from circulating through the body? And you sneer because we want a billion. Yes; we do want it, and we are going to have it, so help us God!

Mr. HILL. I should like to have my friend explain, if to-morrow this Government should all at once issue a mere trifle, like a billion, of greenbacks, how it is going to help you people down South.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will you let me tell you?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. We will pay for these battle ships; we will fortify our entire coast from one end of it to the other; we will put every wheel in the United States into motion; we will put every tramp at work, and we will give every farmer money, so as to be able to buy clothes and shoes for his wife and children. That is what we will do.

Mr. HILL. And the millennium will then come!

Mr. ALLEN. No.

Mr. HILL. Here is this Jeffersonian-Jacksonian Democrat going into extravagant appropriations of money, into great systems of public improvements, and all sorts of expensive navies and an army, and going to do everything at governmental expense, I suppose.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. HILL. Would the Democracy of South Carolina sanction that?

Mr. TILLMAN. What are we seeing here? The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] told us yesterday that this Congress has appropriated or promises to appropriate $600,000,000 in one year. What are you going to do with it? Spend it on everything? Very well; let us spend it so as to keep the people at work. That is the doctrine which has been preached here to-day. I say let us have it, but do not let us have any more bonds to buy it with, which bear interest and which are mortgages upon the labor of the country; but let us have the greenbacks.

Mr. HILL. The greenbacks would be a debt; the greenbacks would have to be paid at some time or other.

Mr. ALLEN and Mr. TILLMAN. But they do not bear interest.

Mr. HILL. Oh, it is a question simply of interest, then, is it?

Mr. ALLEN. A question of interest.

Mr. HILL. You do not know what you are going to do. Are you going to issue bonds or are you going to issue greenbacks? I tell my friend that money is only the representative of wealth or labor. This, then, is the programme: Issue the greenbacks; let the Government issue them; issue them for public improvements. They do not propose to issue them even under the McKinley régime to manufacturers, do they? I do not suppose they intend to do that right directly from the Treasury, but suppose they are going to do it indirectly, as my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] knows all about. I do not see how they are going to give a man a dollar unless he has earned it. I do not see how a professional man would get another dollar if the Treasury were full of gold or full of silver unless he earned it.

Mr. President, it is this false doctrine that the people are to get rich by public legislation against which I protest. I protest against this new-fangled doctrine—call it South Carolina Democracy, or Populist Democracy, or what you please to call it—that the people are to get rich simply by the Government issuing more money. It is a false idea, I tell my friend, and when he goes to the people upon that idea and tells that to the plain farmer or the mechanic or the intelligent people of this country, "so help me God" he will be deceived.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator will allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, no man expects, least of all do I expect, that when this money is issued it is to be given to anybody; but if you put in circulation in this country money enough, that can not be contracted and expanded at the will of the banks so as to raise or lower prices at the will of the speculators, when you get money that they can not dam up, when you decentralize the money by a new banking system, so that the people of the whole country can go to the banks and get money instead of paying toll to New York, your great millionaires in New York will become poor and the happy prosperous farmers of this country will be more numerous.

Mr. HILL. There is nothing to prevent the millionaires or the farmers or the mechanics or the laborers of South Carolina from establishing a bank to-day if they have the money with which to do it. They can not pledge old worn-out lands to get money on. The people must labor and produce something that produces wealth. There is no more exclusive monopoly in national banks than in any other kind of banks. Any man who has got the capital may establish one. It may do for a while, like my friend here, to preach this sort of doctrine to the people; it may do in hard times, you will then find listeners, but you can not fool the people, in my judgment, in this way. This constantly calling people "gold bugs," this constantly calling everybody who lives in New York "a millionaire" will not do. We have, Mr. President, our poor people in New York and we have our rich people.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not say all you New Yorkers were millionaires, because you have more white slaves in sight of the Statue of Liberty, or within 10 miles of it, than are to be found in any other area on the American continent.

Mr. HILL. That is an old story with my friend, which he has repeatedly told on the stump. The State of New York is no different from any other State. We have got just and equal laws, made by the people of our State. Our people are industrious. What money they have they have acquired by hard labor upon their farms, in their manufactories, and they are, in the main, a contented and happy people. There will be in times like these some distress; there will be times when labor will be scarce; there will be times when labor will be plentiful; there will be times of high prices, and there will be times of low prices. What I say is that it is the height of demagogism to attempt to preach to the people that all of this condition of affairs which has occurred in all the periods of the world can be cured by legislation. It can not be done. Legislation may aid us in the great battle of life; it may do us some good, as good laws may help and bad laws may injure some; but, in the main, the doctrine which I teach and the doctrine which I learned from my father, and which I think should be taught to future generations, is that, in the main, every man in this free country of ours is the architect of his own fortune. Each man has the same right to become a millionaire as the sons of men in New York who have accumulated their millions, and honestly.

Sir, it is not necessary that I should to any extent defend what are called the millionaires of Wall street. They are like everyone else, they are endeavoring to get rich. The farmers are trying to better their condition, trying to educate their children; the laborers are trying to build their humble homes; all are trying to better their condition in life. They can not be much aided by legislation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HILL. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why do you resist, then, the repeal of legislation which we have tried to get undone here? Why do you prevent us from restoring the money which we had from 1787 up to 1873? Why do you legislate against the people by cutting the standard in half, and thereby reducing the value of everything in this country one-half except debts, and reducing the productions of labor one-half, and then say legislation has nothing to do with it? You can not deny the proposition that by bad laws this country has been brought to a condition of bankruptcy; and it will only be by having good laws and a change of the system inaugurated which will restore any decent degree of prosperity.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, physical facts have a great deal to do with the prosperity of a country. In nearly every twenty-five years of the history of this country, even when our fathers before us were governing the country, we had bad times; we had periods of excitement, we had periods of depression, when prices were low, when men were suffering for money and for the necessities of life. It will be so during all the future history of this country.

The solution of the silver question, sir, will not cure all the evils. It may help some, according to my friend from South Carolina, if he solves it, and it may not. I am not now going to discuss the silver question. Let us reserve that for some other day. I am simply now going to call the attention of my friend to this fact. It is evident from his views that while he does not profess Populism he is making steady strides toward that party. He agrees with that party in the main on some of its essential features. I ask him to remain with the true men from the South and the West in the endeavor to have party reforms within party lines.

What will be the effect of the action which he unwisely suggests? The effect of the action which he suggests will be a split at Chicago, and our Republican friends will be entrenched in power for another quarter of a century, with all the evils which are likely to occur.

If Democracy means the teaching of the people that they can get rich simply by legislation, I will have none of it. That is not the Democracy of Jefferson and Jackson; it is not, as I think, true South Carolina Democracy. If Democracy means the issue of paper money as the future money of this country, I will have none of it. I have never believed, and do not believe, that the Democratic party think that this Government has the real constitutional power to make paper currency a legal tender. We opposed it when it was done and we criticised the decision of the Supreme Court on that subject. The Democratic party is to-day thoroughly in favor of hard money and opposed to a paper currency. The position of the Democratic party is that this country can not be made rich simply by legislation. Now, my friend and I have thus discussed our respective positions. My friend does not wish to do me injustice.

Sir, I do not speak for Wall street, and he knows it. In no campaign of mine, from the first I made in the Empire State, have I ever had the support of any considerable number of the men who do business upon Wall street. I have antagonized their views. I have endeavored, so far as I could, to keep the Democracy of New York with the Democracy of the rest of the country, upon the financial as well as upon other questions; yet the Senator from South Carolina, in the heat of argument, in the excitement of debate, when he says he is becoming desperate, or the people are becoming desperate, stigmatizes me as the representative of Wall street.

Mr. President, the very men who are engaged in selling bonds are largely Republicans. The Democratic party in New York in the main is composed of the masses of the people, some bankers and business men, the farmers, mechanics, and the men of average means. Those are the men who stood by the Senator's State in the days when it needed friends; they are the men who stood up for Democratic principles, who have resisted the bills which were intended to harass and annoy your people. They are the men to whom the Democracy of every State have never appealed in vain to do what they could to aid the Democratic cause. We were the followers not of Wall street; we were the followers of Horatio Seymour; we were the followers of Samuel J. Tilden; we were the followers of the men who in this body and in other bodies were trying to do all they could for the Democratic party when extreme counsels prevailed elsewhere, so that we were handicapped in all our efforts. Our friends who have only the one idea of silver forget all this. They think they are strong enough to branch out for themselves. Be not deceived. The man from the South or the West who tries to take the Democratic party masses away from the old party upon the single idea of silver will find himself mistaken. Disaster will come, and the whole country be lost to the Democratic party if any such effort succeeds.

Let us discuss this question of financial differences in a manly, in a fair, in an honest, and sincere way. I can discuss it without making any unkind remarks as to those who differ with me.

What good does it do for Democrats to arraign the Administration which they helped to put in power because upon a few things we differ with it? The President and the Secretary of the Treasury have stood up against paternalism. The President has stood up against legislation which has been forced upon him. I am not here to defend any pension vetoes. I know nothing in regard to the merits of them one way or the other. There have been a few pension vetoes. Such is the venom, such the malice, such the indiscretion, such the judgment of my friend, that he thinks it is necessary to go out of his way to stir up some prejudice against the Democratic President of the United States because he may have vetoed some bill for some deserter or tramp or somebody or other of that kind. Oh, no; Mr. President—

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HILL. Not now, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. HILL. I want the Democratic party protected, if it can be, from such extreme utterances. The President is in power; he was placed there by Democratic votes. I differ from many things in his Administration. It is not necessary that I should publish or proclaim them. He, in my humble judgment, is not a candidate for reelection. Why trouble ourselves in regard to him or those who surround him? Let us prepare for the conflict against our common enemies and not quarrel here among ourselves. For one, I say to you, I protest against a few men, whether in the South or in the West, taking that position on a single idea. I deny that my friend speaks for the South. I deny that those speak for the West who assume to say that this party is to be wrecked, divided, and split upon this one question of the details of financial legislation.

Mr. President, it will be a sad day for the country when that occurs. The Democratic party has done much for the country in the past, and it is capable of doing much for it in the future. What I suggest is that we should pursue this policy: "In essentials, unity; in nonessentials, liberty; in all things, charity."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I gave notice last night, not fully apprehending how dreary a day it would be, but feeling that there might be trouble, that unless the pending bill was finished I would ask for a night session. Now, in view of the fact that the entire week has been consumed with this one appropriation bill, nominally, four-fifths of the time having been taken up by discussions entirely outside of the bill, I appeal to Senators to stand by in some endeavor or some plan for disposing of the bill. Otherwise to-morrow morning we shall be in precisely the same situation as we were this morning, and the day will go and nothing will be done. I am entirely willing either to stay now until 7 or 8 o'clock, until we finish the bill, or to have a night session. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. ALLEN. I object to the request.

Mr. HALE. Then I ask unanimous consent that we stay here to-night until the bill is finished.

Mr. ALLEN. I object to that, Mr. President.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not know what I can now do, instead of making the motion which I shall do later, unless I can get another agreement, and ask the sense of the Senate on a night session. I will, however, make another proposition, that the bill be taken up to-morrow morning—

Mr. HAWLEY. At 11 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. At 11 o'clock, taking a recess until that hour; that the consideration of the bill proceed until 2 o'clock; that after that time it be considered under the five-minute rule until 4 o'clock, when the final vote shall be taken upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in making that proposition we avoid the inconvenience of a night session, although we frequently have night sessions in the last month of each session of Congress, and may have to have them hereafter. I gave notice last night to that effect, so that there should be no surprise; but to avoid either staying here now or coming here to-night I restate the proposition, that we take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, that the bill be then at once taken up and continued until 2 o'clock—that is three hours—that then it be considered under the five-minute rule until 4 o'clock, when the vote shall be taken upon the bill and the pending amendments. If that be agreed to, I shall not ask the Senate to vote upon a proposition for a night session. Otherwise, I must take the sense of the Senate as to some method of disposing of the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand the anxiety of the Senator from Maine to dispose of the bill at an early date, and there is no disposition on my part to prolong its consideration unduly. I do not think the bill has been delayed unduly, except possibly to-day, when we entered into the discussion of matters which have no special relation to this particular measure. I suggest to the Senator that while, of course, in the last month of the session we usually hold night sessions, because we are pressed for time, that observation does not apply in this case. No time has yet been fixed for Congress to adjourn, and it can not at present be said that this is the last month of the session.

At the same time I suggest to the Senator that he agree that the Senate shall meet to-morrow at the usual time (to-morrow being Saturday, it will be almost impossible to get Senators here earlier than that hour) and proceed with the bill immediately after the ordinary morning business is concluded, which will consume some ten or fifteen minutes. Then let the general discussion go on until half past 2 o'clock, and after that under a ten-minute rule, with the distinct understanding that we shall remain here and finish the bill to-morrow night. The reason why I do not want to agree to fixing an exact time for a vote is because it might exclude some amendments, as we know has been the case heretofore under such agreements; but we can continue under the ten-minute rule after half past 2 o'clock, or I have no objection to the five-minute rule, provided the amendment that is pending from the Committee on Naval Affairs in regard to the price of armor is disposed of before half past 2. That amendment I do not believe can be disposed of under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HALE. I will accept—

Mr. GORMAN. We will agree to vote on the bill before we adjourn to-morrow evening.

Mr. HALE. I accept that proposition. I wish to be entirely reasonable in every respect.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before I can consent to any agreement, I wish to make a statement. I have been in my seat for three consecutive days waiting to offer an amendment on which I desire to be heard briefly, a little longer than five minutes, possibly fifteen minutes, and I think it is due to my constituents that I should have that privilege. I have neglected other business and have been here at my personal inconvenience listening to speeches to which I did not care to listen, not knowing when they might be completed, and while I am very desirous to have the bill finished, I shall rather insist on my right to offer the amendment and to be heard upon it for about fifteen minutes.

Mr. HALE. I will agree, so far as I can, as the manager of the bill, that after disposing of the present amendment the Senator's amendment shall come up next, so that he shall have the opportunity he desires.

Mr. GALLINGER. All right.

Mr. HALE. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] asks unanimous consent that the pending bill may be taken up for consideration immediately after the routine business to-morrow morning; that its consideration shall be continued until 2 o'clock under the ordinary rule, but after 2 o'clock the debate shall proceed under the five-minute rule, and that the bill and all amendments shall be disposed of before adjournment to-morrow night. Is there objection?

Mr. SQUIRE. I wish to say that I have one or two amendments which I wish to present.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Washington shall have an opportunity to get in his amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am authorized to move the pending amendment by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and in order that it may be within the rule, I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 2, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 1, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RAMSAY CROOKS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 115) for the relief of the estate of Ramsay Crooks.

Whereas Ramsay Crooks, late of the State of New York, was, during the years 1842 to 1847, inclusive, a duly authorized and licensed trader, doing business with the Indians of Lake Superior, during which period he furnished said Indians a large amount of supplies necessary for their subsistence, and to enable them to carry on the chase; that in the year 1848 he was succeeded by others as traders for said Indians, whereby of necessity he left an outstanding indebtedness due to him from certain bands of said Indians, which has never been paid to said Crooks, nor to his legal representatives; and

Whereas the said Ramsay Crooks, in his lifetime, filed said claims in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, showing that there was due to him from the Pillager and Lake Winnebagoish band the sum of $6,410.80, and from a certain other band, known as the Chippewa Indians of the Mississippi, the sum of $3,308.82, making a total amount of such indebtedness of $9,719.62: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and there hereby is, appropriated, out of the Treasury of the United States, from any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $9,719.62, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to examine said claims against the Pillager and Lake Winnebagoish band of Indians in the sum of $6,410.80 and the Chippewa Indians of the Minnesota band in the sum of $3,308.82, and pay said amount, or so much thereof as he shall find to be due to the administrator of the estate of said Ramsay Crooks from the respective bands, and charge the same to any annuities or other moneys due, or to become due, from the United States to the said Indians, in such proportions as shall be found to be due therefrom.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I think the report should be read.

Mr. TAWNEY. The report is somewhat lengthy, and if it will satisfy the gentleman I can make a short statement of the facts and of the purpose of the bill. This bill is for the payment of a claim against the Chippewa and Winnebagoish Indians of Minnesota. The bill has already passed the Senate, and has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Indian Affairs. The claim is for supplies furnished to these two bands or tribes of Indians by Mr. Crooks in his lifetime, and the only object of the bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to inquire into and ascertain the exact amount due to the heirs of Mr. Crooks for the supplies furnished, and to pay the same and charge it to the account of these Indians, who have at this time large annuities to their credit in the Treasury. The claim was considered in and passed the Fifty-first Congress, and was reported favorably in the Fifty-second Congress.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that these Indians have a large sum to their credit now?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. The question arose in my mind, on hearing the bill read, whether or not it was specific and clear enough. In other words, whether by implication it did not require the Government to make payment of this amount, and then, if any funds should be placed to the credit of these Indians hereafter, to charge it up against them.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am informed that these Indians have a large amount of money to their credit at the present time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has this bill been referred to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has been before the Department. It will be observed that this bill simply authorizes the Secretary to ascertain the amount actually due, and provides that the amount so ascertained shall be paid and charged to the account of these Indians.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the report contain a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or from the Secretary of the Interior approving this bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not contain anything from the present Secretary of the Interior, but the claim has been approved by the Department in past Administrations. One of the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISCHER], informs me that the present Secretary has approved this bill.

Mr. FISCHER. My recollection is that this bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. I will state that that recollection is founded upon the fact that the committee has recommended no bills at this session that have not had the approval of the Department. I am satisfied, therefore, that this has gone to the Department for approval.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the committee have no communication in writing from the Secretary of the Interior approving the bill?

Mr. FISCHER. All approvals from the Department are in writing, and possibly I can find this one in the committee room. The Department does not send us any merely oral approvals.

Mr. DOCKERY. Several gentlemen around me suggest a query which I will propound to the gentleman in charge of this bill for their information: Why has not this claim been paid heretofore?

Mr. TAWNEY. In reply to that I can only say that after the supplies were furnished, Mr. Crooks went to the West Indies, remained there for some time, and died there. After his death his estate was administered, and the heirs, who were at that time scattered all over the country, could not and did not take immediate action to recover this claim, but as soon as they could they did take such action, and since that time they have been proceeding diligently in the prosecution of their claim before Congress in order to secure its adjustment by giving the Secretary of the Interior authority to ascertain the amount and to pay the same out of the annuities due these Indians.

Mr. DINGLEY. When were these supplies furnished?

Mr. TAWNEY. In 1845, I think. The date is set forth in the report.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Who was Mr. Crooks?

Mr. TAWNEY. He was a licensed trader with the Indians, and these supplies were furnished to these tribes. In fact, the amount claimed by the estate is larger than the amount in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Let me read this to the gentleman from this claimant's own statement:

For the balance due and remaining unpaid for the merchandise furnished them in the course of the trade carried on with them by the agents of the American Fur Company from the year 1817 to 1841, inclusive, when myself and associates assumed the business and carried it on with these Indians to the same extent as for the preceding twenty-five years, say $206.80 per annum for twenty-five years, amounting in all to $5,170, and from the year 1842 to 1848, when the trade passed from mine to the hands of Charles W. Borup and Charles H. Oakes, six years, at $206.80, $1,240.80, making together $6,410.80.

And so on, and so on. This man seems to have been the assignee of the American Fur Company, and this claim goes back into ancient history. I must object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

WILSON VS. M'LAURIN.

Mr. CODDING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a report from the Committee on Elections No. 3, in the case of Joshua E. Wilson vs. John McLaurin. The resolutions in the report represent the unanimous sense of the committee, and I ask for immediate action.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Joshua E. Wilson was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Sixth Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That John McLaurin was elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Sixth district of South Carolina, and is entitled to the seat.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolutions, they were agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—MURRAY VS. ELLIOTT.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I desire to submit a privileged report. The Committee on Elections No. 3 have directed me to submit their report on the contested election case of Murray vs. Elliott, from the First Congressional district of South Carolina. I ask that the report be printed and that consent be given to the minority of the committee to submit their views at any time before this case is called up for consideration.

The resolutions appended to the report of the committee are as follows:

Resolved, That William Elliott was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the First Congressional district of South Carolina.

Resolved, That George W. Murray was elected and is entitled to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the First Congressional district of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee will be ordered to be printed and referred to the House Calendar. If there be no objection, the minority of the committee will have leave to file their views at any time before the case is called up.

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. HALL, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6307) to amend section 4 of the act approved March 2, 1895, being an act amendatory of an act with reference to the postal service; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BRIDGE ACROSS TALLAHATCHIE RIVER, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. KYLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 137) declaring a certain bridge across the Tallahatchie River, in Tallahatchie County, State of Mississippi, a lawful structure.

The joint resolution, with the substitute reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, was read.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The substitute was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KYLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA.

Mr. SCRANTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3826) providing for the election of a Delegate from the District of Alaska to the House of Representatives of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States from the District of Alaska shall be chosen by the people thereof, who shall be a citizen of the United States and shall discharge like duties and be entitled to the same rights, privileges, and emoluments as are discharged, exercised, and enjoyed by Delegates from the several Territories of the United States in the House of Representatives.

SEC. 2. That the first Delegate shall be chosen for the remainder of the term of the Fifty-fourth Congress and for the full term of the Fifty-fifth Congress at the same election, and each succeeding Delegate shall be chosen for the full term of the Congress next succeeding his election.

SEC. 3. That the first election of such Delegate shall be held on the 1st day of October, in the year 1896, and thereafter such elections shall be held on the first Tuesday of September in each year when the members of the House of Representatives are chosen.

SEC. 4. That the governor, United States district judge, clerk of the district court, and United States marshal of the district, immediately after the passage of this act, shall establish polling places, located as conveniently as may be, for the general accommodation of the voters, the whole number of such polling places not to exceed 100 for the first election, and shall prescribe regulations for ascertaining the qualifications of voters and for holding the elections, which shall be binding upon the officers conducting the same. They shall also appoint an election board for each polling place, composed of a judge, two inspectors, and two clerks, not more than three of whom shall belong to the same political party, so far as it shall be found practicable to obtain suitable persons of different political parties.

The governor shall, by proclamation, give sixty days' notice of the time when and of the polling places where the election shall be held, and shall also issue the necessary instructions to the election boards in conformity to the regulations aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That all male citizens of the United States who shall have attained the age of 21 years, and who shall have been actual residents of said District for four months last prior to the election, shall be entitled to vote by ballot at one polling place and no more, at each election, for a Delegate to represent said District of Alaska in the House of Representatives of the United States.

SEC. 6. That the election boards shall make return forthwith by mail and such other convenient method of transmission as they may deem trustworthy, of the results of the election at their several polling places, to the clerk of the United States district court of said District, who shall compile the same and report to the governor the number of ballots cast for each candidate; and the person having the greatest number of votes cast by the electors qualified as herein provided, returns of which shall have been received on or before the second Tuesday of November next following the election, shall be declared elected by the governor, who shall issue his certificate accordingly.

SEC. 7. That the expenses incurred in carrying the foregoing provisions into effect, not exceeding $25 at any one polling place, including posting of notices and making and transmitting the returns of election therein, nor $3,000 in the aggregate for the election in the entire District, shall be audited and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect on its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not propose to object to the consideration of the bill; but if it be considered I shall ask a little time to present my views with reference to it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Unless there is some agreement as to the time to be occupied (and it must be a brief time) it will be my duty to object, because of the special order.

Mr. SCRANTON. How much time does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. HENDERSON. If the bill can be disposed of in thirty or forty minutes—say thirty minutes—I shall be willing to let it go forward; otherwise, in justice to the special order and to those interested in amendments, I shall feel it my duty to object.

Mr. SCRANTON. If we can have forty minutes, I think that time will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCRANTON] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just read and that a vote be taken on it in forty minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Territories, during a series of well-attended meetings within the past three months, has given patient and thorough attention to the condition of Alaska. Of the many measures of remedial legislation proposed for her people the committee has selected the bill now presented for consideration of this House, and, with but a single dissenting voice, has indorsed a request for favorable action. It has seemed to us that the time had come when something should be done for Alaska, and that the best way to help her was to enable her citizens to help themselves by admitting their duly elected representative to the privileges of a Delegate in Congress. Since this was first attempted fourteen years ago, in the Forty-seventh Congress, when M. D. Ball appeared in Washington as the duly elected and accredited representative of Alaska, and unsuccessfully knocked at the door of this House during that entire Congress, the country has witnessed the marvelous development of Alaska's mines and fisheries. Her white population, despite the most adverse civil conditions, has also increased during that period to twice as many thousands as there were hundreds in 1880. The conditions now seem to justify the recognition desired, as is more fully set forth in the committee's report, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report, as follows:

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3826) entitled "A bill providing for the election of a Delegate from the District of Alaska to the House of Representatives of the United States," have had it under consideration, and respectfully report the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

A similar bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on the Territories of the House of Representatives near the close of the Fifty-third Congress, but too late for further action, in support of which that committee said:

"The isolated condition of the Territory of Alaska and the great distance from the seat of Government renders it impracticable for Congress to know the condition of the Territory. It has received but small attention from Congress since the passage of the act organizing a district government in 1884. The development of the country, the increase of population, and the investment of capital demand a more perfect government and more legislation by Congress, which can only be formulated by those who are acquainted with the environment and needs of the Territory."

In submitting a like unanimous report in favor of the passage of this bill your committee deem it proper to enlarge somewhat upon the views thus briefly and forcibly stated by the committee of the Fifty-third Congress.

The District of Alaska has a surface area of 577,000 square miles, or one-sixth that of the whole United States and Territories, and by its location is of commanding importance to our future commercial and political relations. Independent of its internal resources, it is essentially an outlying dependency, the very last part of our domain which we can afford to neglect or leave to the control of its sparse population. This peculiar circumstance of itself renders the presence of a well-informed Delegate indispensable upon this floor.

The resources of Alaska in gold, iron, and coal are already known to be very great, if not inexhaustible. She has now the largest stamp mill in existence, and well-informed authorities believe that she will soon produce $10,000,000 in gold annually, and ultimately become one of the greatest gold-producing regions known.

More than 100 species of food fish swarm in her waters. Her salmon, cod, and halibut will feed the world. The annual product of salmon is now over $3,000,000. Her fur-bearing animals now constitute one of the chief sources of supply, and such is the nature of the country that they are not likely ever to become less important.

Some idea of her maritime extent may be derived from the fact that her coast line, including islands, is 26,364 miles in length, while that of all the rest of our country is 7,543 miles.

The population of Alaska was by the census of 1890: White, 4,293; mixed, 1,823; Indian, 23,531; Mongolian, 2,288; all others, 112; total, 32,052.

Governor Sheakley, in his report for the year 1895, estimates the white population at 8,000, of whom 1,500 are in the Yukon Valley. The white immigration is believed now to be more than 10,000, four-fifths of which is located in southeastern Alaska, the city of Juneau alone having upward of 2,000, and there is every indication of its great and continued increase, for the resources of this vast region must continue to attract capital and labor for all time.

The mixed population, generally the offspring of Russian inhabitants who did not elect to return to their natural allegiance after the treaty of cession, and of Indian women, which was 1,823 by the census of 1890, is by the census officials reported to be rapidly diminishing in numbers, and the Indians generally to be not increasing much, if at all. We have, then, a population of at least 10,000 white Americans, nearly all of them citizens of the United States, and by reason of the absence of families an unusual proportion of them entitled to vote, with a prospective increase to which no limits can be placed, inhabiting and developing a region comprising one-sixth the area of the United States, stretching along and commanding the Pacific Ocean and its principal lines of commerce for all time, yet so situated that by reason of her vast extent and great difficulties of intercommunication, her lack of agricultural capabilities, which are the foundation of States, the diverse elements of her population largely such as are at present inadmissible to American citizenship, they can probably never become a State in the Union, or even be benefited by a Territorial form of government—certainly not for many years to come—a population of necessity now and hereafter to be almost wholly dependent upon Congress for legislation, without any voice or representation emanating from the people themselves in framing the laws by which they are governed.

They have not even the power to protest on the floor of Congress against gross neglect to enact important laws imperatively required by their peculiar situation.

Some idea may be obtained of the pressing need that Alaska has of representation on this floor by comparing the business now before Congress from Alaska, much of it of a fundamental nature, relating to titles, taxation, and the preservation of property and good order and the very existence of civilized communities, with the old States and Territories.

Take New York, for instance, with 2 Senators and 34 Representatives. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this session thus far indicates the pendency of 15 bills, memorials, and resolutions of a local nature from that State.

Oklahoma, with her complicated affairs, has 32 pending local matters, while Alaska has 35, including not less than 15 important bills and some that have been pending Congress after Congress because there was no responsible Delegate to give reliable information upon which to base intelligent legislation. As an instance of the actual conditions in Alaska, Governor Sheakley mentions "the city of Juneau, a mining town of 2,000 inhabitants, without any organized or local government whatever." (See report, page 20.)

The unfortunate state of Alaska is owing less to the wilful neglect of Congress than to the lack of reliable sources of information and active representation.

In confirmation of this view we incorporate an extract from a letter of Judge Dulaney, a resident of the Territory for several years, and lately appointed judge of the United States district court of Alaska, who declares in effect that, much as it is needed, there should be no further legislation for the District until she is properly represented on the floor of the House:

"ON BOARD CITY OF TOPEKA, December 7, 1895.

"Concerning legislation for this Territory, I think the energies of all who feel like helping this country should be first directed to securing a Delegate. After that other things will come.

"Truly, yours,

A. K. DULANEY."

We insert a table showing the white and total population of twelve of the States and of the Territory of Arizona at the census nearest the date of their organization as Territories. It will be observed that in many of them the enumeration was made several years after representation by Delegate was accorded, and it is well known that the influx of population was very rapid immediately after their organization. It is not probable that the average white population in these cases at the time of their becoming Territories, with local governments and Delegates in Congress, was over 3,000, while Alaska already has over 10,000 whites.

* Estimated.

The people of the District of Columbia, a less important community to the country at large than Alaska, have two great committees of Congress constantly at their service and are in close contact with all departments of the Government.

Thus it appears that this great and increasing body of isolated American citizens, holding a position and possessing and representing interests not inferior to those of many of the States, local and to the nation at large, present and prospective, and who now require representation more than any other, is the only portion of our countrymen who, like aliens and wild Indians, are absolutely disfranchised in every sense.

One other feature of the condition of our fellow-citizens in Alaska has impressed itself upon us with great force. Most of their relations are direct with the General Government and the people are in constant need of a Delegate of their own choice responsible to them for the attention which their innumerable affairs require at the several Executive Departments in Washington; and not less necessary is it for the Departments that they should be in communication with some one whose duty it is to be correctly informed upon the various subjects which arise.

Accordingly, we find the passage of this bill earnestly supported by the Treasury Department, with which the larger part of the business of Alaska is transacted.

In fact, the honorable Assistant Secretary Hamlin appeared before the committee and very earnestly and conclusively demonstrated the importance of representation being allowed to Alaska on account of her extensive business with that Department, he personally having often found great difficulty in determining the proper line of action for want of some reliable informant upon whom to fix responsibility.

It only remains to explain the working provisions of the bill—a matter attended with some difficulty on account of the vast extent of territory and the widely scattered population.

It may first be observed that the object being to give the people an opportunity to secure a capable and honest Delegate, who will, however, have no voting power, it is not necessary to raise all the delicate questions which might arise in State and national elections.

Whatever is done at the election, all the returns will be in the hands of the House, with power to seat or reject the candidate, as shall be deemed for the best interest of the whole people of Alaska; nor will the provisions of this bill necessarily be operative beyond the first election. Experience will be likely to suggest improvements.

It has been thought best to limit the right to vote in the first election to male citizens of the United States 21 years of age and upward. This rule is simple and safe. To authorize any but citizens to vote is to deprive citizens of their power. This rule will not permit the raising of doubtful questions as to the rights of women and Indians (which may well be considered later on) to perplex the officials at the several voting places, who will be performing their duties for the first time.

The census shows that practically the voters will be white American citizens, native or naturalized.

No question can arise unless in regard to those classed as "mixed Indians," not exceeding 300 or 400 voters, that whole population being 1,823 in the year 1890 and rapidly diminishing. (See Census Report, "Alaska," page xi.)

If they are living as civilized men they may be American citizens under the terms of the treaty with Russia dated March 30, 1867, which provides:

"ART. III. The inhabitants of the ceded territory, according to their choice reserving their natural allegiance, may return to Russia within three years; but if they should prefer to remain in the ceded territory, they, with the exception of the uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion. The uncivilized tribes will be subject to such laws and regulations as the United States may from time to time adopt in regard to aboriginal tribes of that country."

Whether these three or four hundred men (at most) shall vote or not, provided that they are not connected with the uncivilized tribes, can not materially affect the result, as there are probably five or six thousand white American citizens entitled to vote.

The governor, the judge of the district court, the clerk, and the marshal of the district, who are familiar with the treaty, the laws, the status of the inhabitants, and the whole situation are by the bill charged with the establishment of the polling places, the appointment of election boards, and the issuing of all necessary instructions for the conduct of the election.

Mr. Miner W. Bruce, who took the census of southeastern Alaska in 1890, and who is familiar with the whole coast to Point Barrow, in the Arctic Ocean, estimates the whole number of voters at points north of Unalaska at 50 and that not more than 4 polling places for them would be necessary.

Unalaska, the most important port of the Northern Pacific Ocean, and probably to be a great naval station, is 1,250 miles westerly of Sitka, the capital, which is in southeastern Alaska.

The Aleutian Islands stretch 1,000 miles beyond Unalaska toward Asia.

Mr. Bruce is of the opinion that, including Unalaska, 5 polling places only will be required between Unalaska and Sitka to accommodate, as estimated, an aggregate of 199 votes. Southeastern Alaska, including Sitka and Juneau, estimated to contain about 3,000 voters, can be accommodated at 10, while the Yukon Valley, practically including all the rest, will require but 3 or 4 polling places. Thus probably nine-tenths of the voters of the whole District will need but 22 stations.

It would be impossible, making every conceivable allowance for increase of population (since that increase must go mainly to points already occupied), that more than 40 places can be required at the proposed election next October. The bill, however, permits the establishment of not exceeding 100, and limits the cost to $25 each, and the total cost, in any event, to $3,000, including the establishment of stations, fees of election boards, collection of returns, etc., all to be audited by the Treasury Department before payment. It is not probable that the entire expense to the Government can exceed $2,000.

Any further expense must be borne by the people themselves, and as they have no laws for the levy and collection of taxes, it is but right that the United States should provide for the first election. The vast mass of pending legislation concerning Alaska, as well as the great international boundary question (all making a Delegate on this floor so necessary), is morally sure to go over to the short session next winter, when it may be hoped that it will receive consideration.

The bill therefore provides for an election of a Delegate to the short session of this as well as to the Fifty-fifth Congress, and the time is fixed for the election this year in October, although, but for the preliminary work (which will be less hereafter), September would be the better month on account of the shortness of the season.

A mail steamer leaves Unalaska for Sitka October 15, and other conveyance is such from points still more remote that all the returns can be placed in the hands of the governor early in November, which will give opportunity for the Delegate to reach Washington promptly at the opening of the next session, during which, from the postponement of legislation, his services will be of practically the same value as for a full term.

On several occasions Congress has been urged by the people of Alaska to give them representation by a Delegate on the floor of this House. Public meetings, memorials, and the general expression of her representative men, and of many others who know the situation, have prayed for her this privilege—if, indeed, it be not an inherent right—a privilege the exercise of which is as important to the country at large as to herself.

They are the only body of American citizens who have no voice whatever in the making of the laws by which they are governed, and, in view of all the preceding considerations, your committee urge the immediate passage of this bill in order that the necessary preparations may be made for an election next October.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remainder of the report be printed in the RECORD without reading, as I find that it will take up more time than I have to spare.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is at liberty to dispense with the reading of the report—

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like, before proceeding with this any further, to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. I see that there is a provision in the bill for the election of a Delegate to represent that part of the Territory at the remainder of this session of Congress as well as in the next Congress. Now, does the gentleman think it would be desirable to put in operation the machinery of an election to supply a Delegate from that Territory for the remainder of this Congress? And does he think it advisable, especially in view of the fact that it will be necessary to change the date of the election from that on which the election is usually held? Does he not think it better to provide a Delegate to be elected to take his seat at the beginning of the regular session of the next Congress, instead of going through the form and putting in operation the machinery of an election to provide one for the ninety days of this Congress?

Mr. SCRANTON. I will reply by asking the gentleman another question. Do you not think that it would be a good business operation to get a large share of work out of a Delegate, at proportionate cost, at this term of Congress—work that is necessary to be performed for the benefit of that Territory—rather than to wait for the regular session of the next Congress?

Mr. McMILLIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, my observation has led me to conclude, and my experience has shown me in connection with such matters in this House, that men coming to Congress for the first time, and occupying their seats for the ninety days of the short session—the closing days of the Congress—when they are not familiar with the work of Congress are not very likely to accomplish anything of importance. I do not believe it can be done. I have never seen it done yet, and do not think it worth while to try the experiment now.

Furthermore, I would suggest that the gentleman does not seem to take into consideration the remoteness of this Territory, the difficulty of getting here, the time that will necessarily transpire before an election can be held, the machinery put in operation, and the Delegate arrive. It seems to me if we pass this bill at all that it should be prospective in character and apply not to this Congress, but to the coming Congress.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. What has become of the reading of the report, which was commenced?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has withdrawn the request for the further reading of the report.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I listened to this report as far as it was read, was quite interested in it, and would like to hear the rest of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is, of course, entitled to present his views in such manner as he sees fit. If he has presented to the House all of the report that he saw proper to present, he has the right to withdraw the remainder of it.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If I can have time to read the rest of the report, before I am called upon to vote, I would not probably object to the bill. And I insist upon the reading of it unless by unanimous consent it has been dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the reading of the report does not require that kind of proceeding.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then I will take the floor and have it read in my own time.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman can not take the gentleman from Pennsylvania off the floor.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield me the floor for a short time?

Mr. SCRANTON. I have but forty minutes altogether—

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, it appears that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has control of the forty minutes allowed by the House for the consideration of the bill. I hope the gentleman will bear in mind that I would like a few minutes myself.

Mr. SCRANTON. Certainly. How much time—fifteen minutes?

Mr. PERKINS. It would not be unreasonable, I think, to ask fifteen minutes.

Mr. SCRANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa fifteen minutes, and reserve the balance of the time.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to be allowed, before that is done, with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to suggest an amendment to be added at the close of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment, after which the Chair will ask consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4 of the bill insert, in line 6, after the word "audited," the words "by the proper accounting officers upon the approval of the governor."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the offering of the amendment?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not object to this amendment.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. What is the purport of the amendment?

Mr. DOCKERY. Simply to direct the governor to approve the vouchers of the election expenses.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Very well; I will not object to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the amendment? There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill of such general importance that it seems to me it would have been quite proper to have given more time for its consideration. As a member of the Committee on Territories, in the consideration of this bill I could not bring myself to believe that it was prudent or wise action for this House to make the provision recommended here for a Delegate from the Territory of Alaska. I think that the report, a portion of which has been read, itself establishes the incompetency of Alaska for Territorial relations. I read, Mr. Speaker, from the report:

We have, then, a population of at least 10,000 white Americans—

So far as that is concerned, that is an estimate. The alleged census in Alaska in 1890 gave 4,293. The governor, in his report in 1895, estimates the white population at 8,000. It is assumed that it has increased since that time by reason of some immigration to the Yukon Valley. But never mind—nearly all of them citizens of the United States, and by reason of the absence of their families—

They are there temporarily, a migratory people—

an unusual number—

The report continues—

are entitled to vote, with a prospective increase to which no limit can be placed.

Now mark you—

inhabiting and developing a region comprising one-sixth the area of the United States, stretching along and commanding the Pacific Ocean and its principal lines of commerce for all time, yet so situated that by reason of her vast extent and great difficulties of intercommunication, her lack of agricultural capabilities, which are the foundation of states, the diverse elements of her population, largely such as are at present inadmissible to American citizenship, they can probably never become a State in the Union, or even be benefited by a Territorial form of government—certainly not for many years to come.

Therefore we have an admission in this report, supported by all the evidence produced by the most ardent friends of this measure, that Alaska can never be granted a Territorial form of government.

Now, whom will this Territorial Delegate represent? There is now practically no civil government in Alaska. There are, as we understand it, no citizens in Alaska. There are no homes there. There are no titles to property. There is no system of taxation. But so anomalous is this condition of things, that it is provided that we shall place the elective system in the hands of a commission consisting of the governor, the judge of the supreme court, the clerk of the court, and the marshal, who shall make regulations for this election—an election in a Territory one-sixth of the area of the entire United States, with no communication in the interior, and communication practically impossible. They shall establish polling places, and the returns shall be made to these gentlemen; and it is provided that the election shall be in September. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] inquired as to why it should not be held in November. It would be utterly impossible. There is no communication there. You might just as well provide in this bill that Alaska should be represented by a Delegate on this floor as the result of a town meeting in Sitka or Juneau as by an election in the manner provided here.

Alaska now belongs to the United States. It is the property of the United States, and if we have a representative from Alaska he ought to be a representative of the United States Government. Therefore I think this great Territory in its present condition should remain under the control of the Government of the United States. It should be represented here by the great departments of the Government, and not by a selected agent of the Alaskan companies. There may be some advantage to the gentlemen who have gone there for speculative purposes, but no Delegate from Alaska can represent a fixed population as we understand it in the United States, can represent in this Congress the interests of the United States, because they will come in conflict with those companies now seeking to enrich themselves in the mines and in the salmon fisheries. It is represented that these companies engaged in the fisheries there are denuding the streams and leaving the people of that Territory, the real settlers there, to starvation; and so we have representations here from the Treasury Department, asking this Congress to make provision for the protection of those salmon fisheries against the raids of these companies.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. PERKINS. I will yield.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Have there been any petitions sent here from Alaska asking for this legislation?

Mr. PERKINS. I am glad that the gentleman asked that question. To my knowledge not a petition that could be said to emanate from Alaska has been presented here. The gentlemen who are interested in the industries of Alaska have been here. I hold in my hand three reports of the governor of Alaska, and not in one of those reports is there a suggestion of a Delegate from the Territory of Alaska. The reports which I have are for 1893, 1894, and 1895.

Mr. SCRANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I have not the time. I will tell you what they ask. They ask for the appointment of a commission to formulate some sort of civil government for the Territory of Alaska. Here is the recommendation of the governor:

Therefore I would recommend that Congress, either by joint resolution or by bill, empower the governor of the Territory to appoint a commission of five members, who shall be residents of Alaska, and whose duty it shall be to formulate amendments to the organic act of May 17, 1884, and also to prepare a code of laws, both civil and criminal, for the government of the Territory; which amendments and code of laws shall be submitted to Congress for their approval, and unless approved by act of Congress, said amendments and laws shall be null and void.

Mr. HENDERSON. Whose recommendation is that?

Mr. PERKINS. That is the recommendation of the governor of the Territory.

Mr. HERMANN. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HERMANN. I will say to the gentleman that perhaps seven-eighths of the capital invested in the Territory of Alaska is from the people on the Pacific Coast, and perhaps seven-eighths—

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know about that. I can not yield to the gentleman for a statement.

Mr. HERMANN. And perhaps seven-eighths of the population of Alaska is from the Pacific Coast. I will ask the gentleman whether any petitions or memorials are here before his committee from any of these people who are interested in that Territory?

Mr. PERKINS. None whatever.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I would suggest to the gentleman that possibly these corporations do not want representation. May it not be the miners who are there? Are there not 20,000 miners in Alaska who want representation?

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Territories and knows very well from what source the pressure has come for this representation.

Mr. DOCKERY. Can not the gentleman tell us who it is?

Mr. KNOX. Let the House understand where it is from?

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman is a member of the committee and I do not need to explain to him.

Mr. KNOX. Why should you not? You have the whole time.

Mr. PERKINS. I know this—that no representation from the Territory of Alaska, except as brought here by those living in the East and representing mining industries out there, has come before our committee. Nothing like a petition of citizens.

Mr. KNOX. I will ask the gentleman, Do you not know that this bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. PERKINS. I know nothing of the kind.

Mr. KNOX (continuing). And the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Hamlin), who went to Alaska, and who asks for the appointment of this Delegate? Why do you not tell the House that?

Mr. PERKINS. I am willing to say that Assistant Secretary Hamlin was before the committee.

Mr. KNOX. Very well; why do you not tell this House that this bill meets with the approval of those who have any experience in looking after the interests of the Government there?

Mr. PERKINS. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is practically impossible to hold anything like a popular election in that Territory. Everyone who knows anything about that Territory will appreciate and realize that fact. If we are to have a Delegate here, let us have him in an honest way. Let the governor appoint him, or the Secretary of the Treasury appoint him, or the people in Juneau or Sitka designate who he shall be, but such a thing as a popular election in the Territory of Alaska is out of the question. I do not believe that it is to the advantage of this Congress or this country to appoint a Delegate or to permit the agents of these companies to have access to this floor and to our committees for the purpose of advancing their interest against the interest of the United States in that Territory.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCORMICK. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. PERKINS. My time has expired.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa if the first election in each of our Territories has not been attended with difficulties of many kinds?

Mr. PERKINS. Not equal to those to be encountered in Alaska.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, this detached territory of so great proportions, with its immense coast line, purchased of Russia for $7,200,000 by Secretary Seward in 1867 and named by Charles Sumner Alaska, is a valuable possession. It has repaid us richly for the investment and is entitled to our protection and fostering care. Congress has legislated for its native Indians, its Russian half-breeds, its salmon, seal, and reindeer, but beyond granting an incomplete and inadequate form of civil government in 1884 nothing has been done for its white citizens. Since the rich gold development in southeastern Alaska thousands have been attracted to its mining camps and towns and to-day its white population is estimated at 10,000.

The residents of Alaska have repeatedly memorialized Congress for rights and privileges to which they are entitled as American citizens. These memorials have been expressions of the people of Alaska, without regard to party affiliation, in Territorial convention assembled. These conventions have each time chosen a Delegate to come to Washington as their representative. The first instance I have alluded to was in 1882; the last was at Juneau, November 5, 1894. In every instance their first and paramount request has been for representation in Congress by a Delegate to be elected by the people.

Mr. TRACEY. I would like to ask the gentlemen a question, with his permission.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. TRACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. SCRANTON. I have not much time to spare.

Mr. TRACEY. Who are the people of Alaska, and about how many of them would likely participate in an election held to elect a Delegate to Congress?

Mr. SCRANTON. I think I will answer that later in the course of my remarks. I hold in my hand a certified copy of the proceedings of the convention at Juneau, at which they elected Colonel Nowell, a mining operator, to represent them in Washington.

They need a new code of laws, extending to Alaska the laws of Oregon, amending jurisdiction of United States commissioners' courts, securing appeals in civil cases from United States commissioners' courts to United States district courts. They want a land office, mail facilities, high liquor license, and the right of acquiring a homestead to actual settlers on unoccupied lands, and much else. But above all they ask for representation in Congress. In their opinion that is their proper starting point, and after gaining it other needed aid will follow.

It is argued against them that it will not do to trust these 10,000 American voters with the ballot, lest they should be corrupted by corporate influence and elect as Delegate some capitalist whose wealth is employed in developing the gold mines of Alaska, and in thus contributing to support the people and to attract others thither. Suppose they should elect some such representative of the money power which has peopled Alaska with white American citizens, and suppose further that their chosen Delegate was a nonresident of Alaska during the severe winter months. Does it follow that such a person would not ably, creditably, and acceptably serve his constituency? Are not their interests identical, although the one may be rich and the many poor? Or would the blatant demagogue be preferable, whose self-appointed guardianship over the people is always mischievous and disappointing. The hardy miners, fishermen, and traders of Alaska can be as safely trusted with the ballot as can the voters of any section of our country. The people can be depended upon to attend to the personnel of their representative in Congress, and no argument to the contrary can be made which will not apply to districts all over the United States.

This cheap statesmanship would not be tolerated in any country but ours. When Russia owned Alaska her soldiers garrisoned its gateways, the Czar's edict none dared question in her waters, there was no piracy of seals from Russia. Ten years after we acquired Alaska our troops were withdrawn; it has had no military post since; it has no telegraphic communication with the rest of the world and only one light-house on its whole coast. Had not President Polk receded from his pledge to establish our northern boundary at "Fifty-four forty or fight," there would to-day have been no British Columbia and the United States would have had continuous frontage on the Pacific Ocean from the southern line of California to Bering Strait. Had the map been constructed as any nation but ours would have compelled it to have been, we would have had no piratical destruction of our rich seal fisheries and no Bering Sea question for arbitration. There would have been no Canadian Pacific Railway to divert American traffic and no Canadian Pacific steamship lines to share our coast and ocean trade. As it is, Great Britain has 600 miles of coast between Washington and Alaska, and since the gold development in southeastern Alaska, she has trumped up a dispute over the boundary line and would crowd us into the Pacific Ocean and rob us of most of our Alaskan gold.

Let us look after our own; this is natural, it is right; nay, rather, it is our duty. Let us give this great Northwest Territory a voice to represent it on this floor. We have lost too much already by a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy to suffer its continuance. The expense of the proposed election is well guarded in the bill, being limited to $3,000, and probably will not exceed $2,000. This cost is a small item in comparison with accruing benefits. If Alaska is worth having, it certainly is worth caring for and fostering. What is Alaska's value to the United States?

First, let us consider the great importance of Alaska, by reason of its geographical location and characteristics, to the commercial prosperity and common defense of the whole country. San Francisco is situated easterly of the center of our possessions and Alaska flanks the great line of Pacific travel between America and Asia. The Aleutian Islands extend within less than 1,000 miles of the Asiatic ports, and the naval and coaling stations, really important to us in the control of the commerce and dominion of the Pacific Ocean, must be located upon Alaskan soil. Alaska is the Gibraltar of the Pacific Ocean; and if we properly appreciate and utilize her natural advantages it matters little to us who controls Hawaii or any other of the Pacific possessions. Pearl Harbor, in the Sandwich Islands, is 2,000 miles south of the great northern route of Pacific travel. The superb harbor of Unalaska is within 100 miles of the same route and is 1,000 miles nearer to Asia. Unalaska is one of the great harbors of the world, and there is likely to be the actual location of the "sea power" of the Pacific Ocean hereafter. Coal is found in various parts of Alaska, and it is most likely not only that she will supply her own coaling stations, but also those of the Pacific Ocean generally.

Again, despite the fact that in Alaska land can neither be bought nor preempted (thus virtually prohibiting immigration), that its lumber can not be exported, and that mining and fishing are the only industries permitted, yet Alaska stands alone among our "bloodless acquisitions" in having yielded a revenue from the beginning. The lease of the tiny seal islands has yielded 4 per cent interest on the sum originally paid for the whole Territory, which, in the end, has returned an equal amount—seven millions—to the Treasury. For more than ten years the gold mines have been producing an average of $1,000,000 a year; and for the past ten years the salmon and other fisheries have yielded an annual product valued at $2,000,000.

Since the United States purchased Alaska, that almost unknown region, extending "westward to the far East," has contributed from ninety to one hundred million dollars to the wealth of the world. In the last census report the value of the products of Alaska from 1868 to 1890 is given as follows:

Furs	$48,518,929
Canned salmon	9,008,497
Salted salmon	603,548
Codfish	1,246,650
Ivory	147,047
Gold and silver	4,631,840
Whale oil	2,853,351
Whalebone	8,204,067
Aggregate	75,213,929

Since 1890 its mines and fisheries have yielded $5,000,000 annually, which brings its total output since we have owned it to a round billion dollars.

Mr. Speaker, shall not Congress pay some heed to the petitions of the citizens of such a country as Alaska? Shall we longer slight our valuable Northwestern possessions, while England is steadily lavishing money on British Columbia by constructing wagon roads, extending the telegraph and mail service, and subsidizing Canadian Pacific steamships? Can we not learn much by observing the zealous care for every inch of its possessions exercised by the British Empire, upon which the sun never sets?

I have briefly noticed the salient points in Alaska's resources and natural advantages, and have endeavored to show by recorded facts her wonderful wealth. If her chrysalis civil condition and hitherto retarded development have produced such results as we have seen, what may we not expect of her future? The two great political parties have given Alaska the only recognition thus far received by according her representatives seats in their national conventions at Minneapolis and Chicago in 1892. Alaska has a voice upon our national committees and will be again accorded a place in our national conventions of this year. Does not this precedent commit both Republicans and Democrats to the policy of giving her a voice in this House and to the passage of this bill? In order that the Government may grasp and make available to capital and industry the resources that are within easy reach in that Territory it is of great importance that Congress should take immediate steps to accord her a Delegate who can give information as to what can be done and should be done in Alaska's interest.

Mr. Speaker, Alaska will produce more gold this year alone than the price paid for it. Last year her gold output was between four and five millions, and this year it will exceed $7,000,000. She has eight corporations mining gold, all of them representing American capital excepting the Treadwell, one-half of which is owned in Europe. They employ 2,000 men, have 540 stamps, and are producing now $3,000,000 of gold a year. The placer miners greatly outnumber the quartz miners, and represent 7,000 men at work on their own account. These 7,000 placer miners average $1,000 profit each per year above their living and other expenses, thus giving to the world seven millions more annually of gold. Alaska's contribution of gold during 1896 may reach $10,000,000. Her fish and furs will yield five million more. The prospects of Alaska's future are wonderful; her recent development is marvelous; her people are of the best class of hardy pioneers, necessarily, because of the cost and difficulty of getting there. They are thorough Americans, who will fight if need be for our rights as a nation. They look to Congress for the privileges guaranteed to American citizens. Let their appeal be no longer in vain.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. SCRANTON. I hope the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. What necessity is there for the election of a Delegate in October? Why not amend the bill so as to provide for the election of a Delegate at the next Congressional election?

Mr. SCRANTON. The election is to be held at the next election.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky (continuing). He would only be here three months, and then it would cost, as I understand, some $5,000 or $6,000 for him to come here.

Mr. SCRANTON. That is not a material point.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Before you take your seat I hope you will accept an amendment of that kind.

Mr. SCRANTON. If an amendment of that kind is offered I will accept it.

The SPEAKER. It will be necessary, if the gentleman accepts the amendment, to have it presented at once.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I have an amendment I want to offer to the second section, providing for the election of a Delegate at the next regular election, and to dispense with the election in October.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say, if the gentleman will allow me, that the climatic conditions are such in that Territory that they can not possibly hold an election in November. The bill provides for an election in September.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The bill provides to elect at the October election, but it also reads that the election shall be held on the first Tuesday in September in each year. Therefore, I will make my amendment so as to read the first Tuesday in September in each year.

Mr. SCRANTON. I accept that amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have prepared an amendment to the same effect, but as the gentleman from Kentucky has offered one, I will not offer mine.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that unless there is an amendment made to that provision this Delegate, if he be elected for three months, will draw $10,000.

Mr. SCRANTON. There is a provision in the bill already to prevent that.

Mr. DOCKERY. I was about to propose an amendment, but if the gentleman from Kentucky desires to offer it, I will yield to him.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will, at the proper time, move to strike out these words:

That the first Delegate shall be chosen for the remainder of the term of the Fifty-fourth Congress and for the full term of the Fifty-fifth Congress at the same election; and each succeeding Delegate shall be chosen for the full term of the Congress next succeeding his election.

There will remain section 3, which provides—

That the first election of such Delegate shall be held on the 1st day of October, in the year 1896, and thereafter such elections shall be held on the first Tuesday of September in each year when the members of the House of Representatives are chosen.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be considered as pending. [A pause.] The time for debate has expired, and the gentleman from Kentucky will present his amendment.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has prepared an amendment which covers the same ground as the one I was about to offer.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out, in lines 1 and 2, section 2, after the word "chosen," the following: "For the remainder of the term of the Fifty-fourth Congress and"; also, section 2, line 3, strike out the words "at the same election"; also strike out all after the word "held" in line 2, section 3, down to and including the word "held," in line 3, section 3; also strike out the words "in each year," in line 4 of section 3, and insert "in the year 1896."

Mr. DOCKERY. I will read this part of the bill as it will stand if the amendment is adopted:

SEC. 2. That the first Delegate shall be chosen for the full term of the Fifty-fifth Congress, and each succeeding Delegate shall be chosen for the full term of the Congress next succeeding his election.

SEC. 3. That the first election of such Delegate shall be held on the first Tuesday of September in the year 1896, when the members of the House of Representatives are chosen.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. That is acceptable to me.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to offer amendments unless by unanimous consent, the vote having been ordered.

The question was taken on the engrossment and third reading of the bill; and the Speaker declared that he was in doubt.

A division was called for.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. BARRETT. Amendments are not in order now, I believe.

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. OWENS. I ask consent to offer this amendment:

Provided, however, That the mileage allowed said Delegate shall in no case exceed $1,500.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this amendment?

Mr. McCORMICK. I object.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, the Speaker declared that the yeas seemed to have it.

On a division there were—ayes 44, noes 60.

So the House declined to order the bill to a third reading.

FOREIGN EXHIBITS AT TENNESSEE CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the joint resolution H. Res. 167, having fully considered the same, report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The purpose of the resolution is to allow foreign exhibitors at the Tennessee Centennial Exposition to exhibit their goods without payment of import duties, and to allow custodians and artisans in charge of said exhibits to come to and remain in this country, by employment, while making the exhibits.

The resolution is similar to the one for a like purpose passed by Congress in connection with the World's Columbian Exposition held at Chicago, and others. It is thoroughly guarded by the usual provision for payment of duties in case of sale, etc., and should pass.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 167) authorizing foreign exhibitors at the Tennessee Centennial Exposition, to be held in Nashville, Tenn., in 1897, to bring to this country foreign laborers from their respective countries for the purpose of preparing for and making their exhibits, and allowing articles imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at said exposition to be imported free of duty, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Whereas the Tennessee Centennial Exposition Company of Nashville, Tenn., have extended invitations which have been accepted by the several nations, and space for installing foreign exhibits has been applied for and duly apportioned, and concessions and privileges granted by the exposition management to the citizens and subjects of foreign nations; and

Whereas for the purpose of securing the production upon the exposition grounds of scenes illustrative of the architecture, dress, habits, and modes of life, occupation, industries, means of locomotion and transportation, amusements, entertainments, etc., of the natives of foreign countries, it has been necessary for the Tennessee Centennial Exposition Company to grant concessions and privileges to certain firms and corporations conceding the right to make such productions: Therefore

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the act of Congress approved February 23, 1885, prohibiting the importation of foreigners under contract to perform labor, and the acts of Congress prohibiting the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, and the acts amendatory of these acts, shall not be so construed, nor shall anything therein operate to prevent, hinder, or in anywise restrict any foreign exhibitor, representative, or citizen of a foreign nation, or the holder, who is a citizen of a foreign nation, of any concession or privilege from the Tennessee Centennial Exposition Company, of Nashville, Tenn., from bringing into the United States, under contract, such mechanics, artisans, agents, or other employees, natives of their respective foreign countries, as they, or any of them, may deem necessary for the purpose of making preparations for installing or conducting their exhibits or of preparing for installing or conducting any business authorized or permitted under or by virtue of or pertaining to any concession or privilege which may have been granted by the Tennessee Centennial Exposition Company, of Nashville, Tenn., in connection with such exposition: Provided, however, That no alien shall by virtue of this act enter the United States under contract to perform labor except by express permission, naming such alien, of the Secretary of the Treasury; and any such alien who may remain in the United States for more than one year after the close of said exposition shall thereafter be subject to all the processes and penalties applicable to aliens coming in violation of the alien-contract-labor law aforesaid.

SEC. 2. That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at said exposition, upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty, shall be admitted free of payment of duty, customs fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exhibition to sell, for delivery at the close of the exposition, any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings or on its grounds, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That all such articles, when sold or withdrawn for consumption in the United States, shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such article by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation, and all penalties prescribed by law shall be applied and enforced against such articles and against the persons who may be guilty of any illegal sale or withdrawal.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the resolution, and will state that it varies in no material particular from the bill introduced for a similar purpose for the International Exposition at Chicago and the Exposition at Baltimore. It is sufficiently guarded in all respects. It meets the approval of the Treasury officials, and it is the unanimous report of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is the ordinary bill in these cases.

Mr. McMILLIN. As stated by the chairman of the committee, it is the ordinary bill for the purpose of allowing foreign exhibitors to bring their exhibits here and place them on exhibition.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McMILLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. PAYNE in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8110) to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate having been closed by order of the House, the bill will now be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. MEANING OF WORDS AND PHRASES.—a The words and phrases used in this act and in proceedings pursuant hereto shall, unless the same be inconsistent with the context, be construed as follows: (1) "A person against whom a petition has been filed" shall include a person who has filed a voluntary petition; (2) "adjudication" shall mean the date of the entry of a decree that the defendant, in a bankruptcy proceeding, is a bankrupt, or if such decree is appealed from, then the date when such decree is finally confirmed; (3) "appellate courts" shall include the circuit courts of appeals of the United States, the supreme courts of the Territories, and the Supreme Court of the United States; (4) "bankrupt" shall include a person against whom an involuntary petition or an application to set a composition aside or to revoke a discharge has been filed, or who has filed a voluntary petition, or who has been adjudged a bankrupt; (5) "clerk" shall mean the clerk of a court of bankruptcy; (6) "corporations" shall mean all bodies having any of the powers and privileges of private corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships; (7) "court" shall mean the court of bankruptcy in which the proceedings are pending and may include the referee; (8) "courts of bankruptcy" shall include the district courts of the United States and of the Territories, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and the United States court of the Indian Territory; (9) "creditor" shall include any one who owns a demand or claim provable in bankruptcy and his duly authorized agent, attorney, or proxy; (10) "date of bankruptcy," or "time of bankruptcy," or "commencement of proceedings," or "bankruptcy" with reference to time, shall mean the date when the petition was filed; (11) "debt" shall include any debt, demand, or claim provable in bankruptcy; (12) "defeat" shall include defraud or delay, evade, hinder, and impede with intent to defraud; (13) "discharge" shall mean the release of a bankrupt from all of his debts which are provable in bankruptcy except such as are excepted by this act; (14) "document" shall include book, deed, and instrument in writing; (15) "holiday" shall include Christmas, the Fourth of July, the 22d of February, and any day appointed by the President of the United States as a holiday or as a day of public fasting or thanksgiving; (16) "insolvent," as applied to a person, shall mean that his property is not sufficient in amount, at a fair valuation, to pay his debts, and when insolvency is to be inquired into with reference to an act of bankruptcy it shall be determined as of the date of the filing of the petition; (17) "judge" shall mean a judge of a court of bankruptcy, not including the referee; (18) "oath" shall include affirmation; (19) "officer" shall include clerk, marshal, receiver, referee, and trustee, and the imposing of a duty upon or the forbidding of an act by any officer shall include his successor and any person authorized by law to perform the duties of such officer; (20) "person" shall include corporations, officers, partnerships, and women, and when used with reference to the commission of acts which are herein forbidden shall include persons who are participants in the forbidden acts, and the agents, officers, and members of the board of directors or trustees, or other similar controlling bodies of corporations; (21) "petition" shall mean a paper filed in a court of bankruptcy or with a clerk or deputy clerk by a debtor praying for the benefits of this act, or by creditors alleging the commission of an act of bankruptcy by a debtor therein named; (22) "referee" shall mean the referee who has jurisdiction of the case or to whom the case has been referred, or any one acting in his stead; (23) "secrete" shall include conceal, falsify, mutilate, remove, and suppress; (24) "secured creditor" shall include a creditor who has security for his debt upon the property of the bankrupt of a nature to be assignable under this act, or who owns such a debt for which some indorser, surety, or other person secondarily liable for the bankrupt has such security upon the bankrupt's assets; (25) "States" shall include the Territories, the Indian Territory, and the District of Columbia; (26) "transfer" shall include the sale and every other and different mode of disposing of or parting with property, or the possession of property, absolutely or conditionally, as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift, or security and the creation of a lien on property by any means other than by compulsory process prosecuted in good faith; (27) "trustee" shall include all of the trustees of an estate; (28) "wage earner" shall mean an individual who works for wages, salary, or hire, at a rate of compensation not exceeding $1,500 per year; (29) words importing the masculine gender may be applied to and include corporations, partnerships, and women; (30) words importing the plural number may be applied to and mean only a single person or thing; (31) words importing the singular number may be applied to and mean several persons or things, and (32) words which are given a meaning or made to include other words herein, when used in one tense, shall have a corresponding meaning when used in any other tense.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 54, on page 3, after the word "include," strike out the word "corporations."

Also strike out lines 58 and 59, on page 4.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for two reasons. In the first place, there is no necessity for including corporations in this bankruptcy act, because all the States of the Union, with perhaps one or two exceptions, provide for the appointment of receivers of corporations in all cases where the corporation is insolvent. But the principal reason that I urge for the adoption of this amendment is that by the terms of this bill anyone can petition a corporation into bankruptcy; and yet, under the bill, it can receive no relief from any debt that it owes. By the terms of the bill, a corporation is precluded from filing a petition for discharge, and it is expressly provided that a corporation shall not be discharged from any debt that it may owe. Now, I submit whether it is a proper thing for a corporation to be forced into bankruptcy under the provisions of this bill when no relief whatever can be given it? I call attention to the provision in regard to discharge on page 15:

A person not a corporation may after the expiration of two months and within the next four months subsequent to being adjudged a bankrupt file an application for his discharge.

That provision denies to every corporation the right to file a petition for discharge. Section 16, on page 17, provides that—

A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt not a corporation from all of his provable debts, except, etc.

Now, I submit that the laws of all the States provide ample means for taking charge of the property of an insolvent corporation, for placing it in the hands of a receiver, and distributing it equitably among the creditors. There is no reason why under this bill a corporation should be forced into bankruptcy when no relief can be given it according to the terms of the very law under which it is placed in bankruptcy. All the private banks in this country are subject to the provisions of this law. National banks are excluded; but there are numerous banks in every State and Territory that may be forced into bankruptcy under the bill. Railroad corporations, all sorts of business corporations, may be placed in bankruptcy and stripped of their property without any relief whatever—left with all their debts standing against them as they were before they were petitioned into bankruptcy. I say it is right and fair, inasmuch as these matters are covered by State law, that the provisions to which I have referred should not be retained in this bill.

It has been suggested that corporations may be relieved from their indebtedness under such circumstances by amendments further on. But there is this difficulty in regard to that suggestion, most of the States provide for a double liability upon stock. Nearly all banking corporations are subject to such a provision. This is a security that goes to the creditor; and the assignee in bankruptcy could not collect that, because it is not an asset of the bank. Therefore the difficulty in relieving a corporation from indebtedness will be insurmountable. The only fair and just way, it seems to me, is to strike out the word "corporation" in this bill, and let such matters be taken care of under the State law. I submit it is not a proper thing to force corporations into bankruptcy, and then after stripping them of their property give them no relief.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this first section is to provide a definition or dictionary of terms used throughout the bill, so as to save frequent repetition. By this single section we save the use of many hundreds of words. The definition here in clause 20, page 3, which the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas aims at, provides that—

Persons shall include corporations.

The gentleman proposes to strike out that provision, and also to strike out in lines 58 and 59, on page 4 (the gentleman will correct me if I have misunderstood him), the words—

And the agents, officers, and members of the board of directors or trustees or other similar controlling bodies of corporations.

The purpose of those two lines, as will be seen from reading the context, is to bring within the provisions of the definition the only parties that can represent corporations—the agents, officers, and members of the board of directors or trustees. This is clearly right.

Now, wherever the word "person" is used it should, as it seems to me, apply clearly to corporations. Where an exception is intended as to corporations, the words of the bill expressly state the exception. I can see no harm to come from this proposition unless section 13 is to be amended; and even then it can do no harm, because the exceptions treat of the matter specifically. But the gentleman's real aim is to affect section 13, on page 15, which I ask members of the committee to turn to.

His objection is that the word "corporation" should be stricken out of the bill, because, while we give power to throw them into bankruptcy, yet we do not, under the operation of the law, provide that they may be discharged. Now, the objection I have to his amendment is, as I understand it, that the corporation, while it may not voluntarily go into bankruptcy and invoke the powers of the bill in its own behalf, may be thrown in under certain circumstances. Why? Because its assets can be thus placed within reach of the court for the benefit of the creditor. Then the question arises, when they are thrown into a state of bankruptcy, why you can not discharge them after the property has been disposed of.

Mr. Chairman, the answer to that question involves a consideration of the State laws. These corporations are all organized under the laws of their several respective States. The bill aims to get at their assets, just as it reaches the assets of the individual, but leaves them in their defunct, dead capacity, to be wound up according to the laws of the respective States under which they have received their charters. And it was thought when this bill was framed that it was not a wise provision to go beyond the mere act of reaching for their property and providing for the distribution of it among their creditors, as a protection to the public, and then leave the State to wind up the concern, if it so desired, according to its laws.

But why should we grant them a discharge in bankruptcy? What is to be gained by it? The liability of the shareholders is fixed by the laws of the several States by which the corporations are organized. There is a certain point with reference to that beyond which you can not go. All that we seek is to protect the rights of the creditor; to prevent fraud in the disposition of the property; and the rights of the companies themselves can be fixed afterwards by the laws of the States from which they have their being.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Is it not true that the laws of all the States provide, in regard to the winding up of these companies, for the appointment of receivers in all cases where a corporation becomes insolvent, and the estate of the corporation is distributed in that way for the benefit of the creditors?

Mr. HENDERSON. That may be true, and that would be the process, of course, if we had not in operation such a law as this. But having a bankrupt law, we want to reach, by a general provision, the assets of all debtors, and we did not think that a corporation, being a debtor, ought to be allowed to escape.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. But do you not want to be fair to all debtors and give them equal relief under the operations of the bill?

Mr. HENDERSON. Ah, but the corporation is peculiar in this: It is a person created by the law, a sort of fictitious person. No harm can come to them by the operation of this provision of the bill, for they still owe their being and existence to State laws. They invoke from the State this form of creating an artificial person for the purpose of transacting business within the States. They are put on the same footing by this bill as the citizen is, simply that it seeks to bring all of the estates of all bodies into a court having a uniform system for distribution amongst the creditors.

Now, the corporation, as I have already said, owes its life to the laws of the State. They can not complain. They can change the name of the corporation if it becomes insolvent, and if they can acquire means to do so may go on with their business if they so desire. We only do, by the operation of this law, by this particular provision, what we are doing for all others—that is, we get possession of the assets and distribute them amongst the creditors.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is not a wise one and should not be adopted.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask my colleague this question: Does not this place the corporation at a great disadvantage, to put them in a state of bankruptcy, but give them none of the benefits of the act?

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. That is exactly the point.

Mr. HEPBURN. The general benefit to be derived—that is, a discharge by the bankruptcy proceedings—is withheld from the corporation.

Mr. HENDERSON. We do not discharge them, and we can not afford to discharge them. The bill does not seek to do that.

Mr. HEPBURN. No; that is just the point.

Now, suppose that under the law of the State the corporation is in the hands of a receiver; it must have committed, therefore, some one of the bankrupt acts defined in this bill. Being in the hands of the receiver, in your judgment is it still liable to be proceeded against under the operation of the bankrupt law?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly. It would be exactly as in a similar case pending against an individual. If it be for the best interest of the estate, the court can direct the trustee to appear, and the proceedings of the trustee may be stayed until the case can be disposed of by the court, or the question is determined as to what is the best interest of the estate.

Mr. HEPBURN. But it is impracticable at times to stay the proceedings of a receivership.

Mr. HENDERSON. That would be entirely in the discretion of the court. It might direct the trustee to appear and represent the interest of the estate.

Mr. HEPBURN. But is there not liability to a conflict of jurisdiction in the court which obtained control of the estate and had the appointment of the receiver and the one which seeks jurisdiction by bankruptcy?

Mr. HENDERSON. There can be none possible. Congress clearly has the power, under the Constitution, to establish this system, which takes precedence of all others. It is not like a conflict between State courts, where the rule applies that the first court that gets possession has control and custody. It is simply regulated by the general law, which the Constitution gives us the power to enact.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I think there are two objections to this amendment. The first is that this section merely defines the meaning of certain terms. The evil of which my friend complains would be reached by amending the provisions of this bill further along; but it seems to me that in the discussion of this matter our friends lose sight of the nature and character of a corporation. The corporations that could and would be put into bankruptcy are corporations that have been created for business purposes. When the shareholders of a corporation have paid up the total amount of the stock which they have respectively subscribed, that is the end of any and all liability on their part. The assets of the corporation consist of its property and the unpaid stock which has been subscribed.

When a corporation has been placed in bankruptcy, and a trustee has been appointed, he can not only take into his possession the tangible property of the corporation, but he can sue and recover any unpaid portion of the stock which has been subscribed by the respective individual shareholders. When the assets of the corporation are all in the hands of the trustee, it is perfectly immaterial whether that corporation have a discharge or not, because when you have deprived a business corporation of all of its property there is nothing remaining with which it can do business in the future. It can not levy an assessment upon its shareholders, because each and every one of them has paid up the full amount of stock that he has subscribed, and that ends any appeal to that source. Consequently, when a corporation becomes insolvent, and its property has been taken by a trustee and paid out to its creditors, the corporation is no longer in any condition to do business. It is, for all practical purposes, dead, and it is immaterial whether it has a discharge or not. If the same persons who compose the corporation desire to form another corporation, they can do it and can again subscribe to the capital stock, but that will be a separate and distinct entity. There would be no way by which the persons composing the practically defunct corporation could obtain any property with which to further carry on their business except by common consent.

It seems to me, then, first, because this section is merely a dictionary of terms, that the amendment ought not to prevail, and second, that the object and purpose contemplated by an amendment to that section which provides that a corporation may be placed in bankruptcy, and an amendment to that other section which says that a corporation shall not be discharged, granting a discharge would have no practical effect.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Let me ask my friend from Missouri one question. Is it not a fact that a creditor, wishing to have the assets of a corporation equitably distributed, can do so just as well through the State courts, in winding up that corporation, as through the bankruptcy law, and even better, to this extent: that in the State courts, in a proceeding against a corporation, with a receiver appointed, he could secure possibly the additional asset consisting of any value that might attach to the franchise, which could not be secured in this bankruptcy proceeding?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. I think not; and further, in answer to the gentleman's question, let me suggest that the assets of a corporation may have been transferred by the board of directors to some one who is not a resident of the territory over which the State court has jurisdiction; and your receiver has no power or authority outside of the jurisdiction of the court that appoints him. In that case your receiver under your State law is in no condition to follow the assets that have been improperly transferred to some one residing in some other State.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Would not that create a personal liability on the part of the directors who would do such an act as that?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. A liability which would bring them both within the laws of the State courts and also into the bankruptcy proceedings personally?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Exactly; it might create a personal liability, but that is no argument. The liability might be there, and the directors individually might be absolutely insolvent, and that would do you no good.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Does the gentleman from Missouri claim here as a lawyer that the receiver of a State court has no power to enter other States to sue and recover the assets of a bankrupt corporation?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Except by the comity of a State into which he may go. For instance, I say to my friend that a receiver appointed by the district court of Kansas in his district has no jurisdiction in the State of Missouri as a matter of right.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the last proposition made, I will say that it has been my fortune within the last few months to be interested in a case in Kansas City, Mo., where a receiver of a Kansas City (Kans.) company went into Missouri and sued there an officer of the bank for fraudulently concealing and disposing of the property of the bank; and it is well-settled law now—although in times past it may have been claimed that it could not be done—that a receiver appointed by the court under the law of a State has the right to go into any State in the Union and sue and recover the assets of the bankrupt.

Mr. KNOX. Does not the gentleman know that a corporation established under United States law, when it is being operated by a receiver in the jurisdiction of one State, has no standing in the courts of another State except by comity?

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. I will answer the argument that my friend from Missouri makes, that this is simply a dictionary term and cuts no figure in this case. I have always found that when you come to definitions of terms, it becomes very important in a law of this kind, a provision that we seek to amend, as to whether a person would include a corporation. Now, then, we turn to a petition in bankruptcy, and we see that a petition may be filed against a person who commits an act of bankruptcy, and under the definition this gives the right to file a petition against a corporation as a bankrupt, and without that definition it is very doubtful whether it could be done or not. Therefore this amendment is proper and ought to be sustained.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment, for the purpose of asking a question. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill what would be the effect of leaving in the definition which has just been assailed? I direct his special attention to railroad corporations which are now in the hands of receivers. Would not the effect of this bill be ipso facto to take all the authority out of the hands of those receivers, the property from their hands, and vest the management of the railroad corporation now in the hands of the receiver appointed by the bankrupt court? It seems to me that it is opening up a very wide question, and one which can hardly be disposed of in this desultory way.

Mr. BLUE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I trust I may have an answer to my question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States in relation to Congress vests it in the fundamental law, with the power to adopt a general law to reach the estate of debtors. A corporation under this bill may be reached through an involuntary proceeding; and the same thought advanced by my friend from Nebraska was included in the question of my colleague from Iowa.

Mr. RAY. Will my colleague allow me?

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Let him answer the question.

Mr. RAY. Ah! You have had your attention called to it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes; I know the point that my colleagues are making. We have this in the last clause of the bill, on page 63:

This act shall go into effect upon its passage as to the promulgation of rules, forms, and orders and the appointment of referees, and the designation of the districts in which they shall respectively have jurisdiction; and the expiration of six months after its passage as to all its other provisions, except that no cognizance shall be taken pursuant to its provisions of the act of persons so far as they constitute acts of bankruptcy or offenses as herein defined prior to the date when the act shall go into full force and effect.

That answers one feature of the question. It will not operate on those which are in existence now or prior to the time limited before going into effect. This point I take it is true—that in the event of a receiver being appointed for a railroad or any other corporation included in this definition, if they are in that condition, a proceeding in bankruptcy being commenced against it, if an act of bankruptcy has been committed, of course it is a fact which must be established first. I do not see why it would not be reached the same as any other individual, or why it should not be. I do not see why an exception should be made. Now, that does not affect the question of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Let me ask my friend another question at this point. Is there any provision for the continuation of the business of a bankrupt?

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. That is the point exactly.

Mr. HENDERSON. No.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. In your bill, as you have drafted it, if it includes these railroad corporations which are now in the hands of a receiver, if either the railroad company or its receiver should commit acts which are specified as acts of bankruptcy in this bill, the receiver could not continue to operate the railroad at all after filing a petition in bankruptcy, and this could be filed by any one creditor.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is to be filed by three creditors.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It could be three or a half a dozen. I suppose they could file a petition in bankruptcy, and establish that his acts were acts of bankruptcy. It would be a matter of record in the courts. There are no adequate provisions for carrying on the business of bankrupt corporations through the agents of the bankruptcy court. It would necessarily follow that every railroad which is now in the hands of a receiver would have to suspend business entirely, and could not carry on the business of transportation at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. How would it be with railroads that are not in the hands of receivers? Would it not be the same?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It might be. Any railroad which committed an act of bankruptcy would be prevented from transacting any of its business thereafter, and it seems to me that the very statement of the proposition is a conclusive argument in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. RAY. It seems to me that the gentleman is entirely mistaken in his conclusions. It should be remembered—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

[Mr. BLUE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy any considerable time, but simply to say a word or two in answer to some of the objections that have been raised. Of course I am considerably surprised to see the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] taking up the cudgel here in favor of corporations. I know of no good reason why corporations should not be subjected to the provisions of this bill so far as its involuntary features are concerned.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would you include railroad corporations as well as others?

Mr. RAY. I think no exception is made in the bill, and I do not see any reason for excepting railroad corporations.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then do you not encounter this difficulty, that where you force a railroad corporation into bankruptcy in one jurisdiction the same may be done in another jurisdiction, or in five or six separate jurisdictions, through which the railroad may pass, so that you may have five or six different receivers operating the same road?

Mr. KNOX. No; there is only one jurisdiction.

Mr. TAWNEY. You may have the same railroad company in different bankrupt courts, and you will have a conflict of jurisdiction between the several receivers, just as we have at the present time in the case of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. RAY. No; there is no such difficulty as that which is suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota. This bill provides that United States courts shall take jurisdiction in these cases, and in the county where the individual lives or in the district most convenient. The United States court in one jurisdiction or one district having taken jurisdiction, of course no other United States court will take hold of the case or attempt to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why not?

Mr. RAY. Because the United States courts possess some sense, and the judges in one district, when an assignment has been made, or proceedings have been taken against the corporation and a trustee appointed under the laws of the United States, with full power to operate the road, will say that is enough, and will not attempt to take jurisdiction or to entertain proceedings in another district, even though the railroad does run through that district. The jurisdiction in the one district would be exclusive of all the others.

Mr. TAWNEY. You do not make it so in your bill.

Mr. RAY. It has been universally so held in the State courts, and also in the United States courts.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, in reference to that proposition, I call attention to the situation with regard to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. A receiver was appointed by Judge Jenkins at Milwaukee, another by the circuit court at St. Paul, another was appointed in Montana, and still another in Washington. So that while the Federal courts do, as the gentleman says, have some sense, nevertheless, when they are called upon to exercise their jurisdiction within their territorial limits, they must do it, and it is but natural that these courts should be somewhat jealous of their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. RAY. Now, I have suggested the answer to all that, which is that the bill itself provides that if the individual or corporation is in a particular county, jurisdiction shall be taken and exercised by the court in that county; but otherwise it must be exercised in the locality most convenient for the administration of the affairs of the bankrupt.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does this bill give the assignee or receiver who is first appointed exclusive jurisdiction over all the property of the debtor without respect to the county or State in which that property may be situated?

Mr. RAY. I so understand. I make that assertion.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have not found such a provision in the bill.

Mr. RAY. There can be no question about that. It is provided that all the property of the bankrupt, regardless of its situation or location, shall pass to the hands of the trustee. Now let me make another suggestion in connection with that. When these bankruptcy proceedings have been taken and a trustee appointed, the property of the corporation (a part of the property being its franchises and rights—not simply the assets, as some gentlemen would define them) passes to and vests in the hands of the trustee in bankruptcy; and that being the fact the court has jurisdiction, and there can be no conflict whatever. The trustee can operate a railroad and preserve it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that twenty minutes, or so much thereof as may be needed, be allowed for the further discussion of this amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. At the suggestion of several gentlemen, I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment of Mr. MILLER of Kansas was again read.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a very slight consideration of the duties and obligations of corporations engaged in the business of transportation should convince members of this House that they certainly should not be included within the provisions of this bill. It is contrary to great public interests that those corporations engaged in the work of transportation should be prohibited from carrying on their business, no matter what the pecuniary reverses to which they may be subjected.

Mr. RAY. Allow me to suggest that they would not be prohibited from carrying on their business, because the property, the rights, and the franchises of the railroad company would pass into the hands of an officer of the court in the same way as they do now, and, being within the power and jurisdiction of the court, the business of the corporation would go right on. It would be the duty of the trustee (I have spoken of him once or twice as an assignee) to carry on the business and preserve the estate until it was sold.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is hardly well advised in making that suggestion. Certainly no bankruptcy law can be framed whose provisions would even contemplate the continuation of the business of the bankrupt. When a person is thrown into bankruptcy, it is the duty of the court to wind up that business, to sell the property. Until the sale of the property of a railroad corporation is had there is absolutely no provision—and from the necessity of the case there can not be any provision—for carrying on the business of that railroad company.

Mr. RAY. Let me ask the gentleman right there this question: Does he deny the power of the United States court to direct the trustee to go on with the business of the railroad corporation, for the purpose of preserving it and maintaining its value, until it is actually sold by the trustee or under a decree of the court?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly, I think that under the provisions of this bill there can be no room for the intelligent discussion of such a proposition.

Mr. HENDERSON. Allow me to call the attention of gentlemen to section 17, clause 3, of this bill, on page 18. It is there provided, under the title "Jurisdiction of courts of bankruptcy," that authority be given to the court, among other things, to "appoint receivers or the marshals, upon the application of parties in interest, to take charge of the property of bankrupts after the filing of the petition, and until it is dismissed or the trustee is qualified."

So the power to appoint receivers is especially conferred by the terms of this bill.

Mr. MOODY. I call attention also to the fifth clause of section 17. It is there provided that the court of bankruptcy may "authorize the business of bankrupts to be conducted for limited periods by receivers, the marshals, or trustees, if necessary in the best interests of the estates."

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Does not the language read by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] mean simply that the court may appoint a receiver immediately upon the filing of the petition and before there is an adjudication? As I understand, the point made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] is that after there has been an adjudication and the corporation has been declared bankrupt there is no machinery provided by this bill to continue the business of the corporation.

Mr. MOODY. I refer the gentleman to clause 5 of section 17, which provides the machinery.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield for the question?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York what is the territorial jurisdiction of the bankrupt courts under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. RAY. As I understand it, without limitation, throughout the entire United States; in the District of Columbia and throughout all the States and Territories.

Mr. TAWNEY. Take the circuit court of the United States in the eighth judicial circuit, and a petition in bankruptcy is filed in St. Paul, for instance, against a railroad company, and the line of the road extends beyond the territorial jurisdiction of that circuit, would the receiver appointed by the bankrupt court in Minnesota exercise jurisdiction in the ninth judicial circuit or on the Pacific Coast?

Mr. RAY. I do not see how there could be any question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, my time was taken up by other gentlemen, and I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a remark.

My attention has been called to section 17 of the pending bill, the fifth provision of which authorizes—

The business of bankrupts to be conducted for limited periods by receivers, the marshals, or trustees, if necessary in the best interests of the estates.

I call your attention to the preceding part of the same section, which provides as follows:

Courts of bankruptcy are hereby invested, within their respective territorial limits as now established, or as they may be hereafter changed, with such jurisdiction at law and in equity as will enable them to exercise original jurisdiction in bankruptcy proceedings, etc.

Now, then, conceding that the court may authorize the business of the bankrupt to be carried on for a limited period as provided by paragraph 5 of this section, it may be done only for a limited period within their territorial jurisdiction under the first paragraph of the section which I have just read. It would appear, therefore, giving the bill the widest latitude of construction and scope, there would be receivers appointed in the territorial jurisdiction of each court under the operation of this bill through which the railroad happens to run.

Here, too, is necessarily involved a serious conflict of authority. The railroads are now in the hands of receivers, and they are doing and performing acts which are considered as acts of bankruptcy. Every court through whose territorial jurisdiction such road passes would have the right to appoint a receiver, and these in turn are to take possession of the property of the road and operate its business. Now, I submit that it is entirely against the best interests of the country that the great companies now operated by receivers should be put into numerous, changing, and too often rival hands by the operation of this bill, and thus apportion out between the several courts through whose territorial jurisdiction they happen to pass control of these great properties. The transportation business of this country should not be made the football of bankrupt courts.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. That is done every day.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Well, it ought not to be done, if it is. It makes confusion worse confounded. We have enough of that trouble now without increasing it, and it seems to me that we ought not to place the great railroads of the country in the hands of more receivers than at present.

It seems to me, therefore, that as we can not, within the time limits afforded by this bill, pass upon all the questions crowding upon us, the safest method possible, in order to avoid confusion in this regard, is to strike the word "corporation" entirely from the bill, in accordance with the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, and leave corporations to be treated by the laws now in force in the various States. This would give them no benefits under this bill nor impose upon them any burdens. What concerns me most, however, is that the interests of the country be carefully guarded.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. That is a sound proposition, and that is what ought to be done.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the argument of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] who has just taken his seat and his criticism of the pending bill, permit me to say it would have force if there was anything in the bill for it to apply to. The bill we have been considering, and the provision immediately under discussion, is not amenable to the criticism at all. It leaves these matters, with reference to the great corporations of the country, just in the same condition that they are in

now. It leaves them in statu quo, and all judicial proceedings, and all laws, and all steps relating to the appointment of receivers that have already been made will be just as effective if this bill shall be enacted into a law as they are now.

It occurs to me that the proposition is so plain and so simple as to be grasped at once by any legal mind, or in fact by the mind of any man trained as a lawyer. The bill does not interfere with the appointment of receivers to take charge of the insolvent corporations. Such a construction of the bill is a false construction.

Does the gentleman mean to say that a court could undertake to appoint a receiver for a corporation when a receiver has been already appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction within the State and has charge of that corporation? I think not. If such an idea were good, we would have nothing in this country except confusion and conflicts of jurisdiction.

The Constitution of the United States—the supreme law of the land—has a provision that regulates that beyond question. In the provision to which I refer it declares that due faith and credit shall be given by all of the States to the judicial acts and proceedings of the courts of the other States. I do not undertake to quote the words of the Constitution literally, but that is substantially the language of the provision in question, and carries out the idea in view. If a court of any State, or a Federal court, for that matter, of competent jurisdiction, places such property in the hands of receivers, it is a valid transaction anywhere, before any court, in any State, and must be respected. So that there is nothing in the hypercritical argument raised by the gentleman from Nebraska in favor of the amendment now pending to this section of the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER], it is to strike out the word "corporations," in the next to the last line, on page 3?

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. That is my amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I hope, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, that this amendment will prevail. There are thousands of corporations all over the United States that are struggling for their financial lives. This bill later on provides that any three creditors of any corporation can force it into involuntary bankruptcy. And yet when you have forced a corporation into bankruptcy there is no way of getting it out. That is a wrong and a distinction against corporations. It is a very important matter, and if gentlemen have not given it full consideration I hope that they will, if they have the time, and will vote to sustain the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, it will be remembered by those who were present during the general debate, when the question of corporations was referred to, that I said in substance that I thought it was influenced more by the idea of avoiding the treatment of corporations as we did other people. In other words, I think it was more, perhaps, a bending of the knee as a demagogue would bend than otherwise. I am not referring to the pending amendment when I say that, but that is the way the bill has been urged and brought in here for a good many years. I want to say, too, with perfect frankness to the committee, that so far as I am individually concerned I have no pride or feeling about this particular feature of the bill. I can see some reason why it might be better to leave corporations like railroad companies and telegraph lines to be under the operation of the State laws.

My colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], has drafted a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] which I shall be glad to have him submit, if he has it ready. It may meet with some objections on the other side; and I want to say now to the committee that this was probably one of the most troublesome questions that we had to deal with; that is, the treatment of corporations. Take, for instance, the Pacific railroads. I can see reasons why the treatment of those roads should be left to the United States statutes, in which special provision is made with reference to them, and I invite that perfect freedom in this committee in regard to all these matters which should obtain in a family of men interested in perfecting a bill for the good of the country. That is the way in which we all ought to feel, and I stand here representing no pride of personal opinion in this matter. I want the best that is obtainable out of this fountain of patriotic desire to benefit the people. Now, I would like to hear the amendment of my colleague [Mr. CONNOLLY] read.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I send my amendment to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The amendment of Mr. CONNOLLY was read, as follows:

Amend in section 1, line 21, after the word "bodies," by inserting "other than transportation and telegraph companies."

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen who have the bill before them will turn to page 2, line 21, they will find that it is the dictionary section. The bill defines what the word "corporations" means in this law. As it reads now it includes every possible corporation that we can have in this country, railroads and telegraph companies, banks, and all that. I propose by this amendment to eliminate from this bill all objection that has been made by gentlemen with reference to the effect this bill would have upon railroad corporations and upon the business of the country in putting them within the terms of a bankrupt law. If this amendment is adopted the bill will then read:

Corporations shall mean all bodies other than transportation and telegraph companies having any of the powers and privileges of private corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships.

If you strike out the word "corporations" it is well known to every gentleman here that dry goods, boots and shoes, groceries, drugs, hardware, queen's ware, every character of merchandise sold in this country is sold by mercantile corporations.

Mr. MOODY. Many of us have copies of this bill in which the lines are not numbered. I should like to ask the gentleman where this amendment comes in?

Mr. CONNOLLY. This is in the dictionary clause, the first section.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Do you think it just to a corporation dealing in merchandise that it may be forced into bankruptcy by three creditors, and then, having put it into bankruptcy, refuse any means of letting it get out? There is the iniquity of this thing.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Is that the gentleman's question?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Why, certainly.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Well, I certainly do think that if it is just to the human being, to the natural being, to the man or the woman who has risked all in a mercantile business, if it is just for him to be placed in the position of a bankrupt, it is certainly just to place an artificial being, that has no feeling, in the same position.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. That is begging the question.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Not by any means. I answer that I think it is equally as just to place the artificial being in that attitude as it is to place a human being in that attitude.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Now, one question. You define an artificial being for the purposes of this act just as a real being, and yet you provide that the real being shall be discharged in bankruptcy and that the artificial being shall not. That is the language of this bill, and it is wrong.

Mr. CONNOLLY. You are referring to that. We have not reached that section yet. We are on the first section. We are on the question here, shall a corporation be included at all? Now, the gentleman is going from that section, away beyond there. If this amendment be made, others will be made necessary to conform the other sections of the bill to this amendment that is proposed now. If you strike out the word "corporation" entirely from this section, then it must be stricken out in all succeeding sections where it occurs. If you limit that word "corporation," then it must be in like manner limited in all succeeding cases. Now, the question is presented to the House whether a corporation shall be included at all. If so, this amendment offered to strike out the word "corporations" must necessarily fail.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me one question?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Excuse me; I have only five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The time allowed for debate on this amendment has also expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. ACTS OF BANKRUPTCY.—a Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having (1) concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors, and shall not have returned at least forty-eight hours before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy; and before the rights of creditors shall have been impaired, altered, or interfered with; (2) failed for thirty days and until a petition is filed while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold within such time under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale; (3) made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors and has not regained the ownership and possession of such property before the rights of creditors have been altered, impaired, or changed by reason of such transfer and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy; (4) made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts; (5) made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference, and has not regained the ownership of such property or released same from such levy before the rights of creditors shall have been altered, changed, or impaired by reason of such transfer, taking, or levy, and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy; (6) procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself with intent to defeat his creditors, and suffered same to remain unpaid until ten days before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy: Provided, That a payment or satisfaction of such a judgment by a sale of any of the debtor's property or from the proceeds of such a sale shall not be deemed a payment of such judgment under the provisions of this section; (7) secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors, and has not surrendered such property to such legal process at least ten days before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy; (8) suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed; or (9) suspended and not resumed for thirty days and until a petition is filed, while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over.

b A petition may be filed against a person who has committed an act of bankruptcy within four months after the commission of such act. Such time shall not expire until four months after (1) the date of the recording or registering of the transfer or assignment when the act consists in having made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors or for the purpose of giving a preference as hereinbefore provided, or an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, if by law such recording or registering is required or permitted, or, if it is not, from the date when the beneficiary takes notorious, exclusive, or continuous possession of the property unless the petitioning creditors have received actual notice of such transfer or assignment; or (2) the date of the return of legal process when the act consists in having secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors, as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before any amendments are offered, I would like to submit a request to the committee. This is the section of the bill in which so much interest is felt and has been expressed throughout the general debate; and upon consultation with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK], I request that two hours' debate be given to this section, subject, of course, to the five-minute rule. I mean the whole section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa asks that debate on this section be limited to two hours.

Mr. BRODERICK. I simply want to make an inquiry. There are a number of amendments that will be offered. Suppose the first amendment, which will probably be to strike out the section, should take half or nearly all of this time. If it fail, there will be other amendments to strike out portions of the section. Will time be given for votes on all the amendments that gentlemen desire to offer?

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course my friend understands that amendments to perfect the section will be in order before any amendment to strike out the section.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will my friend from Iowa permit a suggestion?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is only two hours and twenty-seven minutes until the time for taking a recess, and if the debate be continued for two hours the House will probably be slim by that time, when the vote should be taken. Does not the gentleman think it would be well to allow the amendments to be printed in the RECORD as notice, and let the vote commence in the morning? I would suggest that. It would seem to be a loss of thirty minutes, but probably will be no loss at all, because at that time the House is very slim.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to do exactly what the committee would like to do in this matter. In the first place, I want a fair opportunity to discuss this section, and then to have a vote on it.

Mr. McMILLIN. That will give but twenty-five minutes for votes on the amendments, if it be agreed as the gentleman suggested, and the probability is we may be hung upon the first amendment if we are to take a vote on it this evening. I have no feeling whatever in the matter.

Mr. HENDERSON. I know. I am very glad to have the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the amendment to strike out this whole first paragraph of section 2, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has submitted, goes to the essence of the matter. If that amendment can not be adopted, then no amendment can be adopted, and no other substitute. It is absolutely certain that when the question comes on this amendment it would be the same with this as with all; they all either go out or they all stay in. Both in the committee and in the House, every time the question has been up I believe that has been the history of the matter, and the attempt to adopt the amendment to strike out will serve just as good a purpose as any other.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think I will want an opportunity to offer amendments to perfect the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me suggest, instead of making two hours for that section, that a request be made for a reasonable time for discussing this amendment, and then there will be other amendments, if my amendment does not prevail, to that section.

Mr. BAILEY. Why not have two hours to offer amendments before the vote?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. How much of that two hours are you going to give to the consideration of this amendment?

Mr. HENDERSON. Until it is disposed of. I am not considering any particular amendment in making the request.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If an amendment is offered to strike out the entire section and is voted down, will it then be in order to move to strike out a portion of the section in order to perfect it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. BAILEY. I think not.

Mr. HENDERSON. The first thing in order is to perfect the section.

The CHAIRMAN. There is some question about that.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me eminently proper that gentlemen should have an opportunity to perfect the section to their satisfaction before they are brought face to face with the question of striking it out entirely.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The gentleman can meet that difficulty by moving to close debate on this or any other amendment at any time.

Mr. BAILEY. We might have an understanding, by unanimous consent, that the defeat of the pending amendment shall not preclude the right to offer amendments to particular subdivisions of the section.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want the section perfected first, and I think that is the general feeling of the committee. I think that the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] will obviate the difficulty.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What is that?

Mr. HENDERSON. That we introduce amendments now and discuss them this afternoon—we have to take a recess under the rule at 5 o'clock—and that we vote upon them in committee the first thing to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then you ask unanimous consent that the balance of the day be given to the consideration of this section?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes; and that the proposed amendments be printed in the RECORD and be considered as pending.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. With that understanding there would be no vote upon any amendment to-day.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; not until to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I hope the suggestion will not prevail. There are 63 pages of this bill. There are other amendments just as important as, and, in the judgment of good lawyers on this floor, a great deal more important, than the amendments to be presented to this section, and, now it is proposed to give to this one section two and a half hours out of the four hours remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the proposition?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all of paragraph 8, section 2, beginning with "section 2," on page 5, and ending with line 47, page 7.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to propose an amendment to subdivision 8.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas for that purpose, but I do not yield the floor.

Mr. BRODERICK. I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The amendment of Mr. BRODERICK was read, as follows:

Strike out, beginning with and including the first line of section 2, down to and including the word "over," in line 47, and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"SEC. 2. Acts of bankruptcy: Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist (1) of his having fraudulently contracted a debt or debts of creditors who seek to avail themselves of the provisions of this act; (2) sold or transferred his property, or some part thereof, with intent to defeat his creditors, or (3) concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors, and shall not have returned before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I have offered my amendment believing that it is absolutely impossible to pass an efficient, practical bankrupt law containing an involuntary provision. Congress after Congress has wrestled with this problem. It is not a new one. We have never been able since the repeal of the last law to pass any new bankrupt law at all. I am quite familiar with the fact that all over this country there is a general demand for a voluntary bankrupt law, a law that will permit people who have been unfortunate in trade, who have encumbered their property, who have gotten into debt, to surrender what property they have remaining and be discharged from their debts and start anew in the race of life. There is, I know, a demand for that kind of a bankrupt law; but I undertake to say, with all due respect to the committee which has brought in this bill, that there is no demand of a general character, no demand for an involuntary bankrupt law outside of a few wholesale localities which sell goods to people who sell at retail.

An involuntary bankrupt law is nothing more nor less than a piece of machinery for the collection of debts. It benefits nobody; it can bring no good to anybody. I can scarcely imagine a case where an involuntary bankruptcy law would benefit either the debtor or the creditor; because, in the first place, a man who is tottering on the brink of bankruptcy has his property in all probability pretty well put up as collateral; there are mortgages and judgments against him, and the owners of such claims are protected. But the unsecured creditor, the general creditor, will benefit very little from the estate of any involuntary bankrupt. The expenses of distributing the assets and winding up the business consume money which would otherwise go to the general creditor.

The bill is like all the rest; there is no use in saying that it is different or better. There is no use in saying that it is anything more or less than the old Torrey bill, which has haunted these halls for years. It is folly to undertake to say you can put a man in bankruptcy without doing him any harm. It is idle to attempt to sugar coat this bill. You can not do so if you leave in it the provision defining the acts which shall put a man into bankruptcy against his will. I admit that among the nine different classes of acts which are specified as making a man a bankrupt there are some which involve fraud, but I deny that you can pass an involuntary bankruptcy bill which will leave to the creditor and to the debtor the status that before existed, and which would benefit the creditor or anybody else.

Therefore this fight might as well come first as last. We might just as well vote on the vital question here as to fight the matter piecemeal. We may as well have it settled now whether we want an involuntary provision in this bill at all. If the Committee of the Whole should decide that they do, we can then consider whether the bill can be so amended as to suit the majority of the House.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman's amendment simply strikes out the involuntary portion of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is all. It strikes from the bill the nine specified acts for which a man may be put into bankruptcy. With this provision struck out the voluntary part of the bill will remain. Under the bill as thus amended a man may petition to be declared a bankrupt, and on the surrender of his estate may have it adjudicated in bankruptcy.

Mr. RAY. I should like to interrogate the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Very well.

Mr. RAY. You are from the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. You have there a system of what are called "judgment notes"?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. And a man can not get any credit there unless he gives judgment notes?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, I do not admit that.

Mr. RAY. Are not those notes the prevailing style of notes in your State?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No, sir.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAY. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Now, I say those are the prevailing notes given in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will not admit that. Of course they are given. We have judgment notes.

Mr. RAY. I know from personal professional experience that those are the prevailing form of notes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will admit that up along the line of the State of New York they deal in that sort of obligations, but not down our way.

Mr. RAY. They deal in them all through the State of Pennsylvania to my personal knowledge. Those judgment notes prevail everywhere. When credit is given, the creditor wants that kind of a note. When such a note is given, the creditor goes immediately to the clerk's office and enters up judgment against the debtor. When that note is due and unpaid, the creditor can go to the sheriff, obtain execution, and gobble up all the property that the debtor has. Now, I ask the gentleman, are not the laws of the State of Pennsylvania under that system not only tenfold but a hundredfold more severe than any provision that you can spell out of this bill?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. In reply to the gentleman I will say that the laws of the State of Pennsylvania are entirely satisfactory to the people of Pennsylvania. They are not asking a bankruptcy law.

Mr. RAY. Have I not stated the reason why you, coming from the State of Pennsylvania, are opposed to this bill and its provisions—

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No.

Mr. RAY. Because you do not want anything that shall be more liberal and more in the interest of the debtor than what you now have.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me answer the gentleman. I will state my reasons for opposing this bill. Under the old bankruptcy law I had my share of the practice; I was brought face to face every day with its hardships as well as its benefits. The knowledge I obtained from my practice and experience under that law leads me, as a representative of the people who sent me here and in the discharge of my duty as I understand it, to oppose these provisions, and I am going to do so. If I were speaking for the benefit—

Mr. RAY. I have the floor.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, no; you have not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, I wanted to answer the question which the gentleman asked me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. RAY. Nearly all the other Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania are in favor of a bankruptcy bill; they are in favor of this bill, as I understand it, and have been heretofore; but it does seem to me (and that is the reason I propounded my interrogatory to the gentleman) that he has got this judgment-note business into his head; it is a bee in his bonnet; and he does not want to surrender the advantage that creditors obtain under that system.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I have answered—

Mr. RAY. I do not believe for a single moment that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is really opposed in his heart to these involuntary features on the ground that they are harsh. They can not be regarded as harsh. Under this bill a man can be forced into bankruptcy when he is absolutely insolvent—in a condition where he has stopped paying and is unable to pay—and also where he has committed a fraud. In addition to those two cases there is only one that can be made the ground of objection, and that is where for thirty days a man has ceased to honor his commercial paper. It is commercial paper and commercial paper only, mind you.

Now, if he can not pay his debts, if he is insolvent, if for thirty days he has been unable to renew the note, he may be forced into bankruptcy, and why? In order to prevent his going out to a few of his intimate associates and friends and saying, "Here, I have got to give up; I can not continue business any longer. You sue me, put your claims in the shape of a judgment, and then come and levy on my property." We try to prevent that, which would be a detriment and an injury to the rights of all the other creditors. Such action if permitted would result in unjust preferences under forms of law and work great hardship and injustice. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed for ten minutes, if that much time is necessary to conclude what I desire to say.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I perfectly understand that a member of this House is engaged in a very small business when he is calling attention to the inadvertent misstatements of a fellow-member. But it sometimes happens that it is due to truth that we shall point out an error; and we always owe it to ourselves to correct such a misrepresentation as the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] made of me in the speech which he delivered yesterday.

In the very beginning of that speech he congratulated himself and my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] that they had changed their minds on this question, and then straightway proceeded to complain at me because he seemed to think that I had been undergoing the same mental operation. In order that there may be no mistake as to what was said I read the exact language of the gentleman from New York. He said:

The other gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is possessed of a very peculiar mind. It must be undergoing a stage of transition or transformation, for within the last three months he has presented either to the House or to the Judiciary Committee, or will present before this subject is dropped, five different measures embodying essential features radically differing from each other.

I interposed with the statement:

Since the gentleman from New York has seen proper to refer to me, I will simply tell him that that is not the truth.

He rejoined:

I say it is, and I have the bills before me at this moment, and have been examining them.

The gentleman from New York has admitted that he misrepresented me, because I find in this morning's RECORD his printed speech changing the words "five different measures" to "four different measures," and changing the words "three months" to "a few months."

Mr. Chairman, even with these changes, and admitting that the bill, the report, and the substitute are all as different as he says they are, he is still 25 per cent short of the truth, because they will constitute only three, while he said I had presented five, and printed that I had presented four. Those who know the gentleman from New York will regard it as a remarkable approach to accuracy that he should come within 25 per cent of the fact.

But, Mr. Chairman, he has given his own testimony against his statement. After having declared in the very beginning of his speech that these measures were radically different from each other, he concludes the speech with this statement:

Mr. Chairman, I add as a part of my remarks some of the comments of Mr. Wolverton, an able Democrat from Pennsylvania, made by him on the Bailey bill H. R. 4609, in the Fifty-third Congress. (See Report 203, part 3.) That bill was virtually the same as the Bailey bill H. R. 259, the Bailey bill H. R. 8234, and the Bailey bill (no number), all of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

In one part of his speech he says that these measures are radically different from each other, and in another part of the same speech he affirms that they are "virtually the same" as the bill which was passed in the Fifty-third Congress.

Therefore I refute the gentleman's first assertion by invoking the old mathematical axiom, that things which are equal to the same things must be equal to each other. If these three measures are virtually the same as the bill introduced by me and passed in the last House, then necessarily they must be virtually the same as each other.

But I have a better refutation of the gentleman's assertion than that. I have here the three propositions to which reference is made. The first is the bill introduced early in this session and referred to the Judiciary Committee. That bill with other bills on the same general subject were referred to a subcommittee with special and positive instructions that it should report back a measure providing for both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. As a member of the subcommittee, I could not agree to the pending bill when it was to be reported, and therefore framed and submitted to the full committee a minority report.

The minority report is practically the bill which I had originally introduced, with an involuntary provision, and that involuntary provision was ingrafted upon it in conformity with the instructions of the committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] knows, or if he does not know every other member of the Judiciary Committee does know, that when I submitted that report I distinctly stated to the committee that I had incorporated the provision for involuntary bankruptcy purely and only because I was instructed to do so, and that it did not meet with my approval. But when that minority report was voted down, I was perfectly free to prepare such substitute as my judgment might approve, and I have here the substitute, numbered 8234, which is identical, line for line, word for word, and letter for letter, with the report that I made as a member of the subcommittee to the full committee, save and except that I have eliminated the involuntary feature, which was incorporated under an instruction.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, I refute the charge of personal inconsistency. Why it was made I leave the House to judge, but as it had no pertinency to the argument, I concluded that it was intended as a criticism personally against me, and I felt that I was justified in answering it.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] seems to bear me personal ill will. I have nothing against him. I forgive him. I can remember what a fight we had in the last Congress over his bill, which I referred to in the RECORD of this morning and my remarks yesterday. I do not think he was very angry yesterday; but when he sees in the RECORD of this morning the unmerciful criticism and castigation of his bill introduced in the Fifty-third Congress, made and administered by Judge Wolverton, of the State of Pennsylvania, his wrath is stirred from the very foundation; and as that excellent and able Democrat is not now here where the gentleman from Texas can pour upon him his vials of wrath, he turns mightily and grandiloquently upon the young and inexperienced and innocent gentleman from New York. [Laughter.] I trust gentlemen of this House will examine the RECORD; that they will read the criticisms of the Bailey bill contained in the report of ex-Judge Wolverton, one of the ablest lawyers in the United States. He denounced the Bailey bill as unconstitutional, incomplete, and imperfect; an experiment productive of litigation and needless costs; one that will destroy credit, etc. My argument adopted the facts and ran in the same line.

Gentlemen of this House will remember that on yesterday, when I adverted to Mr. BAILEY's numerous bills simply for the purpose of making the argument that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is not a safe guide in an important matter like this, for the reason he had introduced so many different, conflicting bills, showing a changing, unsettled mind, I asked him if the bill introduced by him into this Congress, or the substitute, was the same as his bill introduced into and put through the last House, and he answered "No." Therefore, between the last Congress and this he has changed his mind. So much is admitted. Now I call the attention of gentlemen in this House to his bill No. 259.

Mr. BAILEY introduced the following bill—

Read it.

I ask your attention to the bill (H. R. 8234) introduced by Mr. BAILEY, or proposed by him as a substitute. Read that.

I call the attention of members of the House to the report, unnumbered:

Mr. BAILEY submits as his report from the subcommittee the following bill—

Read that.

Read the three, and then read the Bailey bill of the Fifty-third Congress and compare the batch; then judge whether the gentleman has changed his mind on the subject of bankruptcy laws; then determine whether or not he has adhered to a settled policy and line of legislation; then determine whether or not I did him injustice yesterday. He has claimed that he acted under instructions.

He never was instructed by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary to submit any report. It never gave him any directions. We permitted him to act his own sweet will. We permitted him to submit such views as he had, or desired to submit, or might obtain. He was placed upon the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee in order that he might be heard. He stated in the very beginning that he did not desire to participate in our deliberations or be a party to our transactions, and he did not; but at a later date he stated that he submitted his views on the subject. We did not instruct him. The full committee never instructed him. Neither did the full subcommittee ever instruct him. And when he came in with that proposition, which is in print and to which I have referred, he said:

Mr. BAILEY submits as his report—

What does he mean by "his report"? I ask the gentleman from Texas, if it was not your report why did you entitle it—

Mr. BAILEY submits as his report from the subcommittee—

So and so, printing it in full? Why not say—

Mr. BAILEY submits as the views of the minority of the subcommittee the following?

But the gentleman from Texas entitled it "his views," a proposition emanating from himself, because of the title, and I acted in perfect good faith in referring to it yesterday as "his views." Of course, I had before me yesterday afternoon, when I made my remarks, five different bills. One of them was from the Senate. I had supposed, and been informed, that Mr. BAILEY was the author of that, and only when he disaffirmed it did I understand the contrary. Of course, when I found myself in error in that regard, I was very willing to be corrected and to reduce my statement from five to four. I so corrected my remarks, as I had a perfect right to do. It matters little whether the gentleman has changed his mind four times or five times in "three months," or a "few months." He does not deny, and can not successfully deny, that he has presented these four differing bills within a year—three since the convening of this Congress. I do not know but there are "more to follow" of "his views."

Having called your attention to these various propositions of the gentleman from Texas, I repeat my assertion that no two of them are alike in all their essential features. I call attention to the further fact that all of them are alike in one essential feature, the main feature, the leading feature, which feature I took occasion yesterday to criticize, and which Judge Wolverton, in the last Congress, took occasion to criticize. I repeat again that notwithstanding all the remarks made by the gentleman in his charge of inaccuracy—and perhaps he would have it understood that I was willfully misrepresenting him, although I expressly stated that I had no such desire—I harbor no harsh feeling. I beg the gentleman's pardon most abjectly and humbly if I have offended him; but I take occasion to reassert, and to repeat, that to be a safe guide in matters of legislation as important as this a gentleman of this House should have a plan and a policy of legislation and should adhere to it. I have not varied from the line, plan, and policy that I had in my mind when, in the Fifty-second Congress, we considered the bills then presented. I followed in the same line in the Fifty-third Congress; I stand there now.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, there is one question between the gentleman from New York and myself, and I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it is not true that when the subcommittee was appointed the full committee instructed them to prepare a measure for voluntary bankruptcy and one for involuntary bankruptcy?

Mr. HENDERSON. The instruction of the full committee to the subcommittee was to prepare a bill with provisions for both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, and not one for voluntary bankruptcy. I can answer that question very promptly.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in reference to the amendment I have submitted. I think it is clear from the discussion that has been had upon this bill that a majority of the members want some bankruptcy legislation. I think it is also clear that there are many of them who are in favor only of a voluntary bankruptcy law, but who would be willing, rather than have a law fail, to vote for a bill containing some involuntary provisions. Now, it was said during the argument here that this bill that was presented to the House is stripped of the severity of the old law and that it is much more liberal. That is true in reference to some of its provisions. I concede that it is true in reference to many of the provisions of this bill; but it is not true, as I understand—and I have made an examination of the matter—with reference to the so-called acts of bankruptcy.

The great objection to the old law was that it was abused—that under its provisions men were forced into bankruptcy, when, if they had been permitted to go on with their business and struggle along, they would have succeeded and recovered from their embarrassments. That was one of the chief objections; and on comparing the old law with this bill I find that the acts of bankruptcy are very nearly the same. There are slight changes in the phraseology, but they cover substantially the same ground. Now, what we desire, if this bill is to be made the law of the land and be accepted by the people as a settlement of this question, is to strip it of the severity of the old law. There are in this bill nine acts of bankruptcy, and some of them contain more than one cause; they are so phrased that they can be construed to embrace many more grounds. I apprehend that it will be found that some merchants who are embarrassed would hardly know how to keep out of bankruptcy if this bill should become law.

Now, I am willing that bill should embrace acts of fraud—purely fraudulent transactions. I am willing that actual fraud should be cause for involuntary bankruptcy, and the amendment I have submitted provides a remedy for this class of cases. First, fraudulent purchase of the property by an insolvent, and that will embrace all the purchases under misrepresentation as to ability to pay. Second, fraudulent transfer of the property; and that would, by the dictionary in this bill, embrace every sort of lien or mortgage and every sort of fraudulent action had to defeat creditors. The third is the debtor concealing himself to defeat the service of a summons upon him and thus defrauding his creditors.

Mr. MOODY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I would like a little further explanation of the second reason—the fraudulent transfer of property.

Mr. BRODERICK. If the gentleman will refer to the dictionary in this bill—I do not know whether it is in the copy you have, but it is in the large bill—

Mr. MOODY. I have it here before me.

Mr. BRODERICK. You will see that transfer means sale, mortgage, and every sort of lien given to defeat or defraud creditors.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, the question is, What is a fraudulent transfer? Now, I assume the preference of one creditor over another is not fraudulent, except it be so stated in a bankruptcy law. A debtor has the right under the common law to include a preferred creditor. Does this include the preferred creditor, or does the gentleman exclude him?

Mr. BRODERICK. I intend to include every fraudulent act which it is necessary to prohibit in a bankruptcy act, and I believe that the three grounds set out in my amendment embrace every sort of fraudulent purchase or fraudulent conveyance of property that should be specified.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Either by way of preference or otherwise?

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. Let me suggest to the gentleman that his amendment does not do that, whatever his purpose may be.

Mr. BRODERICK. That is a difference of opinion. I think it does. It goes as far as I think the law should.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, I think I can see in the provisions of this bill as they now stand, should it become a law, an almost if not an absolutely endless continuance of vexatious proceedings against men who are unfortunate but not dishonest. A number of the acts of bankruptcy that are specified in section 2 involve as a matter of course insolvency as a condition precedent to an assignment in bankruptcy. That condition is in itself a fact to be inquired into and determined by a jury.

Now, suppose that under the second paragraph of the bill an allegation should be made against a debtor living in a Western town involving the question of bankruptcy, citing him, for the purpose of determining whether or not he was insolvent, to appear at the next term of the district court of the United States to be held in the district of which the debtor was a resident. The public notoriety of the proceeding against him would in itself become vexatious, and then when the question came to be tried before the court the inquisitorial character of the proceedings, involving, as it necessarily would, an inquiry into every act he had done, into every sale he had made, into every purchase he had made, for months preceding the filing of the petition, in order to determine whether or not he was insolvent, in order to determine whether or not he had assets sufficient to meet his liabilities, because that is what settles the question of insolvency—all this would subject him to great annoyance and injury. All these things would be inquired into, and I undertake to say that, without the commission of any dishonest act on his part, a condition of affairs would be brought about under the operation of this bill which would bring down upon it the righteous indignation of four-fifths of the people of this country and would compel Congress to wipe it from the pages of the statute book. I do not think there is any question about that. Hence I believe that if we have any bankruptcy legislation at all beyond a voluntary bankrupt law, if anything is to be added to its voluntary features, the provisions that are added should apply only to cases of actual fraud on the part of the debtor. That of course would stamp him as a dishonest man and put him outside the pale of consideration in the enactment of law. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas will be adopted.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment and for the amendment to the amendment.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Add to the end of section 2 the following:

"Provided, If said involuntary petition be dismissed by the court, or withdrawn by the petitioner or petitioners with leave of the court, the respondent or respondents to said petition shall be allowed by the court all reasonable expenses and counsel fees incurred by respondent or respondents in defending against said petition, and the petitioner or petitioners shall pay all expenses and counsel fees as allowed by the court as well as the cost of said proceedings. And provided further, That within five days from the time an involuntary petition is filed in court the petitioner or petitioners shall file a bond in the same court where the petition has been presented, with at least two good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the said court, in such sum as the court may direct, conditioned for the payment to the respondent or respondents, their heirs, administrators, executors, or assigns, of all expenses, costs, and counsel fees allowed by the court. No action shall be taken on the petition until after a bond has been filed and approved by the court.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the paragraph to which this proposed substitute applies has not yet been read.

Mr. MAHON. Well, leave it pending and I will offer it at the proper time.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Would not the gentleman accept an amendment inserting the word "damages" in connection with costs and expenses?

Mr. MAHON. I think that if they pay him all reasonable expenses and costs that is sufficient. Now, Mr. Chairman, the only hard feature about the involuntary provision of the bill will be obviated if that amendment is adopted, because creditors will be very careful before they undertake to put a man in bankruptcy. This ought to be like any other proceeding in court; if the party who institutes the proceeding fails he ought to make the defendant whole. I think that with that proviso in the bill no man can make a reasonable objection to it.

Now, as to my State and my district; the great State of Pennsylvania does a very large amount of business, and in answer to my colleague [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] I want to say that the business men of Pennsylvania are in favor of this bill. I have not received a solitary protest against it, and I do not believe a protest has come here from the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania against the passage of this bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Has my colleague received any letters or petitions in favor of the bill, or asking for its passage?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; I have received letter after letter from merchants, the very men who would be affected by this bill, asking me to support it. I understand, too, that the gentleman who represents the great city of Pittsburgh is in favor of this bill, and, Mr. Chairman, I want to make the prediction that when the yeas-and-nays vote is taken upon this bill my colleague [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] will find seven-eighths of the Pennsylvania delegation lined up in favor of it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me say at this point, Mr. Chairman, that I have never received a petition, a postal card, or any other communication from anybody in my district asking me to support this bill. I did receive a letter from one man, who wanted to be appointed a referee under the bill.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I will not vote for this bill with the involuntary provision struck out, for this reason: It is a very nice thing to pass a law here to allow a man to go into voluntary bankruptcy. After a man has gone into the market and purchased goods running up into thousands of dollars and has got possession of those goods, has got all his matters arranged, and has in some manner made away with the goods to his kindred or to some other person, it is a very nice thing to let him then come in and take the benefit of a voluntary bankrupt law and get a discharge, and so swindle his creditors. There are scoundrels in the United States who go into the market and buy goods upon their own credit, and they would be the men to take advantage of such a law. They show that they have so many farms, or so much real estate, or so much personal property, and on that basis they get credit for goods to the extent of thousands of dollars, which they carry out of the State; and it is my experience as a lawyer that this class of persons, after they have purchased goods in that way—many of them with the intention to defraud their creditors—acknowledge judgment to a wife, or a brother, or a daughter, or some personal friend; execution is issued upon that judgment, the property of the debtor is swept away by execution, and when the merchants in the large cities from whom the goods were bought seek payment, they find that the man's property has all been swept away and that they have no redress.

Mr. Chairman, these are the men we ought to catch. I say that when a man is in fact a bankrupt it does not matter whether he goes into bankruptcy voluntarily or involuntarily; the bankruptcy court is the place for him. I am in favor of involuntary provisions in a bankrupt law, because under them debtors will be prohibited from giving preferences; or if they do, they can be forced into bankruptcy and the preferences set aside.

I venture the assertion—and my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] knows it to be true—that merchants of Philadelphia, New York, and other large cities are robbed in our State to the extent of millions of dollars by men who go to the great commercial centers, purchase goods with which they stock their stores, and then confess judgment or give preferences, have executions issued by creditors with whom they are in collusion, and thus defraud the great mass of their creditors. If you will read the records of the mercantile business of our great cities you will find that this country is full of such scoundrels; I am willing to say it is teeming with them.

If the provision for involuntary bankruptcy be accompanied with provisions for giving a bond such as my amendment proposes—a bond under which a creditor engages to indemnify the debtor, if he does not sustain the proceeding which he institutes—there can be no objection to a measure of this kind. Under my amendment, if a man against whom bankruptcy proceedings are begun is in fact not a bankrupt, if he has committed no act of bankruptcy, if he has not undertaken to defraud his creditors, then he will be indemnified and made whole. If, on the other hand, after hearing and examination by the court, it is found that he has undertaken to defraud his creditors, or has been guilty of other acts of bankruptcy, then the bankruptcy court is just where he ought to be.

Sir, I would not give a baubee for a bankrupt law containing only provisions for voluntary bankruptcy, because such a law simply allows all the scoundrels who are robbing the merchants of our great cities to go free; it simply opens the way for them, after they have everything arranged, to step into the United States court with a voluntary petition for bankruptcy, to obtain a discharge, and thereby swindle their creditors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAHON. I would like three minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I hope my colleague's time will be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, under the bankrupt law of 1867 I was a register for seven years, and my practice as such covered a large part of the State of Pennsylvania. From my experience under that law I am willing to say that no injustice was done to the people of our State—nobody who was honest suffered under that law. Under its administration by the judge of the district court at Pittsburgh and by Judge Cadwalader in Philadelphia the estates of bankrupts were settled promptly. Let my colleague [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] point out, if he can, any instances in which estates of bankrupts in Pennsylvania were squandered under the act of 1867. Sir, there was no demand from our State for the repeal of that law.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Why, my dear sir, one-half of the estates which were thrown into bankruptcy have never yet been closed up.

Mr. MAHON. Then that is the fault of the registers.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. If no injustice was done under that law, why was there such a pressure to wipe it from the statute book?

Mr. MAHON. I do not think there was any such pressure. The law had served its purpose.

Mr. TRACEY. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: If section 2 of this bill, providing for involuntary bankruptcy, should be stricken out and the bill be enacted into law without those provisions, how would a dishonest debtor under its provisions get his discharge?

Mr. MAHON. If you pass such a law, I could in my State go into debt for $25,000, and, if I were a business man, I could in the course of a year fix up my affairs so that I could go into bankruptcy and get my discharge in spite of anyone.

Mr. TRACEY. I do not see how you could do it.

Mr. MAHON. I would show you how I could do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that section 2 of this bill, which I understand is now under consideration, is the very section of all others that ought to commend itself to the best judgment of this House. A bill framed solely for the benefit of the voluntary bankrupt threatens more fraud, threatens more danger tenfold over, so far as my experience under the old law goes, than a bill that embodies both features, as this bill does. Under the law of 1867, which was repealed because it bore heavily upon bankrupt estates, the only instances of fraud that came under my observation—and I had quite an extended experience under the law—were frauds which were practiced, not by creditors, but by the bankrupt himself. Knowing the relief that was afforded him under the bill, by taking this step, as suggested by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], he was enabled to smuggle away his property and defeat the creditor and yet get his discharge.

Now, as a practical fact in business, Mr. Chairman, I think this proposition is a sound one: That the creditors of the poor debtor are interested, and will follow that interest to protect the creditor. Just so long as the debtor can struggle along and hold out to his creditors any hope of future payment they are interested in having his property and his business well conducted and taken care of; and they are interested to protect him and let him alone and let him preserve the property and make it as valuable as possible, giving him abundant opportunity to work out his own salvation, and in the working out of his salvation to save them from certain loss. There is no danger as a practical fact of any oppression on the part of the creditor toward the poor debtor as a general rule.

Men, Mr. Chairman, act as a general thing from motives of self-interest. The creditors could have no possible interest in oppressing the debtor and destroying his property. Their interest is directly the reverse. They are interested in protecting his property to keep him along until he can work out and pay off even a small fraction of the claims to which they are entitled.

Before I come to this section of the bill, however, I wish to answer a question that is propounded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD], who asked if the act of 1867 was not oppressive upon the poor debtor, why it was repealed? I can answer the question. It was repealed because of the excessive fees that were taken by the clerk, the marshal, and other officials called upon to execute the law. This act is guarded in that the fees are limited. The clerk of the court can only get $10, no matter how long the litigation is pending. The other officials charged with the administration of the law get small fees. The bulk of the estate is therefore available for the benefit of the creditors, and of course to the same extent available for the debtor, for he wants to be able to pay as much on his accounts as he can.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, with his consent.

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. BRODERICK. The gentleman says he understands that the law of 1867 was repealed because the officials charged with its execution had been in the habit of extorting exorbitant fees. I ask if he has examined the debate in the two Houses upon that question for the purpose of discovering what were the real objections to the law?

Mr. POWERS. I have not examined the debate, I will say in answer to my friend from Kansas. I came into this discussion but a few moments ago, and have not had an opportunity to determine what the debates show. I only speak from the standpoint of my own experience and the complaints that have originated in my own locality. I know that clerks of the United States court made very comfortable fortunes out of the business, and that the other officials got well off out of the administration of the law. I assume that these officials in every State, having the same opportunities, probably availed themselves of it and made good pay out of the law while it was in existence.

Mr. BRODERICK. If the gentleman will permit me, I will suggest that if he examines the debates he will ascertain that there were other objections.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. And more pertinent ones.

Mr. BRODERICK. For instance, Senator Conkling, of New York, who was himself in favor of a bankrupt law, said that there were serious objections to the law because of the oppression sometimes practiced upon the debtor under its operation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Vermont be permitted to have five minutes' extension.

There was no objection.

Mr. POWERS. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, this section 2 is the section, of all others, that commends the bill to my mind. It has been said by gentlemen who favor a voluntary bankrupt law that they are willing to incorporate in it cases of fraud. I wish to call attention to this fact, that you in substance provide for that in this section 2, and if gentlemen will give me their attention for a little while they will see that such is the case.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me? Have you examined the list of grounds in the second section upon which a state of bankruptcy may be declared?

Mr. POWERS. I will call attention to them in order. I have examined them, and gentlemen will please excuse me, as I have but a very limited time.

The first act of bankruptcy committed by a person is the concealing of himself, departing, or remaining away from his place of business, and so on, with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors. Now, that is a fraud. All will agree to that. Being a fraud, it becomes an act of bankruptcy. The second is a failure for thirty days, and until a petition is filed while insolvent, to secure the release of any property levied upon for $500 or over. Now, then, that does not necessarily establish or imply a fraud, unless it be argued that his failure to release the property is done on purpose to put it through the mill and grind it up. The third cause is the making of a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors. Is that not a fraud? Fourth, the making of an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, or having filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts. Now, that is sometimes, and doubtless would be ordinarily, an honest procedure. Fifth, having made, while insolvent, a transfer of his property, or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise, for the purpose of giving a preference. Is that not a fraud? The policy of the law is to provide for an equal distribution of the property among all of the creditors; and if a man gives a preference to one creditor, does he not commit a fraud against all the rest of them?

(6) Procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself with intent to defeat his creditors and suffered same to remain unpaid until ten days before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, provided that a payment or satisfaction of such a judgment by a sale of any of the debtor's property or from the proceeds of such a sale shall not be deemed a payment of such judgment under the provisions of this section—

Another rank fraud, on purpose to defraud the creditor—

(7) Secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors, and has not surrendered such property to such legal process at least ten days before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy—

Another instance of rank fraud.

That might be an honest transaction—

(8) Suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed.

Now, that might or might not be fraudulent; but every one of these propositions, with possibly one or two exceptions, goes upon the ground, it will be noticed, of a legal or moral fraud, and, whether it be legal or moral, it is just as disastrous to the creditor.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Turn to clause 4—

(4) Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors.

I want to ask the gentleman if this should become a law does not the existence of a general bankrupt law suspend the operations of the assignment laws of the States?

Mr. POWERS. Of course.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Then how can a man make an assignment if the State assignment laws are suspended?

Mr. KNOX. There might be a common-law assignment.

Mr. POWERS. A man might make a common-law assignment to his creditors. An assignment to his creditors may or may not be a fraud. It may be an honest transaction. The debtor may say, "I will assign my property to a trustee for the benefit of my creditors," and that may be honestly done, or, as I have already said, it may be done for a fraudulent purpose; and judging by my own observation of the old law of 1867—

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. How can you make an assignment if this law suspends the assignment statute?

Mr. POWERS. It suspends our State assignment statutes, but the act can be done. A man has the right to make an assignment at common law without any statute, and he might make an assignment in that way. But without stopping to cover these points, because my time is so limited, I will say that we have in a large proportion of our States an insolvency law which has been upon the statute books for a good many years. I think every one of the New England States has such a law. They have it in New Hampshire, in Vermont, and so forth. Under the operations of that law the property of debtors is distributed more fairly, more equitably, and more satisfactorily to the whole community, both to debtors and creditors, than it was administered before we had any of those laws. Of course the passage of a national bankruptcy law will supersede the operation of these State insolvency acts; but here is the trouble with a State law: It is limited to State lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. POWERS. I will ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] asks for three minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. POWERS. We will have that delegation go against you. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. While I feel very friendly toward Vermont just at this time, I do not want her to take all the time. I object simply because I think gentlemen who desire to discuss the merits of this bill should have availed themselves of the time we have had heretofore.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] has undertaken to say that this bill is substantially the bill proposed by the gentleman from Kansas. If the friends of the bill will strike out of it those provisions of the bill which will leave it as the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas proposes to make it, I shall very heartily support this bill. But if it is intended that every man who is in debt, and against whom a judgment for $500 has been rendered, and who is unable to pay it for thirty days, shall become a bankrupt I am not in favor of that proposition.

I am not in favor of the proposition that the man who owes $500 and can not pay it for thirty days shall be thrown into bankruptcy by his creditors. But every man who commits a fraud, every dishonest man, such as the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks of, should be subjected to the very closest scrutiny through a bankruptcy court, and every dollar of his estate subjected to the payment of his debts ought to be handed over entirely to his creditors.

Further than this there ought to be no involuntary bankruptcy. Hold the line to fraud and fraudulent conveyances. Protect the oppressed debtor against these unjust prosecutions and save the people who are suffering on account of the hard times; save the people from being thrown into bankruptcy and let all honest men try to pay their debts in the usual way. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas will be adopted and that then this bill will become a law.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words with reference to the amendment which the gentleman from Kansas has been kind enough to hand to me for the purpose of examination.

But before I do that I want to say that I indorse every word of the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] who last spoke upon this subject. It seems to me that however much this country wants a bankruptcy bill, it is not simply a voluntary bankruptcy bill which is sought. However much I desire to vote for a bankruptcy bill at this session of Congress, I believe I can do no greater harm to the great commercial interests of this country than by voting for a bankruptcy bill which contains the voluntary feature alone. It is nothing but an encouragement to fraud. I would no quicker vote for such a bill than I would vote for a bill which provided for involuntary bankruptcy alone. Justice requires that the interests of both debtor and creditor should be cared for.

Under the present existing system of State insolvency laws, which will be suspended by the passage of a voluntary bankruptcy act, there is something which stands in the way of a man entering upon the course of conduct which has been described by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Pass this law, which will strike down the provisions of the State law and eliminate its involuntary features, and you encourage every dishonest man to incur debt fraudulently, to prefer one creditor above all others, and to delay his settlement with his creditors until the time shall have passed when his transactions can be inquired into. Then he will go into bankruptcy and take the benefit of the law.

I am opposed to that, Mr. Chairman. I believe the people of my State who want a bankruptcy law, and want it badly, are opposed to the enactment of a bankruptcy law that shall include only voluntary bankruptcy. They desire a national law which will operate for the benefit of both debtors and creditors. They do not want to strike down their own law, which has worked so satisfactorily now for about half a century, until something better is provided in its stead.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas has offered us an amendment, and I desire to ask the careful attention of the committee to his amendment. He proposes to provide that an act of bankruptcy shall be, in the first place, the act of one who has fraudulently contracted a debt. Now, that ought not to be an act of bankruptcy—that alone. Where a man has fraudulently contracted a debt and is amply able to pay it, it ought not to be in the power of any one man to put him into bankruptcy to the detriment of the rest of his creditors. And if that shall be made an act of bankruptcy, I most respectfully suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that it should read in this way: "Being insolvent, has fraudulently contracted a debt," which is the subject of proof in a bankruptcy proceeding. It would be worse than any provision now in this bill if a single creditor holding a claim that he alleges has been contracted fraudulently could put a debtor into bankruptcy, destroy his property, and injure the interests of every other creditor.

The second provision of the amendment is that it shall be considered an act of bankruptcy if a person has sold or transferred his property or some part thereof with intent to defeat his creditors. Certainly, I differ entirely with the construction of the learned gentleman from Kansas. This language can not possibly include a preference. It is not fraudulent for a debtor to prefer one creditor over another. He has a right to do it, unless forbidden by statute. He can not be said to transfer his property "with intent to defeat his creditors" if he simply prefers one to another.

The words of this amendment refer only to a common-law fraud, the transfer from the debtor of his property to some third persons, to hold it upon some secret trust for him. That is an old fraudulent transfer which has been known ever since the statute of Elizabeth. Under this amendment a preference would not be an act of bankruptcy.

A transfer of property by a man who is in debt to one of his creditors in preference to all others is not such a transfer as is described by the language of the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas. His amendment would leave all the evils described by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in full force and effect. It would allow a man to contract debts to any amount whatever, then to suffer judgment upon the debt, and allow his property to be swept away and his honest creditors left without anything to pay their claims. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if after a judgment of that kind had been had and execution proceedings had been taken and the property taken away from the debtor whether there is any provision in the law of Pennsylvania by which honest creditors can find out whether the judgment is upon a genuine debt or not?

Mr. MAHON. Not unless it has become a matter of record. Then they have a right to inquire into it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to any proceedings of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

On motion of Mr. KNOX, by unanimous consent, the time of Mr. MOODY was extended for three minutes.

Mr. MOODY. There is only one other thought that I wanted to present to the committee, and it is this: I have been in and out here for several days and have heard a good deal about the poor debtor class, but I have not heard much about the poor creditor class. I for one have something to say for the creditor class. I was surprised when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] got up here and condemned this bill because, as he said, it was simply "for the purpose of facilitating the collection of debts." In the name of God, gentlemen, why should you not facilitate the collection of debts? Is there anything wrong about that? Is it any objection to this bill that it will facilitate the collection of debts? Who are the people who own the debts?

Why, Mr. Chairman, there is not any creditor class. Every man who is a creditor, who is in business and whose business affairs this bill will touch, is a debtor as well. Who are the creditor class that are asking for this legislation? They are the great commercial bodies throughout this country, who are composed of men who are creditors and debtors at the same time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says there is no demand for the enactment of this bill. Where has he been during this session of Congress that he has not heard the demand that is coming up from all parts of the country, from those who are engaged in commercial transactions, for the passage of a bankruptcy bill like this, and in opposition to the passage of a bill containing the voluntary provision alone? I have heard nothing on this subject except petitions for the passage of this bill.

In whose interest are those petitions? In whose interest is the passage of this bill asked? It is asked in the interest of the manufacturers, not the great capitalists, but the men who make the goods that are distributed throughout this country, the shoes, the cotton and woolen goods, the manufactured products of all kinds that our people buy and use. They ask for this bill, and all they ask is that when a man arrives at a position where he can not pay his debts in full, they, as creditors, shall be allowed to share equally with every other creditor. They ask nothing more than that. Is not that just? Who else is asking for this bill? The banks of the country. I am speaking to practical men. What interest have the banks of the country in this measure? There is no man who has been a director of a bank who has not had the experience of going into the directors' room upon every directors' day and negotiating the discount of pieces of commercial paper coming from all parts of this country.

At the very last meeting I attended I remember discounting two or three large pieces of paper from concerns in the State of the gentleman from Minnesota who sits before me. Any bank, at least any bank in the Eastern sections of the country, has in its drawer at any given time pieces of commercial paper that have been issued in almost every State in the Union. The banks are getting upon those loans less than 6 per cent on the average. They are lending that money to our friends in the West. Why? Because they can lend it cheaper than local capitalists there can lend it. Are gentlemen not willing to pay them? Are they not willing, when they are lending them money at less than 6 per cent, to pay them? Are they not willing to give these banks, which have taken the capital from where it is plentiful and distributed it in those portions of the country where it is needed, the right to share equally in the assets of the debtor when misfortune overtakes him—willing (to use the expression of the gentleman from Pennsylvania) to help the banks to collect their debts?

Mr. TAWNEY. Speaking for Minnesota, I say that we are.

Mr. MOODY. I am glad to say that we have never had experience of any other kind with Minnesota. Now, Mr. Chairman, all I want to add is that this bill ought to be defeated or else it ought to be passed with the involuntary provision in it. If it is to be made a mere voluntary bankrupt law it is worse than nothing, and I hope, if it comes to that, that the bill will be rejected.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it gives me the utmost gratification to see at last that the advocates of this bill have come out of the brush and have announced its true purpose. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], whose people own, perhaps, more claims against poor debtors than the people of any State in this Union—

Mr. MOODY. I have not been in "the brush," so the gentleman will please not talk about my coming out of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. The gentleman comes from a State where more of these claims perhaps are owned than in any other State in this Union, and he has now, for the first time, announced that this is a bill for the purpose of collecting debts, and that is the reason and the sole reason he advocates it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on the day when this discussion first opened the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], with trembling voice and with tears in his eyes, said that this bill was for the purpose of letting those poor men who had been unfortunate escape from the burden of their debts. And that was followed up by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], whose only ground for advocating the bill was that by the laws of various States there is placed in the hands of a single creditor the means of issuing an attachment against a debtor and taking all his property. Those were the two grounds on which this bill was advocated. Yet we find now that the true secret of the bill is that it is a bill for the collection of debts.

In this bill there are provisions under which every merchant in Kansas City (in which I reside) can be placed in bankruptcy. There are provisions in this bill by which a man having any amount of property may be placed in bankruptcy because subsequently to the time of the commission of the acts named or within six months accident may happen to him so that at the time of the filing of the petition he may not have sufficient property to pay his debts.

Mr. MOODY. Let me ask the gentleman what provision of the bill does that? What provision puts a man into bankruptcy under such circumstances?

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Section 2—the very provision we are now discussing.

Mr. MOODY. Let me point out to the gentleman that he is mistaken. That section provides that a man shall be put into bankruptcy only when he is insolvent; and then if the gentleman will turn to the definition of an insolvent in this bill—the most liberal definition that has ever been embraced in any bill—he will find that if upon a fair valuation of his property the debtor can pay all he owes he is not to be regarded as insolvent.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Yes; but that matter is determined at the time when the petition is filed; and if at any time within six months previous he has permitted an attachment to remain on his property, however unjustly it may have been issued, however iniquitous the claim may be on which it is founded—if that attachment is allowed to remain upon his property for thirty days without his obtaining a release he is regarded as having committed an act of bankruptcy and may be thrown into the bankruptcy court. I say that under that kind of a provision the most iniquitous claim on earth may be used to throw a man into bankruptcy, because there is not one case in a million where an attachment could be released within the thirty days. In this way, then, a man may under such a provision be thrown into bankruptcy and unjustly oppressed.

But what is the situation in regard to a man's property so far as the determination of the question of his insolvency is concerned? When the petition is filed, an assessment is made of the value of the debtor's property, based upon its value upon a forced sale under bankruptcy proceedings, and though the man's property fairly valued might be three times what would be required to pay his debts, yet when you estimate it upon the basis of a forced sale, that property might be adjudged insufficient to meet the indebtedness, although under ordinary circumstances and with ordinary business management it might be more than three times enough to pay the man's indebtedness. I say, then, that under the provisions of this bill any man, however honest, may be thrown into bankruptcy by an accident, because forsooth his paper is not paid within thirty days after it matures. If a man's note, by accident or otherwise, happens to remain unpaid for thirty days he may be thrown into bankruptcy, and that, too, not by the man whose paper is unpaid, but by any creditor, even though that creditor's claim may be but $10. Such a creditor, because of the debtor's default upon another man's paper, may throw him into bankruptcy. The great majority of the man's creditor's may not wish him to go into bankruptcy. But here comes along a Jew clothing merchant from the city of New York or Boston—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask that my colleague be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman from Kansas allow me a single suggestion?

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOODY. The gentleman has just stated that an accidental failure to pay a promissory note may be a cause of bankruptcy.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOODY. Now, let me call the gentleman's attention to this language of section 2, which defines acts of bankruptcy:

Suspended and not resumed for thirty days and until a petition is filed, while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. But I say that, in the administration of this bill, if a man's property, when the petition in bankruptcy is filed, is not three times enough to pay his debts he will be regarded as insolvent, because the value of his property is estimated at what it would bring at a forced sale by order of a bankruptcy court.

Now, I say, there may come along a man whose claim amounts to but $10; other creditors, whose claims may amount to a hundred thousand dollars, may be anxious that a debtor shall continue in business; but that man whose claim amounts to but $10 may, under this bill, put the debtor into bankruptcy.

Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts. Oh, no; it requires three creditors, and the indebtedness must amount to $500.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Where is there any such provision in the bill? I ask the gentleman to look it up.

Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts. I can turn to it in a moment.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. One man can do it. Let gentlemen turn to section 12.

Mr. RAY. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to this provision of the bill:

SEC. 59. WHO MAY FILE AND DISMISS PETITIONS.—a Any qualified person may file a petition to be adjudged a voluntary bankrupt.

b Three or more creditors who have provable claims against any person which amount in the aggregate, in excess of the value of securities held by them, if any, to $500 or over—

Now, let the gentleman withdraw his statement about a creditor with a claim of only $10.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I will admit that in stating the sum of $10 I was not quite accurate.

Mr. RAY (continuing to read)— or if all of the creditors of such person are less than twelve in number, then one of such creditors whose claim equals such amount may file a petition to have him adjudged a bankrupt.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. So far as my statement is concerned that a creditor to the amount of $10 might put a man in bankruptcy it is wrong; but so far as it relates to the five-hundred-dollar man it is correct in every particular. No one can dispute that fact.

Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts. If there are less than twelve creditors.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Now, if the desire of the people framing this bill is, as stated, just to relieve the embarrassed, honest debtor, and second, to protect the creditors from having the property of the debtor taken away by attachment, why are they not willing to strike out from the bill the drastic provisions to which I have referred and leave only those provisions in it which are supposed to be capable of accomplishing the object they have in view—the provisions under which an attachment can be issued in a State court; that is, in cases of fraud? If what you claim is true, that the groundwork of the bill is to provide that one creditor shall not step in and by attachment absorb all of the estate to the exclusion of all others, why not leave the voluntary provision in the bill and restrict the involuntary provision to acts of fraud, on which the attachment might issue, just as it would issue in a State court? That would, in effect, meet every provision that the gentleman from Iowa in charge of the bill, the gentleman from Illinois, and others claim the bill was intended to accomplish.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, we recognize that it might help some manufacturer in Massachusetts with that out. You would not be willing to consent to anything of that kind.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman from Iowa that I was born in Maine; my people lived in Maine; they are New England people, and I have no prejudices against Massachusetts, such as he seems to think in his assertion. I have no prejudice against Massachusetts as a State, or against any other State or any other part of New England; but I do say that no bill should be passed here by this House which is an instrument of oppression and an engine in the hands of the creditors of this country in addition to those already given by the States to oppress the people of the Western country, who, forsooth, happen to be in debt.

The people of the West are as honorable, as upright, and as correct in their business transactions as any other people in the United States or in the world. But unfortunately they have become involved in debt to some extent, and it is not right that under those conditions which exist among them an additional burden of oppression or an engine of oppression shall be given into the hands of the creditor class of the country to harass and oppress our people in the future.

I say that this bill, in all of its features, is a bill for the purpose, and that alone, that was announced here by the gentleman from Massachusetts a few moments ago; and if the House passes it it will never become a law; but even if it should pass and it ever becomes a law, it will be one of the most unpopular acts that ever emanated from a Republican House, and for that I shall be exceedingly sorry.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a bankruptcy bill, both voluntary and involuntary, but I want the bill to be just in its terms. I want the involuntary sections declaring acts of bankruptcy to be limited to acts of fraud, such as might be grounds for attachment. By the terms of this bill as it now stands innocent men, who in the ordinary course of business might pay every dollar of their debts, may be thrown into bankruptcy and irretrievably ruined; and worse than all, under its provisions, although a man may have acted honestly, notably in the matter of preferences, after he has been ruined and his property taken he can not be discharged from his debts under the provisions of this bill unless the bill is materially amended. I can not in justice to my people support it, and I sincerely hope it will not pass in its present form.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that it was not the purpose of my colleague from Massachusetts, who addressed the committee a few moments ago, to convey the impression that the only purpose of this bill was the collection of debts. It was, I am quite sure, his purpose to say that it should not operate against this bill, in effect, that under it the honest creditor might be able to collect his debts which otherwise would be lost to him. The honest man who owns the debt has the same right before the courts, and should have before all courts, as the honest debtor that owes the debt.

This law has but a single interest in view, and that is that the honest debtor who shall honestly surrender his property to be divided among his creditors shall be discharged from the obligations of indebtedness, and that the honest creditor who has the debt shall receive his due and fair proportion of the estate, and take, with all others, exactly his proportion on a fair division of the estate.

There is in this bill, contrary to the assertion of the gentleman from Kansas, no question affecting the North, East, South, or West, but it is a bill of equal beneficence throughout the whole borders of the country. It deals equally with all men. And let me say to the gentleman from Kansas, or anyone else from that locality who attacks the bill on the ground that it may be oppressive to them, that when this bill is passed the capital of the great East will again flow to the West, to be loaned there, to be invested there, to build up industries there, and start men in business, to build houses, found banks, and organize new industries just as it did in the past. There can be no greater benefit, no bill passed that would add so materially to the best interests of the country, or that will aid so thoroughly the debtor people of the West as this very bill, which will assure those who have money to invest that if they make their investment they shall share equally with all others in the property of a debtor who fails to comply with his obligations, and that there is a law to protect them from the operation of fraud.

Now, I beg of the committee and the House to consider what would be the effect of passing a purely voluntary bill. All the laws in Massachusetts, the laws in nearly all the great Commonwealths of this country, which provide against fraudulent preferences on the part of debtors, which provide against the transfer of property for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors, are contained in the insolvent laws of the various States. And the moment you pass a bill here, even if it provides that nothing but voluntary bankruptcy shall be the rule, when it goes into operation it supersedes the insolvent laws of the States, and we should in these great commercial States be deprived of any law which operates against commercial frauds. And I agree fully with my colleague that it is far better no law should be passed, that the laws should remain as they are, rather than that a purely voluntary bill should pass.

Now, as to the oppression which may prevail under this bill. The law of 1867 went into operation at about the time I came to the bar. I was familiar with the practice under it. I never knew of a case where a creditor employed the provisions of the law of 1867 to oppress an honest debtor, and I never heard of one in my locality or anywhere else.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will you permit a question?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are you aware of the fact that President Grant, in his message recommending the repeal of the act of 1867, put it upon the ground that it was used for the purpose of oppression?

Mr. KNOX. I will answer that I heard read from the desk what I supposed to be a portion of the annual message of President Grant. President Grant was a great general, the greatest that the country ever saw. We all worship him; but he was not a lawyer, and presumably had no experience under the bankruptcy act of 1867. I am simply stating what my experience and my knowledge were, and I was about to say that I never heard of a dozen cases tried by a jury where the issue of insolvency set up by the creditors was denied. There were no such trials. They were the rarest, which showed conclusively, Mr. Chairman, that creditors were not using the provisions of that law for the purpose of oppressing their debtors. If a man can pay his debts, he should pay them. If he can not pay them, his property should be divided among his creditors equally. If he surrenders his property to be divided, he should be discharged. The right of the creditors to have the property equally divided is no less sacred and important than that of the debtor to be discharged; and to deny that must amount to a denial of justice, and nothing else.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. KNOX] is well qualified to speak for his own State. I have some doubts as to whether he is as well qualified to speak for the West as are some gentlemen who reside there. Perhaps none of us are so well qualified as those who will be affected by this bill. I have just received a telegram from some gentlemen representing very heavy business interests in the State of Indiana. I send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read at the conclusion of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

TERRE HAUTE, IND., May 1, 1896.

Hon. BENSON WOOD, House of Representatives:

We believe the Torrey bankrupt law a good thing for fifty-thousand-dollar failures and up, but it means confiscation of a large part of the estates under $5,000. Out of a total number of failures in the United States and Canada (1895) of 14,874, 12,986 employed a capital of less than $5,000 each. We respectfully urge you to vote and work against its passage in the interest of all the West.

E. H. BINDLEY & CO.
BEMENT, REA & CO.
HULMAN & CO.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, on the 4th day of March, 1893, the Democratic party came into power in this country. Since that time the failures and the shrinkages of value in wages and property in this country have been greater in number and larger in amount than in any other like period in the history of this country or any other country. In view of the thousands and tens of thousands of men who have been broken up and reduced to poverty during that time, I should be glad to-day to vote for a voluntary bankruptcy bill, with proper restrictions, limited in its operation to one or two years. The existing business interests of the country that have not been utterly destroyed by the accession to power of this old Democratic party are standing now tottering upon their weakened legs, and now you are here proposing an involuntary bankruptcy bill to complete the work that the united Democratic party so far have been unable to accomplish. [Laughter and applause.]

I should favor a voluntary bankruptcy bill, in order that the thousands and tens of thousands of good, straight, honest men in this country who have gone down under this political cyclone that has struck the country—I would favor a voluntary bankruptcy bill that would enable them to wipe out past scores and start anew in the battle of life, but I would not put it in the power of the great, the powerful, and the strong to wreck the remaining business interests of the country that are struggling with all their might and main to keep their heads above water until the glorious day, which is not far hence, when the friends of the American working men and women and the friends of American industries will resume possession of the country again. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to whoever may desire it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Upon the whole, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill; but that the involuntary features of it are subject to very great objection can not, in my mind, be doubted. Let me call the attention of the House again to section 59 and give you two or three illustrations under that section. It provides that—

Three or more creditors who have provable claims against any person which amount in the aggregate, in excess of the value of securities held by them, if any, to $500 or over—may force a debtor into bankruptcy. Now, I ask the calm and deliberate judgment of this House with regard to this provision. What are we about to do? It makes no difference how much money a man owes, it makes no difference how many people a man owes, it makes no difference what the great majority of his creditors desire, if three of his creditors only, representing $500, wish it, they can force him into bankruptcy, against the desire and consent of every other creditor. I appeal to the common, fair sense of this House if that is plain, straightforward, average American justice.

To go on: The real tyranny and iniquity of this section comes now, if I may use such language in reference to it. The section continues:

If all the creditors of such person are less than twelve in number, then one of such creditors whose claim equals $500 may force him into bankruptcy.

To illustrate: I owe 11 men. I owe 10 of them $1,000 each. They are satisfied that I can pay them in time. They have no desire to oppress me. They are not asking for their money. They tell me to go on and work out this indebtedness. They have confidence in my ability to do so, and confidence in my integrity, but one man, to whom I owe the pitiful sum of $500, forces me into bankruptcy, against my will, and against the will of the 10 creditors to whom I owe $1,000 each.

Mr. RAY. May I make a suggestion there?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. Suppose you do not permit him? Suppose he is not permitted to force a man into bankruptcy? What will be the result?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I do not know what you mean.

Mr. RAY. He can bring a suit and obtain his judgment in twenty days in my State, and I suppose that is about the time in nearly all the States. He would obtain his judgment, issue his execution, levy upon and sell the property of this man, and ruin him in his business. Well, stop all of this business. Now, there can be no question about the fact that he has the right under the State laws to enforce the obligation of the contract.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Yes; if it is due.

Mr. RAY. Why not permit one in this case that you mention and three in the other cases mentioned here to put him into bankruptcy when he gets where he can not pay, does not pay, and is unable to pay?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Well, I do not want all of this to come out of my time.

Mr. RAY. I will ask that you have further time, because this is not a matter that is to be rushed. A fair discussion should be given, and I am delighted, so far as I am concerned, to hear an expression of opinion. Now, I want right there to say that in a case of that kind, where there is only one, and they want to give this man further time, if they desire him to go on and pursue his business, let them raise the money. [Laughter.] Let them buy up this claim, and that will prevent forcing the man into bankruptcy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes further time.

There was no objection.

Mr. FAIRCHILD and Mr. RAY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD] to ask a question.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I want to ask my colleague from New York what would be done in the case if the defendant had a defense to the piece of paper? Would it not compel such a defendant to fight out that defense in bankruptcy proceedings, when otherwise he could fight it out under the ordinary statutes?

Mr. RAY. What is the difference, whether you fight out your defense in the State court—

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I do not want a controversy between the gentlemen in my time.

Mr. RAY (continuing). Or whether you fight out your defense in the United States courts under this provision?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I think the difference is very clear.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I must decline to yield further. I will undertake to answer the gentleman's question, as I now recollect it. He asks what evil effect would result when a party is thrown into bankruptcy. I want to call his attention to the fact that in the commercial world the moment a charge of bankruptcy is made against a debtor he is gone. If his paper is worth 75 cents on the dollar to-day, and you charge him by petition as being a bankrupt, to-morrow it is not worth 40 cents on the dollar, notwithstanding the fact that he may prove in court that your charge against him is not true, and that he be restored as far as possible to his position before the charge was made. The shadow that will follow him and ultimately drive him to poverty is the result of the first step you took. And this great and cruel power you propose to place in one creditor to whom the debtor owes the pitiful sum of $500, when the rest of his creditors are not seeking to accomplish such a purpose.

Mr. RAY. Is it not true in practice that when a man is in failing circumstances and unable to pay his debts, if one creditor sues the news goes out and everybody sues, and the man has to go down?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. That may be so in any given case, but it is not necessarily so, or generally so.

Mr. RAY. Now, then, is there any greater injury or hardship by reason of having a petition filed against a man in bankruptcy than there is, under like circumstances, in having a suit brought against him in the State court and judgment rendered?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. There is. If a suit is brought and judgment rendered, he may pay the judgment; but if you file your petition throwing him into bankruptcy, you cast a cloud upon him which hangs over him forever.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say that under the old act of 1867 I had considerable practice in bankruptcy, and I believe that many beneficial results follow such a law, and I believe that this country demands, for its commercial interests, a universal bankrupt law. I am not especially opposed to an involuntary bankrupt law, but I am opposed to an involuntary bankrupt law, that gives such power, such cruel power, to one creditor as this bill does.

Again, turn to page 6 of the bill. The fourth ground for throwing a man into bankruptcy is that he has made an assignment. Think about that a moment. Here is Mr. A. He says: "I can not pay my debts; my assets are $15,000; I can not pay all that I owe; I will make an assignment for the benefit of my creditors." He makes an assignment. There is no preference about it; there is no fraud about it. He says: "I want every creditor I have to get 15 cents or 20 cents or 60 cents on the dollar." Now, the very moment that man makes an assignment under the State law, you come in by this law and adjudge him a bankrupt. Is that just? He is doing the very best he can for his creditors; he has put all his property into the hands of an assignee for their benefit, for the purpose of paying his debts. Yet the moment he does that, along comes your act of Congress and says that he has committed an act of bankruptcy.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The case the gentleman supposes would be after the passage of this law, so that there would be two laws between which to choose, this law and the State law. Now, to which would the gentleman give the preference? Under the assignment the man's property would be taken and distributed among his creditors, and under this bankruptcy law also his property would be taken and distributed among his creditors; but the difference is that when the distribution was made under the bankrupt law he would get a discharge, while under the State law he would not.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. But suppose he prefers the other course. Suppose he prefers to make an assignment under the State law and pay 50 cents on the dollar, or whatever his estate can pay, to every creditor, and have the estate administered upon by some man that he chooses to administer it. The very moment that he says: "I will be honest; I will make an assignment of all my estate for the benefit of my creditors; I choose my neighbor, whom I have known all my life and in whom I have perfect confidence, to administer the estate so that it may pay 50 cents on the dollar, or the highest amount it will pay;" the moment he says that, this act of Congress comes along and tells him: "You have committed an act of bankruptcy in trying to be honest."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the criticisms that have been made upon my amendment by the gentleman from Massachusetts and others, and on further reflection, I will ask consent to modify the amendment by inserting in the fifth line, after the word "having," the words "while insolvent"; and also by changing the word "of" to "in."

There was no objection, and the amendment was so modified.

A MEMBER. Let the Clerk read the amendment as it will stand in its modified form.

The amendment of Mr. BRODERICK, as printed above, was read with these modifications.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE]. The effect of that amendment is easily understood. It is to strike out the involuntary features of this bill. That is the sole and only purpose of the amendment.

Now, I want to say to my friend from Kansas that I live in the West, and I lived there, I guess, a long time before his feet touched Western soil. I went there when a child, and I expect to be buried in the West—and not buried by my efforts in behalf of a bankruptcy bill either. The people in the West are honest, and they want an honest, complete law. I think that, although a Western man, I am big enough to see this whole country and not to be influenced by any petty demagogism (and I am not referring to the gentleman) that may be thrust into this debate. I do not intend that any arguments for this bill shall be good in Massachusetts which are not good in Iowa and in Kansas and Louisiana.

The gentlemen entering into this debate to-day in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania forget all the while what can be done and is done under State law. The only gentleman who has struck the keynote of thought on this question is the gentleman in front of me, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. KNOX], who has said truthfully, as I believe, that the passage of this bill with the involuntary provisions will let Eastern money flow into the West and give us credit there. Sir, I favor this bill because it will bring peace and confidence throughout the entire country to business and industrial circles. When the men selling goods and lending money know that there is a method for reaching what belongs to them, based on high equitable grounds—that the grabber shall not get ahead—that the man “on the spot” shall not get ahead, but that all shall share equitably, whether the creditor lives at the Golden Gate or in the Pine State of Maine, then the debtor will have peace and there will be no rushing and grabbing among creditors.

Ah, gentlemen, there are men like those signing the telegram read to-day, presented by my friend from Illinois [Mr. WOOD], who have got, as I said in my opening remarks, their line of arrangements made through attorneys at every town; they have got a trap set by which, if possible, they shall first the victim catch; there are large jobbing houses in the cities who are opposed to this bill because they think they can get under present State laws an advantage over their fellow-men; and there are in some little towns and county seats lawyers who think they can do better without a bankrupt law because they may slip in ahead with some State writ and take care of their creditor clients. But, my fellow-countrymen, that is not a consideration on which to rest a question of this kind.

Pertinent to what came from Indiana, I hold in my hand a letter from a distinguished citizen of that State, received by me this morning. I will read the closing paragraph:

I think the impression of some of our Western boards of trade upon the bankruptcy question was that by reason of the nearness of our merchants to their customers they had an advantage with a failing debtor over the distant creditor, and that this would be surrendered under a bankrupt bill. It seems to me to be a short-sighted view of the question.

That letter is written by a no less distinguished man than Benjamin Harrison [applause], who in a Presidential message recommended a comprehensive bankruptcy bill, and who, whether President or private citizen, stands for every part of this country and all its great interests.

Some of our friends here favor bankruptcy proceedings which shall recognize only the debtor class. It is my judgment that such a bill would do irreparable damage to all debtors who wish to obtain credit. I am in favor of fully protecting the rights of that class. Its interests are perfectly cared for in this bill. Not with a “tear in my eye,” as sneeringly remarked by the gentleman from Kansas—as far from a tear when I opened this debate as I am now—

Mr. BRODERICK. To what “gentleman from Kansas” does my friend refer?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not you; no sneer ever came from your lip to me.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. There is no gentleman in this House whom I desire to treat with more consideration than the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is all right. Just drop the “tear” when you are striking at this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to occupy five minutes more. The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to impress upon the minds of gentlemen here what I said in the opening of the debate, and what several of you were not here to listen to—that I do not think it is proper to pass such a law as will say that when a man is in failing circumstances, and there is a citizen from whom he has borrowed money or received goods on credit, the debtor should be allowed to have the whole say-so in respect to his estate. If any man lends me $10,000 worth of assets, which go into my business and which I allow to run down to $5,000, am I, the debtor, the only one who should say what should be done with what remains? Shall the creditor who trusted me with that property upon which I have been living for years, upon which I have been feeding myself, my wife and children, be debarred from coming in and having something to say as to when and how the assets should be distributed?

Gentlemen, there is an old Scotch proverb, “Fair play at the teetotum”; and this idea of fair play runs entirely through this general bankruptcy bill. I do not want partisan speeches here; I do not want sectionalism here. I want broad Americanism, upon which we can all stand. I do not want any bankruptcy bill which is not for the interest alike of the East and the West and the North and the South, and I shall be disappointed if the final vote shows that this House does not occupy the same position.

The amendment offered by my friend from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] is infinitely better than the one-sided, jug-handled proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which I thank God does not come from the “wild and woolly West.” I am, for good reasons, opposed to them both. The amendment of my colleague on the committee from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] has the merit of giving both sides something to say about these things. He limits it to three reasons or grounds.

This bill, as you well know, has nine grounds. Now, his first ground is new and is not in the bill under consideration. The second proposition of the gentleman from Kansas is substantially the same as clause 3 of section 2 of our bill. That ground is in most respects the same as ours. The third is in hæc verba the first section of our bill. The first ground that was in the bill has been adopted verbatim et literatim by my friend from Kansas; so we have two of our grounds, one of them absolutely and the other nearly so, embodied in his amendment, and one new one. But he leaves out six.

Now, let us pause for a moment and examine these six and see what they are. No. 1 of the bill is in the Broderick amendment, if he will allow me to so designate it. No. 2, which we would include as an act of bankruptcy—let us examine it and see what it is:

If he (the debtor) fails for thirty days, and until a petition is filed, while insolvent, to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold within such time under such process, then until three days before the time fixed for such sale.

If a man has reached that condition where his property is levied on by process of law, which property is held in the court for the benefit of some of his creditors under the said law who are going to ride roughshod over the rights of the other creditors and secure a preference for particular claims, I ask if it is not time that the law should step in and say, “Unloose your hands; let us all divide ratably?” I say that it is an essential element of a sound bill.

The third ground has been adopted, as I have already said, by my friend from Kansas in his amendment. The fourth ground he leaves out. What is it?

Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts.

Gentlemen, when a debtor voluntarily lays aside the robes of business, when he locks the store door and says, “I quit; I throw up the sponge; I can not fight the battle any longer,” and goes voluntarily and makes an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, are we not justified in stepping into the court of bankruptcy and saying: “We take you at your word, but your own picked assignee, let us inform you, shall not have the whole say-so in regard to the matter.” We say, “We will tear up your assignment giving preference to anyone or putting the property into the hands of some member of your family to be distributed according to your own judgment and discretion, so that all of your creditors shall have the benefit of their proportionate share of your property.”

Mr. NORTHWAY. Right there, if the gentleman from Iowa will permit me, in response to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON] let me say that in the State of Ohio, as soon as an assignment is made, the creditors can get together and take the property out of the hands of the assignee and put it in the hand of one of their own number or a person of their own selection, for distribution.

Mr. HENDERSON. And a wise provision of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit me, I would like to say that under the law of Ohio, which the gentleman from Iowa compliments, the first proposition that follows the assignment is the selection usually of some friend of the debtor, perhaps his wife or some near relative, to administer the estate; but the creditors come together, and by a vote of the majority take the property out of the hands of the assignee and place it in possession of a trustee for distribution.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Then that must be the case only in your district.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; that is the law of the State.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I have never known it done.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That makes no difference. That is the law of Ohio.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. That is not the operation of the law generally in the State.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I shall resume the floor, with the consent of these gentlemen, for a few moments. I would like very much to hear these distinguished doctors fight out the argument on their own ground, because it is a very interesting question, if I had the time; but it is very limited.

Now, the fifth ground of bankruptcy in the bill is that the debtor has—

Made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference, and has not regained the ownership of such property or released same from such levy before the rights of creditors shall have been altered, changed, or impaired by reason of such transfer, taking, or levy, and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy.

Now, a man, when he is insolvent, who permits or makes a transfer of his property, and gives a preference to A, B, or C as against the rights and claims of D, E, or F, do you think it an unjust law that steps in and says, "No; we will have fair play. There must be a ratable distribution; a fair divide."

Mr. HEPBURN. If my colleague will permit me a moment, I would like to ask him a question.

In this section of the bill, section 2, the act of bankruptcy in the second provision is in the following words:

Failed for thirty days and until a petition is filed while insolvent, to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold within such time, under such process, then until three days before the time fixed for such sale.

And the fifth is:

Having made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property, or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference, etc.

Now, suppose an attachment runs against the property of an individual, and he releases it by a transfer of a portion of his property. He avoids the second ground of bankruptcy, but does he not come within the provisions of the fifth by that very act of attempting to save the estate?

Mr. HENDERSON. I think he would be ripped up in both, and ought to be. That would be my interpretation of that. Now I come to the sixth ground of bankruptcy:

Procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself—with intent to defraud his creditors.

How?

And under section 1 of the dictionary which we have passed that includes the element of fraud; so that this must be interpreted to mean "who fraudulently intending to defeat his creditors" has done this.

Oh, gentlemen, are you defending that sort of a proceeding? Are you attacking a law that will bring a man up into court for fair treatment who fraudulently is seeking to defeat his creditors by these operations?

I pass to the seventh ground:

Secreted—

The sneak, the thief, from honest creditors—

Secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself, and to defeat his creditors, to commit a fraud upon them.

I implore my technical brethren of the law who are influenced by memories of old laws to see how we have guarded this, so that only those who should be proceeded against are brought within the scope of the guns of this bill. Now let me pass to the eighth ground:

Suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed.

Creditors are not very apt to move hastily, even in bankruptcy, where an execution is returned "no property found." If the sheriff under the wide and fine-tooth-comb proceedings of the State law, and with all the whips and spurs that creditors put into the hands of the sheriff, is compelled to return a writ "no property found," I think it will be well to see if a trustee can not find some property. Now I come to the ninth and last ground of bankruptcy:

Suspended and not resumed for thirty days and until a petition is filed, while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over.

Mr. GRAFF. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether he thinks that the simple fact that an execution is returned "no property found" indicates that a man has no real estate?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if that is not prima facie evidence of it?

Mr. GRAFF. Not at all.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GRAFF. Under the State law of Illinois one of the ways of preserving a judgment lien upon real estate is to have an execution taken out and returned "no property found."

Mr. HENDERSON. If that is so, the only way to set aside those liens is under a general bankruptcy law.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not agree with the gentleman. A man may have thousands of acres of real estate, and an execution may be returned "no property found" for the very purpose of preserving a lien of a judgment which the judgment creditor may not wish to immediately enforce.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then it only increases the weight of the argument; because here is the only remedy that will set aside such a lien.

Now let me come to the ninth and last ground of bankruptcy, the one which disturbs some of our friends, I think, more than anything else and which disturbs me the least. One gentleman said yesterday that he regarded this as "perfidious," and that if the ninth ground should be left in, he could not vote for the bill; but I notice that he has been obstructing the bill at every stage of the proceeding, so I think he has other objections to the bill outside of this one ground. Now let me ask these gentlemen in all candor, if a merchant or a man giving commercial paper lets it go unpaid for thirty days and does not renew it—which will save him—I want to know if his condition is much worse than it will be after proceedings are commenced in a bankruptcy court?

Why, my fellow-citizens and countrymen and legislators, there is nothing so dear to the heart of the man in the commercial world as the meeting of his commercial paper. Let his commercial paper go to protest for an hour, and the fine edge of his ambition is gone. Every lawyer and every intelligent citizen of this country knows that. Do you tell me that it is worse to bring him into a court where equity can be done to all than to have some creditor go to work and bring suit on the unpaid paper, which he can readily do? And he can do so at once. No; thirty days of grace is given him under State law.

Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON] to the fact that in the case of a man whose note goes unpaid from one to thirty days the man to whom the note is due can go ahead and sue on it "without consulting anybody," to use his own words.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HENDERSON. I can not yield now. I am calling the gentleman's attention to the fact that "one" fellow whose note is past due from one to thirty days and unpaid, and when the debtor is not able to pay it—the creditor can go ahead under State laws and bring suit on that single note. Now, what is there in a bankruptcy proceeding that makes it worse? Bankruptcy is simply insolvency or wicked rascality. That is all. It is simply a suit for the benefit of all instead of a suit for the benefit of one. Then you gentlemen who are fighting for a voluntary bankruptcy bill—my eloquent and delightful friend from Illinois [Mr. MARSH], whose voice always thrills me with pleasure and joy, pleaded for a voluntary bill; and my friend from Ohio [Mr. WATSON] complains because involuntary bankruptcy will write disgrace on a man, and yet he pleads for voluntary bankruptcy.

Is it any more disgrace for the creditors to put it on him than for himself to do so? In fact, it seems to me a little worse where a fellow goes into the courts of his country and says, "I am a bankrupt." That is what he says. Ah, gentlemen, these are differences with which it is unworthy to disturb our minds if a man is insolvent—and that is what he must be—if he has commercial paper going for thirty days that he can not meet—and remember, too, that he must be insolvent. Gentlemen forget, I fear, what I pointed out in the opening discussion, that under the act of 1867 the fraudulent suspension for a single moment gives right of action. Suspension of commercial paper for fourteen days, whether a man was solvent or insolvent, under the act of 1867, gave the right of action. This we have changed. We have extended the fourteen days to thirty days, and in addition to that there must in fact be insolvency, and the amount of the default must be at least $500. No such limitation as to amount was in the act of 1867.

Now is that terribly harsh? Anyone who can shuffle around among his friends, if he has any recuperative powers in himself or standing in the business world, will have that paper paid or renewed. But if in thirty days he is not able to renew or pay that paper, the very best possible course, not only in his interest but in that of his creditors, is to bring him where there can be a fair distribution or amicable settlement, and let him start de novo.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and under that leave I want to print in the RECORD section 6338 of the revised statutes of Ohio, providing the means for the removal of any trustee previously appointed in the case of an insolvent and the appointment of another by a board of commissioners, who hold an election for that purpose. That statute has been in force in one form or another in the State of Ohio for more than twenty years.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Does anybody deny it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the judge can determine who are creditors and the amount of their claims, but that has no effect as to the validity of their claims except for the purpose of the election.

The section is as follows:

Whenever a petition shall be filed with the court, signed by creditors of the assignor who own not less than $1,000 of debts against the assignor, and the validity of such debts is shown by the schedule of debts on file in the court or otherwise established to the satisfaction of the court, praying for permission to elect a trustee or trustees, the court shall, by its order, fix a time for such election, and cause notices to be sent by mail or otherwise to each of the creditors of the assignor, specifying the time when the creditors shall meet at the court room for the election of a trustee or trustees; and at the time named, in such order, if creditors representing 50 per cent or more of the debts of the assignor are present in person or by attorney, they may proceed to the election of a trustee or trustees, a majority in value of all the debts so represented at such meeting being necessary to choose, and the proceedings of the meeting showing what creditors were present as aforesaid, and the amount of the debts held by them respectively, and who cast their several votes, shall be made out and signed by the president and secretary of the meeting and filed with the court; and if the court approve the choice and the trustee or trustees so elected appear with ten days thereafter and give bond, the court shall appoint him or them as such trustee or trustees, and remove the preceding assignee or trustee: Provided, That the summary determination of the court as to who are creditors and the amount of their claims in this section provided shall have no effect as to the validity of such claims except for the purpose of such election.

Mr. HENDERSON. The only other amendment is that of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON]. In expressing my opposition to it I desire to call his attention to the fact that this bill has what has never been in any bankruptcy bill. He will find on page 19, clause 17, the powers conferred upon the bankrupt court to—

Tax costs and render judgments therefor against the unsuccessful party, or the successful party for cause, or in part against each of the parties, and against the estates, in proceedings in bankruptcy.

Mr. MAHON. Then, if he will read my amendment, it says that they shall pay, if they are defeated, reasonable counsel fees, and the officers' fees; and they ought to pay if they fail.

Mr. HENDERSON. I say we have provided for taxing the costs against the losing party; but we also provide that the title shall not pass to the trustee until after the adjudication. And it is just the same in respect to ordinary suits under State law. The party keeps possession of the property until the final adjudication. So that if any damages or attorney fees are to be taxed, as suggested, against the plaintiff in the bankruptcy proceeding, then it should also be done in suits in the State courts. It would be equally just to do that under the State law. There is no practical distinction. I do not think it should be done in either case.

I wanted to touch upon these three pending amendments. I have covered the ground as well as I could in this hasty talk, and as I talked for two hours at the opening I feel like apologizing for having taken this much time now, and I want to express my sincere appreciation to the committee for having given time to me so generously at this time.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to ask my friend—

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Clause 9, section 2, of the acts of bankruptcy provides that in the event of failure to meet commercial paper in thirty days that is an act of bankruptcy. Will that apply to the indorser also?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly; if the maker fails to meet it, then the sureties are liable, provided that they too are insolvent and the amount is $500 or over.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. The maker's liability is fixed. Now, will the time run as to the indorser just the same as it does to the debtor? He is not always prepared to meet an obligation on which he is surety.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the maker defaults, the surety can pay and save all trouble. If this bill becomes a law, persons becoming sureties must understand all responsibilities that they assume. Remember, also, that under State law the surety must respond at once.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. But the indorser is not always prepared on an emergency to make a payment of that kind under those circumstances.

Mr. HENDERSON. Every surety must consider that when he signs as such. But remember that under bankruptcy and State laws creditors are not interested in rushing in, and prefer to secure their money without litigation. Now I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. Instead of detaining the committee, I will confer with the gentleman.

Mr. HENDERSON. I thank the committee.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is almost the time to take a recess under the rule, and I was about to move that the committee rise.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bankruptcy bill (H. R. 8110) and had come to no resolution thereon.

PASSENGER RATES IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 4585) to regulate passenger rates on railroads in the Indian Territory was recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

RECESS.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the recess be taken until half past 7 o'clock, and that the time for the evening session be continued until 11 p. m.

Mr. ERDMAN and Mr. TALBERT objected.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BRUMM, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence on account of important business.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. PICKLER, by unanimous consent, obtained an order for the reprint of the bill (H. R. 8271) relating to pensions as the same passed the House.

The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the Speaker declared the House in recess until 8 p. m., and announced that at the evening session Mr. PAYNE would preside as Speaker pro tempore.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 p. m., Mr. PAYNE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the special order, which was read by the Clerk, as follows:

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5532) to increase the pension of Josephine Glover.

Mr. CROWTHER. I object.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. This is a highly meritorious bill, and ought to be considered.

Mr. CROWTHER. I withdraw the objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Objection was made.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. PICKLER, the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TATE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and the ayes were 57, noes none.

So the motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special order. The Clerk will read the first bill.

MRS. ANNIS H. ENOCHS.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4275) to increase the pension of Mrs. Annis H. Enoch, widow of Gen. William H. Enoch, from $20 to $50 per month.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pension of Annis H. Enoch, widow of Gen. William H. Enoch, late lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Regiment of West Virginia Volunteer Infantry and brevet brigadier-general, United States Volunteers, be, and the same is hereby, increased from $20 per month to $50 per month, and the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place her name on the pension roll at the rate of $50 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I believe that we had this bill under discussion when the House adjourned on last Friday evening. It is a proposition to increase the pension of the widow of a general, and I desire to move an amendment, which I hope will be sustained by this committee. I move to strike out "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "forty"; so as to make this pension $40 a month. I do this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of attempting to arrive at some common grade or standard for the pensions to be paid to officers and their widows.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 7, strike out "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "forty."

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, as bearing on this subject I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read a letter which I received some days ago from an old soldier—the second letter that I have received from the same gentleman, Captain Cochenour—to whom I reported the effect of publishing his previous letter, which resulted in giving him a pension of $50 a month. I ask to have the letter read in my time.

The letter was read, as follows:

OLNEY, ILL., April 19, 1896.

DEAR SIR: In answer to yours of recent date, allow me to thank you for your effort in my behalf. I am frank to admit that I did not expect favorable results so soon, but it seems that your plan was successful. I would much rather have seen a general bill passed that would reach all one-legged soldiers than a private bill. I have received quite a number of letters thanking me for stirring this Congress up on the subject of giving officers' wives big pensions. I notice that the committee in making up their report make no account of my three months' service in Company I of the Eighth Illinois Infantry. It is a great wonder some one did not criticize my letter on account of this seeming discrepancy of statement, but I suppose it is on account of the kindly feeling that the Congressmen have for the old soldier. I notice also that some gentleman spoke something about a lunatic asylum. I have noticed recently that Eastern men talk quite often about "lunatics" in speaking of people out here in the West who differ with them on the financial question.

Now, I have one thing to say emphatically to these gentlemen. If they think they can put a Cleveland gold collar on the Republicans of Illinois they are making a mistake—

[Laughter.]

Neither can they build up a pensioned aristocracy of generals' widows. We are perfectly willing that a general's widow shall have all she can get when it goes as charity, but when it comes to a question of pensions, that is different. Pensions are just as much a legal obligation against this Government as the payment of bonds and interest on the debt that was contracted to put down the late rebellion. The Government paid us our poor stipend of $13 per month in depreciated currency, but the bondholders must have gold. We are going to pay them their bonds in coin as the contract says, if we can get you fellows to throw away your free-trade foolishness—

[Applause on the Republican side.]

quit following after Cleveland and Carlisle and help us elect CAMERON and VEST on a protective tariff and free-silver platform—

[Laughter.]

Any tariff that will furnish funds enough will have to be protective, so you had just as well give up old Grover's free-trade and gold-standard ideas and help us get clear of Eastern domination. Thanking you again for your kindness, I am

Truly, yours,

JOHN S. COCHENOUR.

HON. JASPER W. TALBERT, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TALBERT. I have no comment to make upon that letter. It speaks for itself. I will merely remark that the writer is one of Mr. GIBSON'S "lunatics." [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the bill of fare that you have before you on this Private Calendar. I have hurriedly gone over it, and I wish to call attention to at least 19 or 20 bills to pension generals and their widows at amounts ranging from $50 up to $100 a month. None of the 19 cases that I have examined is below $50 per month.

We begin with the one that has just been read, a bill to increase the pension of Mrs. Annis H. Enochs. I notice that the majority of these officers whose widows are seeking pensions were only brevet generals, showing that they never really served as generals. Most of them were only majors and colonels, and would only be entitled to the rank of general if opportunity should be offered. The first of these bills, as I have said, is a bill to increase the pension of Mrs. Annis H. Enochs to $50 a month. The second is a bill to pension Harriet C. Gregg, widow of a major-general. The third is to give an increased pension to Gen. James C. Parrott. The fourth is a bill granting a pension to Elizabeth Watts Kearny, daughter of the late Philip Kearny, major-general, United States Army.

Now, it seems to me that that is an entirely new departure, giving a pension to the daughter of an officer, however distinguished. That is a new element in the bill of fare to which you are invited on this Private Calendar. The fifth is an act granting a pension to Matilda Gresham, widow, I believe, of the late Walter Q. Gresham, at the rate of $100 per month. The sixth is a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Gould Carr, widow of the late Bvt. Brig. Gen. Joseph B. Carr. He was not a general; he never acted in that capacity; he was a general only by brevet. The next is a bill granting a pension to Ellen Ewing, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Thomas Ewing, at the rate of $75 a month. The next is a bill granting a pension to Carrie L. Greig, widow of a brevet major of volunteers. The next is a bill granting a pension to Minnie Parker, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Ely S. Parker, late of the United States Army, at the rate of $75 a month, I think.

Tenth. A bill granting a pension to the widow of Gen. John Newton.

Eleventh. An act granting an increase of pension to Celeste A. Boughton, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Horace Boughton.

Twelfth. An act granting a pension to Joseph R. West, brigadier and brevet major-general, United States Army Volunteers.

Most of these bills propose to grant pensions of $75 to $100 a month.

Thirteenth. A bill to grant a pension to Charlotte O. Van Cleve, widow of Gen. Horatio P. Van Cleve.

Fourteenth. An act granting an increase of pension to Marion McKibben.

Fifteenth. A bill to increase the pension of Maj. Gen. Julius H. Stahel.

Sixteenth. An act granting a pension to Mrs. Julia Jones Duncan, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Samuel A. Duncan.

This is another brevet general.

Seventeenth. A bill granting a pension to Eliza Craig Heckman, widow of Brig. Gen. Charles A. Heckman.

Eighteenth. A bill to pension Mary Elizabeth Hieskell, widow of the late Pay Director H. M. Hieskell, on the pension rolls.

Nineteenth. An act entitled "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Clifford Neff Fyffe."

I could go on with this recital; there are numbers of other bills of the same kind, but those I have named are the most prominent. My object to-night in calling attention to this matter is to see whether we can not agree upon some common grade upon which to place the pensions of these distinguished officers and their widows so as to do away with this everlasting harangue here on Friday nights about the discrimination between the wives of common soldiers and the wives of officers. I offer this amendment in good faith. I hope it will be adopted, and may be a precedent, so that when we come to these other bills we may in every case fix the pension at $40 a month, and do away with the wrangling over this matter.

I am sorry I do not see on the front benches here to-night some of the new converts to the doctrine of reducing the pensions of officers and their widows. As a general thing, when a man is converted he comes forward and sits upon the front bench. I see that some of these gentlemen have to-night taken back seats. I hope they have not backslidden, but will come to my assistance to-night and will help me to establish a common grade for these pensions by the adoption of this amendment. I trust the amendment will be adopted unanimously, and that in doing so we may establish a precedent which shall govern us hereafter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I trust that before I proceed we may have order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is not very often I have to ask for order. There are reasons why this Committee of the Whole endeavors at times not to hear what is going on; and I sympathize with the committee in that respect.

General Enochs was brevetted; that is true; but the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] I think has not quite gotten at the facts in regard to the service of this officer when he says that the fact of his having been a brevet brigadier-general shows that he never served as a brigadier-general. Now, it is within my knowledge that General Enochs commanded troops beyond his grade during nearly the whole of the latter half of the war.

Mr. TALBERT. What I said was that the word "brevet" seemed to signify that, while these officers may have deserved to serve in a higher rank when opportunity should offer, they possibly never had done so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. "Possibly never had done so!" I presume that 99 out of 100 who were brevetted as brigadier-generals served beyond their actual rank. They were given their brevet for that very purpose. But I do not want to speak further upon that subject. I have some modesty in regard to that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. I suppose the gentleman was brevetted himself.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I had two brevets before I was colonel, and I commanded a brigade for a long time while my actual rank was that of lieutenant-colonel.

Now, General Enochs was a distinguished, a specially distinguished soldier. He suffered for years from a wound or injury that he received during the war. For thirty-odd years while he was struggling to make a living he carried with him the seeds of death, received in the Army. He told me many a time that from this cause his death would some time come suddenly—instantaneously. And so the fact turned out. He went to bed one night in apparently good health and in the morning was found dead, having died doubtless by reason of the very injury which he had received in the line of duty while in actual service in the Army. Since his death his wife has been struggling to make a living. She has taken up the study of the law, and has been admitted to practice—

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman will allow me to say that my remarks were not intended to have any personal application to this officer. I do not wish to be understood as having intended any attack on General Enochs. My remarks were made generally in regard to this class of officers.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope that this amendment will be defeated, and that this House will not be afraid to testify its appreciation of a man who was a splendid soldier and a good citizen, and of the worthy family that he has left behind him.

Sir, I have no sympathy for these hypocritical croakings. I do not believe they are in good faith. And when I examine the votes that are being taken here in this House of Representatives I have no fear that that sort of talk will make any impression on the intelligent soldiers of the country. The people of this country are willing that the widow of this distinguished officer should be pensioned a little above the rate that is allowed to the grade of a private soldier. There is nothing in it but the same stock in trade of the arrant demagogue. That and nothing more. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TALBERT) there were—ayes 14, noes 75.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is raised that no quorum has voted. The Chair will count the committee.

One hundred and eleven members are present in their seats. A quorum is present, and the amendment is rejected.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

BYRON COTTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1022) to increase the pension of Byron Cotton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is directed and empowered to place upon the pension roll the name of Byron Cotton, late of Company A, Twenty-fourth Iowa Infantry Volunteers, at the rate of $72 a month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. BAKER of Kansas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1022) to increase the pension of Byron Cotton, late of Company A, Twenty-fourth Iowa Infantry Volunteers, to $72 per month, having carefully considered all the facts and circumstances in evidence, recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words "seventy-two," in the sixth line, and inserting the word "thirty" in lieu thereof, and as amended recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was favorably reported by the committee in the Fifty-third Congress, but the bill died on the Calendar.

Your committee adopt the report made by Mr. LACEY on February 19, 1895, as follows:

"Byron Cotton, of Company A, Twenty-fourth Iowa Infantry, enlisted on the 8th day of August, 1862, and served until the 27th day of May, 1865. He applied for a pension under the general laws and was placed upon the rolls at $4, which was afterwards increased to $12, for gunshot wound of left leg and injury to face and right eye, and resulting disease of eyes and impaired hearing of both ears.

"He is now drawing a pension of $12 a month under the general law for those disabilities.

"The soldier is totally blind, and has been for several years.

"The evidence on file in the claims (certificate No. 82771) in the Pension Bureau shows that the soldier's eyes were injured in the service, and the evidence also tends strongly to show that his present blindness is the result of his army service. The evidence upon this question is not sufficient to satisfy the Pension Bureau that the blindness is the result of his army service. Mr. Hayes, of Iowa, appeared before the committee, explaining the helpless condition of the soldier and the esteem in which he was held while living in Clinton, and Mr. Long, of Iowa, making like statements as to the said soldier while living at Ottumwa.

"The evidence as to the origin of the blindness is very voluminous, and we therefore do not set it out fully herein, but the evidence is quite strong, tending to show that the blindness was due to his army service and was a result of his pensionable disease of the eyes. The Pension Bureau, on grounds satisfactory to the medical officers, do not accept the blindness as the result of army service, but there is no evidence tending to show that the blindness is due to any vice or fault of the soldier.

"The soldier is poor and is supported by his wife, who keeps a boarding house. He is totally and permanently blind, and if the evidence of army origin of his blindness had been accepted he would be entitled to $72 a month under the general laws. But inasmuch as he has not made his title clear to the full rate of pension due to total blindness, and in view of the fact that the evidence does strongly show that his blindness is due to army service, we think that it would be a proper case for Congress to grant some assistance to this blind and helpless veteran."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, now I want to say a word or two just here on this question.

As far as the insinuation of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in regard to hypocrites with reference to pension cases is concerned, I do not care anything. He may have alluded to me and he may not have done so. I have too much respect for the distinguished-looking gentleman from Ohio to retort anything unkind against him. I admire him too much for that, and I admire him especially in view of the fact that the children have a great deal of respect for him because he looks so much like old Santa Claus, and so I will let it go along.

But if you want a sample of hypocrisy, if you want a sample of inconsistency, if you want a sample of discrimination against the good soldier, the old soldier, you need not go any further than the consideration of the present bill. You will find it right here. Here is a soldier against whom nothing can be brought, true and brave and loyal. He received a disability in the Army from which he is still suffering, and from the result of which he lost his eyesight. He is totally blind and helpless, and with a helpless wife on his hands to support, and yet gentlemen stand up here to advocate $50 a month for the widow of a general officer, and have not a word to say when this poor soldier's claim is reduced from $72 dollars a month that the law would give him and is cut down to $30 a month.

I call the attention of the House to this unadulterated specimen of hypocrisy on the part of gentlemen who prate of their love for the old soldiers on every Friday night here, the old soldiers who stood by the flag. This same spirit of hypocrisy which has been manifested on so many occasions heretofore will go right straight along; and this bill, like others, will be reduced to the minimum amount, while the widows of the general officers and the officers of high grade in the Army will receive the bounty of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, why are there none to raise their voices here to carry this old soldier up to $72 or even $50 a month, where he properly belongs? Why are they willing to leave it at the sum of $30, and make this discrimination in favor of men who happened to hold a little higher rank? I leave the matter to the distinguished line of hypocrites on the other side.

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by striking out "thirty," and inserting "fifty."

Mr. TALBERT. Thank God for one sinner saved. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, one moment, if you please. If this applicant is entitled to anything, he is entitled to $72 a month. Thirty dollars is a wobble and a straddle. Fifty dollars is the same; and $72 is what he is entitled to, if anything is due to him.

Mr. MILNES. Does the gentleman desire to move an amendment to the amendment by inserting "seventy-two"?

Mr. ERDMAN. I have not examined the bill. I only wished to say that if he was entitled to anything he was entitled to $72, and that the proposition here is a mere straddle.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I had the honor to report the bill in question, and we endeavored to get at all the facts, as far as it was possible to reach them.

That this man's eyes were affected while he was in the Army I think there can be no question. That he has gradually grown worse until he has lost his sight entirely is undoubtedly true. Under the old law he would be entitled to $30 a month for total disability. There is no positive evidence, however, on file that I could get possession of to show that the disability was absolutely the direct result of army service. But there is a strong presumption that it was due to his army service. Had it been traced clearly to army service he would receive $72 a month; but it was not. To-day he is in a condition of total disability. There is no question about that, and there is no question about this other fact, that his total disability had its commencement in the army service.

I want the committee to distinctly understand that while I have not been voting for the pensions of $50 and $75 and $100 a month, I stand ready not only to vote, but by voice and influence to favor a pension for every man who faithfully served his country in the hour of its peril and is to-day totally disabled, to give him not less than $30 a month. In view of that sentiment in my own breast, and in view of the evidence before the committee, I have no hesitation in recommending $30 a month in this case.

Mr. PICKLER. If my colleague will allow me, this man is only entitled to $12 a month under the general law, and this raises it from $12 to $30.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions if he does not think that this soldier is as much entitled to $50 a month as the widow of a general, whose pension has just been allowed?

Mr. PICKLER. Well, the gentleman remembers that the President of the United States vetoed a bill the other day because he said the soldier did not acquire his disability in the service.

Now, General Enochs, whose widow we pensioned, was wounded, as has already been said, in the service and died from that wound. In this case there is nothing to show that this disease was contracted in the service. Now, we have increased the pension of this soldier from $12 per month, the amount to which he is entitled under the general law, to two and one-half times that amount. We have put it at $30, and that is more advance than ever was given to a general's widow since I have been here in Congress. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. I beg your pardon—

Mr. KEM. The answer of the gentleman from South Dakota is no answer at all. It is plain that if this man is entitled to any pension at all under the law he is entitled to $72 a month.

Mr. PICKLER. No; that is not true, and whoever says that is ignorant of the law.

Mr. KEM. If he is not entitled to a pension at all he ought not to have a pension. The plea of the gentleman that his pension has been increased at a greater ratio than that of the widow of any officer falls to the ground upon that proposition. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ERDMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota say that if he is totally disabled from a wound received, or from disability incurred in the service, if he is now blind, that he is not entitled to $72 a month?

Mr. PICKLER. Not unless it was incurred in the service.

Mr. ERDMAN. Does the gentleman say it was not incurred in the service?

Mr. PICKLER. This report does not say that it was.

Mr. ERDMAN. Does not the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BAKER] who reported the bill, and who has just spoken on the bill, say that it was thus incurred?

Mr. PICKLER. He says that that is his impression. It is not clearly proven. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN] knows just as much about this case as any man here does.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SOPHRONIA S. STOWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5996) for the relief of Sophronia S. Stowell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Sophronia S. Stowell on the pension roll as the surviving widow of Maj. David P. Stowell, late of First Maine Cavalry.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5996) for the relief of Sophronia S. Stowell, submit the following report:

David P. Stowell was mustered in as major of First Maine Cavalry October 31, 1861. He was granted leave of absence October 12, 1862, for thirty days on surgeon's certificate of disability, on account of inflammation of liver and kidneys. On November 25, 1862, his leave was extended for thirty days on another medical certificate, which showed that he was still suffering from inflammation of liver and kidneys. He was discharged to date December 4, 1862, before his leave expired, but the records, which are incomplete, furnish no further evidence of disability. He filed a claim on June 30, 1880, for disease of kidneys and injury of head which caused deafness in right ear. He was pensioned at $6.25 per month for disease of kidneys from date of discharge until September 15, 1881, when it was made to end on the ground that the disability therefrom had ceased.

Major Stowell died July 23, 1884, and his widow, the beneficiary of this bill, filed a claim February 23, 1885, which has been rejected by the Pension Office and the rejection affirmed on appeal by the Secretary of the Interior on the ground that soldier's death resulted from chronic gastritis, not due to cause which has been legally accepted. Origin and continuance of disease of kidneys have been legally admitted. As has been stated, the records show that the soldier had disease of kidneys in the service and also disease of the liver, which is closely connected with the stomach. The testimony of Capt. Isaac G. Virgin shows that soldier had disease of stomach in service, as well as disease of liver and kidneys. There is other evidence of disease of stomach in service. Dr. Charles A. Coolidge, in an affidavit filed March 7, 1887, testified as follows:

"Soon after discharge, within a month, I think, I was called to treat Major Stowell and found him suffering from stomach trouble, with much inflammation of stomach, indigestion, etc., and continued to treat him year by year, and in his last sickness. His stomach trouble did not yield to treatment, but gradually grew worse and was the main cause of his death. In my opinion the kidney trouble aggravated the trouble with the stomach and contributed more or less to his death. His death, in my judgment, was caused by gastritis. I have no doubt but that the exposure in the Army, together with the climate and water, was the first and real cause of the difficulties that finally caused his death."

Dr. Coolidge testified in an affidavit filed March 13, 1884, that "his chronic kidney troubles have borne upon him with great severity for the past year, and he is now in a critical situation." Dr. A. L. Stanwood testifies that he knows soldier's death was caused by kidney disease, accompanied by gastritis. Dr. C. B. Bridgman testifies that soldier first came under his treatment in 1869, suffering with nephritis and dyspepsia, prescribed for him every year until his death; for two years prior to his death was his attending physician; that disease of stomach and kidneys increased, resulting in Bright's disease, which caused death.

The only really adverse testimony in the claim is that of Dr. Coolidge, who has tried to create the impression that soldier's death was due to intemperance, in which he succeeded to such an extent that the widow's claim was once rejected on that ground, but it was proved on special examination beyond the shadow of a doubt, by the testimony of the best people in the town where he lived, that the soldier was not an intemperate man.

Dr. Coolidge subsequently swore that he did not intend to create such an impression. He is shown by the report of a special examiner to be so biased against the claim that he can not and will not lay aside his bias and testify fairly. However the doctors may disagree on other points, they agree that soldier's death was due to causes arising in the service.

Abundant unimpeached and unimpeachable testimony shows that soldier contracted disease of stomach, liver, and kidneys in line of duty in the service; that he suffered continuously with disease of stomach and kidneys until his death occurred as a result of one or the other or of both combined.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by adding, after the word "Cavalry," the words "and pay her a pension of $25 per month," and that the bill as so amended do pass.

The amendment recommended by the committee, set forth in the report, was agreed to.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think this bill ought to be considered more carefully than we are considering it. Here is a soldier who was pensioned at the magnificent sum of $6.25 a month by a Republican administration. In 1881, under a Republican Administration, even that was cut off. It was not only reduced but cut off, and I am surprised that in this report there is no reflection against the Administration of that day on account of that fact. The sum of $6.25 per month is what the soldier got. The gentleman making this report says that the soldier suffered continuously with a disease of the stomach and kidneys until his death, from disease contracted in the line of duty in the service; but the Republican Administrators of the Pension Bureau in 1881 said no, that the disabilities disappeared, and, having refused to pension this man for more than $6.25 per month, they then took that away entirely. Now these gentlemen come in and pension the widow at $25 per month on that sort of testimony. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JULIA H. H. CROSBY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 446) to place the name of Julia H. H. Crosby, widow of Freeman E. Crosby, late lieutenant, United States Navy, on the pension roll at the rate of $50 per month, and her two children each at the rate of $5 per month.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia H. H. Crosby, widow of Freeman E. Crosby, deceased, late a lieutenant in the United States Navy, commanding the U. S. S. McArthur, at the rate of $50 per month, and $5 per month for each of her two children, in lieu of the pension which she is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill to increase the pension of Julia H. H. Crosby"; strike out the initial "E." occurring in the deceased officer's name, and substitute therefor the initial "H."; strike out the word "fifty," in line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty-five"; strike out all after the word "month," in line 9, to and including the word "children," in line 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments recommended by the committee.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. STRODE of Nebraska) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 446) increasing the pension of Julia H. H. Crosby, widow of Freeman E. Crosby, late lieutenant, United States Navy, have considered the same, and report:

Mrs. Crosby is the widow of Freeman H. Crosby, late lieutenant United States Navy, who was drowned in the active service in the line of his duty off the west coast of Washington on August 18, 1894.

While attached to the U. S. S. McArthur Lieutenant Crosby, in charge of the whaleboat, attempted to land through the surf about 17 miles north of Grays Harbor, State of Washington, to build a hydrographic signal, and while in the surf the boat was capsized and he was drowned.

Lieutenant Crosby was appointed midshipman in the Navy July 27, 1866, and was promoted through the different grades to the rank of lieutenant, which he attained on August 30, 1881. He performed arduous and distinguished services, and was one of officers who volunteered to go to the Arctic regions with Capt. W. S. Schley, in 1884, aboard the U. S. S. Bear. Commander Schley commends in the highest terms the conduct of the deceased officer on that voyage, and states that the loss to his country and to the naval service was very great when Lieutenant Crosby met so terrible a fate in the breakers of the Pacific.

The claimant is now in receipt of a pension of $25 per month, granted under the general laws, with $2 additional per month each for her two little children, one of whom is but 6 years old and the other 8.

Lieutenant Crosby at his death left nothing for the support of his widow and children aside from about $4,000 life insurance, and the whole of this amount she has recently lost through the failure of a banking firm of Binghamton, N. Y.

Many prominent business men of Binghamton certify to this fact, and give it as their opinion that little or nothing will ever be saved from the wreck.

The papers before your committee show the claimant to be a most estimable and deserving woman, and that she has absolutely nothing now aside from her pension with which to maintain herself and support and educate her children.

There are several precedents for the allowance of an increased pension in cases of this character, and in the light of the facts presented above your committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill to increase the pension of Julia H. H. Crosby"; strike out the initial "E." occurring in the deceased officer's name and substitute therefor the initial "H."; strike out the word "fifty," in line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty-five"; strike out all after the word "month," in line 9, to and including the word "children," in line 10.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ARMSTEAD M. RAWLINGS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1062) to grant a pension to Armstead M. Rawlings, of Arkansas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $8 per month, the name of Armstead M. Rawlings, who served as a private from September 30, 1896, to March 30, 1897, in Captain Bateman's company of Mounted Arkansas Volunteers, in the Sabine war.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let the report be read.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the report will be read. I would like to understand about that Sabine war.

The report (by Mr. STALLINGS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1062) granting a pension to Armstead M. Rawlings, have considered the same, and report:

The claimant was a private in Captain Bateman's company of Mounted Arkansas Volunteers (subsequently Company B, First Battalion, Second Regiment Arkansas Mounted Gunmen), Sabine Indian war, and served therein from September 30, 1896, until March 30, 1897, when honorably mustered out.

The service is of record at the War Department, and it is also shown in the soldier's bounty-land papers on file at the Pension Office.

Mr. Rawlings is now over 76 years old and in dependent circumstances. His identity with the soldier who rendered the service is shown by the testimony of C. M. Ball and Warren G. Ball, old residents of Independence County, Ark., where claimant resides, and his financial condition is certified to by the gentleman who introduced the bill in the House, he having known the applicant for many years.

The Sabine Indian disturbances were inadvertently omitted from the list of Indian wars named in the Indian war pension act of July 27, 1892, and hence those who participated in the Sabine war are obliged to depend for relief upon special acts of Congress.

This case seems to fully justify favorable action, and the passage of the bill is respectfully recommended.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, is this bill within the jurisdiction of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It is reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MISS JULIETTE BETTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4395) for the relief of Miss Juliette Betts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll of the United States, subject to the provisions of the pension laws, the name of Juliette Betts, the daughter of Hezekiah Betts, a Revolutionary soldier, said woman being now 91 years old and dependent.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to have the report read. I have not a copy of the report on my desk.

The report (by Mr. HALTERMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4395) granting a pension to Juliette Betts, have considered the same and report: The claimant is the daughter of Hezekiah Betts, a Revolutionary soldier, whose service is shown in the following statement from the Pension Bureau:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1896.

"SIR: In response to your request of the 29th ultimo, herewith returned, for a report of the service of Hezekiah Betts, Capt. Stephen Betts's company, Connecticut Volunteers, war of the Revolution, I have to report that the papers in the claim of his widow, Grace Betts, No. 17277, show that he enlisted July 11, 1779, and served three years, and that he served under Colonels Butler and Webb.

"Very respectfully,

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

"Hon. H. C. LOUDENSLAGER, Chairman Committee on Pensions, House of Representatives."

From the sworn statement of Miss Betts it appears that she is 91 years old, unmarried, and the only surviving child of the soldier, who died in 1837, leaving a wife, who died in 1840. It further appears from her statement that both the soldier and his widow were pensioners and that she is in feeble health and entirely dependent upon the charity of friends for support.

A communication signed by all of the officers of the Norwalk (Conn.) Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution fully corroborates the claimant's statements as to her relationship to the soldier, her age, and her dependence, and her allegations are also corroborated by the certificate of the pastor and deacons of the First Congregational Church of Norwalk.

There are several precedents for the proposed legislation, and in view of the long service of the soldier and the great age and destitution of the claimant the passage of the bill is recommended, amended, however, by striking out the words "subject to the provisions of the pension laws," in line 5, and substituting therefor the words "at the rate of $12 per month."

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "subject to the provisions of the pension laws," in line 5, and substitute therefor the words "at the rate of $12 per month."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MARY CRAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4598) granting a pension to Mary Cray.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Cray, the wife of Michael Cray, late private in Company G, One hundred and fifth New York Volunteer Infantry, and Company G, Ninety-fourth New York Volunteer Infantry, and that he pay her a pension of $12 per month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4598) granting a pension to Mary Cray, submit the following report:

Mary Cray is the widow of Michael Cray, private of Company G, One hundred and fifth New York, and Company G, Ninety-fourth New York Infantry, who enlisted November 9, 1861, and was discharged July 18, 1865, and who died December 6, 1874, of cancer of the neck. The evidence shows that the soldier received a gunshot wound in the neck at the battle of Antietam, Md., on the 17th of September, 1862. The ball entered the right shoulder near the top and passed through, making its exit through the shoulder blade.

Dr. James M. Casy, assistant surgeon One hundred and fifth New York Infantry, testifies that he dressed the wound at the time of the battle, and describes the wound as above. Comrades of Cray who were with him when he received the wound corroborate the condition of the wound, and both testify to Cray's complaining of pain in the shoulder from the wound until the time of his death. Dr. Charles Buckley, a well-known physician, of Rochester, N. Y., testifies that he was well acquainted with the soldier, and in 1873 prescribed for him for a swelling on the right side of neck below the ear, and behind the carotid artery. After a careful examination by Dr. Buckley and two other surgeons, it was decided to attempt to remove it. After proceeding with the operation it was found to be a growth of a malignant character, situated on the vertebral column and impossible to remove.

The disease was fatal in its character, and produced death in 1874. Dr. Buckley further testifies that it may be considered probable that the cancer was caused from the effects of the gunshot wound received in service. Three citizens of Rochester, N. Y., testify that they were neighbors of Cray, and knew him intimately from the time of his return from the Army, in 1865, up to the time of his death, in 1874, and that they often heard him complain of the wound in his neck that he suffered from until his death. Cray never applied for a pension. His widow applied for a pension under the general law in 1879, and was rejected June 30, 1882, on the ground that gunshot wound of shoulder was not the cause of cancer of the neck, from which soldier died. The claim was appealed in 1895, but rejection was affirmed January 4, 1896.

The medical referee of the Pension Bureau refuses to accept cancer as result of the wound. The claimant received a pension under act of June, 1890, on October 31, 1891, at $8 per month. The question involved is whether the opinion of Dr. Richards, who treated soldier from discharge to his death, and that of Dr. Buckley and the other physicians who examined and attempted an operation on soldier in 1873 for the malignant growth, and the testimony of neighbors as to cause of death as the result of wound received in battle should be set aside by the medical referee, who never saw the soldier, but who formed his opinion only on a theory, while the doctors who examined him formed their opinions on a condition which they found upon examination.

The committee are of the opinion that the evidence is very conclusive and satisfactory on this point, and therefore recommend the passage of this bill with an amendment, striking out all after the word "month," in last line, and adding "in lieu of all other pension."

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "month," in last line, and add "in lieu of all other pension."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to this remarkable change or perversion in the human anatomy in order that it might appear that this soldier died from the effects of a wound received in battle. The evidence shows that the ball entered the right shoulder and passed through the shoulder blade. The gentleman drawing the report says the soldier received a gunshot wound in the neck. Now, it was, of course, within 3 or 4, or perhaps 4 or 5, inches of the neck; but that the wound was in the neck nowhere appears. And then that cancer followed from the wound in the shoulder. This aggregation of statesmen is to set itself up as a medical congress and declare and determine that cancer behind the ear follows from a wound down in the arm or shoulder.

Mr. PICKLER. Where do you want him to have the cancer located in order to get a pension?

Mr. ERDMAN. If the gentleman desires to address me, I wish he would rise in his place and address me in a tone of voice that I can hear.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Where would you have it located for the convenience of your argument? [Laughter.]

Mr. ERDMAN. Well, the convenience of gentlemen is not considered in locating wounds. I am not disposed to treat this matter as lightly as some gentlemen are. I do not want to stand here and have it said that I, without objection, consent to have it said of a body of which I am a member that we declared and determined such a foolish thing as that. If you want to determine it and assume the responsibility for blazing to the world in all these cases the ridiculous things upon which you pass bills granting pensions, say it out so that the world may see it, and then I am content. Put it in the report, spread it on the record, and I will say nothing more about it. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

DAVID MOSTEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1936) to remove the charge of desertion standing against David Mosten.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of David Mosten, who enlisted under the name of David Mosten as a private in Company A, Nineteenth Regiment United States Infantry; was discharged, and reenlisted in the same company and regiment; was absent without leave from said Company A, Nineteenth United States Infantry, after December 27, 1881, and while so absent again enlisted under the name of Frank Blaw, in Battery H, Third United States Artillery, on August 1, 1882, and served until March 20, 1885; was then arrested and tried for desertion from his original Company A, Nineteenth United States Infantry, and sentenced; before the expiration of his term of imprisonment was pardoned by the President of the United States, with permission granted to reenlist, and is now of Battery I, Second United States Artillery, having served eleven years of faithful service since his absence without leave under his original enlistment.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill to allow it to be passed over for the present and let us go on with the consideration of other measures. Here is a bill for the relief of a deserter, and I do not think we ought to take it up in view of the fact that there are cases of merit on the Calendar which ought to be considered ahead of such a bill as this. I ask the gentleman to let it be laid aside, in order that we may save time and proceed with the consideration of more meritorious bills.

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman's request, I beg to say to him that if he would let this bill come immediately before this committee for consideration he would save more time than by seeking to delay it. I shall press for the passage of the bill. The simple reading of the report shows that this is a meritorious case. It is not a pension case. It is a bill for the purpose of removing a disgraceful ban which rests upon a soldier who is now serving in the Army of the United States. As the report shows, this soldier has already been in service of the United States for nearly twenty-two years. Some twelve years ago he committed the fault for which he asks the pardon of the Congress of the United States. He is now in the service. He is a member of Battery I, and is stationed at Fortress Monroe. He is a man of excellent character. He has already reached the grade of corporal since he was permitted by the Secretary of War to reenlist.

After his punishment for desertion, or rather for changing from one company to another, he was allowed to enlist again in the Army of the United States, and it would be a disgrace to that Army to allow a soldier to remain in its ranks with this ban upon him. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will not receive a favorable report from this committee. I am astonished to hear gentlemen crying "Vote!" "Vote!" on a bill like this—

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from South Carolina is not entitled to the floor, having spoken once on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. TALBERT. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is that the gentleman has once addressed the House on this bill and therefore is not entitled to be heard a second time.

Mr. TALBERT. I have not addressed the House upon this bill. I have only made a few remarks. [Laughter.] And I submit to the Chairman that the point of order is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. TALBERT. Then do I understand the Chair to say that a gentleman has no right to address the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair simply holds that the rule provides that a member shall not speak more than once upon the same question if objection is made.

Mr. TALBERT. That is, if somebody else wants to speak. If anybody else wants to speak on this bill I will yield to him and wait until he gets through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is not in order.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the rule is different from what the Chairman holds. The rule, as I understand it, is that if no other member desires to speak, a gentleman may address the committee more than once on the same subject. However, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire—

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no time to yield.

Mr. TALBERT. I would be glad if the gentleman [Mr. PICKLER] would take a quart if a pint will not do him. I want to say to the gentleman that I will talk, and he can not prevent me. [Laughter.] You may try to apply the gag rule, but you can not stop my mouth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is not in order, and he will take his seat.

Mr. TALBERT. The Chair can rule to suit himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not violate the rules of the House in that way.

Mr. TALBERT. All right. I will come again. [Laughter.] The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NANCY GENTRY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5175) granting a pension to Nancy Gentry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy Gentry, widow of John A. Gentry, at the rate of $5 per month.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us hear the report, Mr. Chairman.

The report (by Mr. COLSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5175) granting a pension to Nancy Gentry, have considered the same, and report: Nancy Gentry is the widow of John A. Gentry, who served as a private in Captain Jetton's company of Tennessee Mounted Volunteers from May 19, 1836, to June 16, 1836, Cherokee Indian war. This service, which covered a period of twenty-nine days, is a matter of record at the War and Treasury Departments.

It is also alleged that he served from June 26, 1836, to December 28, 1836, in Captain Fletcher's company of cavalry, but no record of this service can be found.

In her application to the Pension Bureau under the Indian war service-pension act of July 27, 1892, the claimant has shown that she married the soldier in 1845 and remained his wife up to his disappearance from home in 1857; that he has not since been seen or heard from, and that she has never remarried.

The claim was rejected on the ground that the service of the soldier, so far as it is shown by the records, was one day short of the time required to give title under the law.

The claimant is about 71 years old, a great sufferer from rheumatism, and with no means of support except a small mountain farm worth not more than $200. She is now unable to do any work and is obliged to rely upon the assistance of others. These facts are shown by the sworn statements of L. C. Farmer and W. J. Kerley, residents of Bledsoe County, Tenn.

The passage of the bill is respectfully recommended.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, as a good deal has been said upon this floor about my position in regard to deserters, coffee coolers, camp followers, and bummers, I want to say that the word "coffee cooler," as I understand, is a word that was coined by one of the most distinguished Union generals in the Federal Army, General Bragg, of Wisconsin, who commanded what was known as the Iron Brigade, and who performed distinguished service throughout the war, and I want to have read, in my own time, an extract from a speech made by that distinguished Union general in the Forty-ninth Congress on the subject of pensions. It was made, I believe, when the pauper pension bill was under discussion after it had been vetoed by the President.

I ask that this portion of the speech of General Bragg be read, as it will throw some light upon this question of bummers and deserters, coffee coolers and camp followers. I hope gentlemen will listen to the reading of a part of the speech of as distinguished a man as belonged to the Federal Army. Especially do I ask for it the attention of the distinguished chairman of this committee, who is so anxious for "order." I ask him to listen to this.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; not now. There were 140 regiments and a number of battalions, in all, of colored troops raised during the war. A large portion of these troops were engaged in guarding railway stations in the rear; and a few regiments, three or four, were regiments of heavy artillery. This pension clause opens the door for a pension to every one of the soldiers of the seven regiments that were organized into battalions for the purpose of caring for them, men picked out as being physically unable to do soldier's duty. It opens the opportunity to place upon the roll, out of the whole 130 regiments, every single man and regiment that was not engaged in active service in the presence of the enemy. It permits a pension for every hundred-day man who came out to have a pleasant and jaunty excursion when he thought that if the "rebs" only heard that he was coming they would run away from Bull Run.

It places or gives an opportunity to place upon the pension roll the hundred-day men who closed the war with a blaze of glory in April, May, and June, 1865. It permits an opportunity to go upon the roll 202,000 men, 11,000 of whom afterwards were deserters—202,000 men that were organized under the call of the President in December, 1864. Only three months before the war was terminated in fact a call came, and under that call during the months of January and February there were organized, in response to it, troops consisting of 202,000. Some 13,000 of these were discharged, even at the original camp of rendezvous, because there was no occasion to demand the assignment of them to any regiment. Now, who were these men?

I say to gentlemen who talk about soldiers, who were these men? Do not stand here in your place and talk about the devotion of the country to its defenders, to the men who heard the shriek of the bullet and shot and shell and battle, and covered with blood and carnage carried the flag to victory. Who were the majority of those men that found themselves in the service of the United States from December, 1864, to February, 1865, that Congress should sit up nights to pass pensions to provide for them? They were the scum of the earth. They were men who would not enlist and were not drafted. They were men who stayed until those who did not want to go to the front raised money by vote and taxation upon the property in the municipalities and counties had funds placed in their hands to hire and buy things to go that could fill the quota and enable them to escape the draft. They were, I said, the scum; yes, and the dregs. They stood in their holes until they were bought—bought by substitute brokers, bought by men who were speculating in blood, paid from $100 to $800 apiece, feeling assured that they were physically so defective that all they had to do was to go to a hospital and there was no danger to their precious carcasses, so that they could pocket their $100 and go without fear of any injury befalling them.

There are gentlemen on the other side of the House who I trust are with me on this question, and who know just as well as I do that the prisons were emptied, that the poorhouses were emptied, that the slums were all emptied by the proffer of $200 at the door to bring out the inmates that they might be put as a paper credit on the army roll of the United States, and the men who brought this about pocketed the difference made in the trade. I have seen them coming down with ambulances in the rear by scores trying to get people of that class, called soldiers, to march from the shores of the Potomac to the banks of the Rappahannock, and the attempt to get them to the front was a failure.

There is another class. And I might say in that connection when you talk about poorhouses the men you find there as a rule are the men who came from the poorhouses to go to the Army, and when they came back they lapsed into their natural condition. No genuine soldier in any patriotic community that I have ever seen ever needed to go to the poorhouse to be provided with all that was necessary to care for him. We know, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in that way that the patriotic people of the North treat their soldiers. These men that go to the poorhouse go because they are native there; they are drones; they have lived from hand to mouth. They have got no enterprise; they have got no self-respect; they have got no character. They lie down and open their mouths for a teat to suck, and it does not make much matter what animal has the teat so long as they can suck anything from it.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey (before the reading was concluded). I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of this be dispensed with. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. I ask that the clerk read on. I have the floor, and this is being read in my time. I hope gentlemen will not get uneasy.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, that speaks for itself. I only want to put on record what that distinguished soldier thought of these "camp followers," "coffee coolers," and "bummers."

Mr. PICKLER. Let it be understood that it was a member on that side of the House who made that speech.

The question being put, the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

ELIZABETH T. BEALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3033) to increase the pension of Elizabeth T. Beall, widow of Benjamin L. Beall, late colonel First United States Cavalry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Elizabeth T. Beall, widow of Benjamin L. Beall, late colonel of the First United States Cavalry, who is now on the rolls, to $100 per month.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows: Strike out the words "one hundred" and insert "fifty"; so as to make the pension $50 a month.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. STRODE of Nebraska) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3033) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth T. Beall, have considered the same, and report as follows:

It is shown by a report of the adjutant-general, United States Army, that the deceased soldier, Benjamin L. Beall, entered the service of the United States June 8, 1836, as captain of the Second Dragoons; was subsequently promoted to be colonel, and retired from active service February 15, 1862, for incapacity resulting from long and faithful service. He died in the city of Baltimore August 16, 1863.

Mrs. Beall is now pensioned at $30 per month under the general law, and her petition for an increase of the same is as follows:

"BALTIMORE, February 27, 1894.

"To the Senate and United States House of Representatives.

"GENTLEMEN: I beg leave most respectfully to petition to you for an increase of my pension. I have arrived at that age (now in my ninety-third year) where I require such care and attention that my present pension of $30 per month is wholly inadequate to supply.

"I am the widow of the late Col. Benjamin L. Beall, of the First United States Cavalry, who, during a long life, rendered distinguished services to his country.

"Through the influence of Hon. Lewis Cass and Daniel Webster he was appointed captain in the Second Regiment of Dragoons, United States Army, by President Andrew Jackson, in 1836, and was ordered to Florida, where he rendered such valuable service that Gen. W. J. Worth recommended him for promotion for his successful contests with the Indians.

"In said recommendation General Worth says: 'Capt. B. L. Beall has met the enemy in this contest oftener, perhaps, than any other officer; is brave and generous. Would therefore recommend him for promotion.'

"Was promoted to the brevet rank of major for gallantry and successful services in the war against the Florida Indians March 15, 1837.

"Ordered to the Indian Territory after the Florida war to select a site for a fort. Established Fort Washita; and stationed there until the war with Mexico, where he served with distinction. After said war he was ordered to New Mexico; there served as civil and military governor. From there ordered to California and commanded Fort Tejon until the death of General Clark. Then commanded the Department of the Pacific from 1860 to 1861. For a time was conspicuously associated with the history of the Pacific Coast. From there was ordered East, placed on the retired list of the Army, and died at the city of Baltimore in the month of August, 1863.

"Hoping this will meet with your earliest consideration and approbation.

"I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

"ELIZABETH T. BEALL."

The claimant's allegations as to her age and dependence are borne out by the testimony of Dr. Y. S. Marriott, Dr. H. M. Wilson, and other reputable residents of the city of Baltimore; and it is further shown that by reason of failing eyesight and other ailments incident to her great age she has for a long time past needed the services of an attendant.

It appears further that she has had dependent upon her an invalid granddaughter, and this, together with the requirements of her own condition, have long since exhausted all her means except the pension referred to above. She was married to the soldier in 1824.

There are several precedents for the allowance of $50 per month to the widows of soldiers who attained the rank held by the claimant's husband, and in view of her extreme age and the necessities of her condition your committee believe that she should be allowed such a sum as will provide her necessary attendance and care during the remaining days of her life, which must of necessity be very few.

The bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it be amended by striking out the words "one hundred," in line 6, and substituting therefor the word "fifty"; so as to allow a pension of $50 per month, and that as so amended the bill do pass.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, when the bill before that last disposed of was under discussion I made a few remarks upon it, and after I sat down another gentleman made some remarks upon the same bill. When he took his seat I got up to make other remarks. The gentleman from South Dakota made the point that I had spoken once, and had no right to speak again. I desired to speak, provided no one else wished to speak. And I submit, sir, that the rule would have permitted me to speak, as no one else wanted the floor. But I was denied the privilege of expressing my views, and I think, sir, that I have been wrongly treated by the Chair. I believe the Chair has misconstrued the rule. Upon the top of that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN] took the floor and yielded to me, but notwithstanding all this I was denied the privilege of expressing myself before the Committee of the Whole. I think, sir, that I have been unjustly treated by the Chair. I call attention to the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to occupy any of the time of the Committee of the Whole; but the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], in asking for the reading of a speech made by General Bragg in the Forty-ninth Congress, has recalled to my mind a scene which will never be effaced from it. The question then before the House was whether a pension bill which had been vetoed by a gentleman who was then and is now the President of the United States should pass notwithstanding his objections. It was about the close of that Congress, when several eminent gentlemen were about to retire. Among them was General Bragg, of Wisconsin, who had stood here during all that Congress as the special sponsor for the soldier.

When that veto came in there was a change of front; and the speech which has just been read to the committee at the instance of the gentleman from South Carolina was made by General Bragg. There followed him, upon this side of the Chamber, a gentleman who is this evening the chairman of this Committee of the Whole. It will take but a moment to read, as part of the history of that occasion, the remarks then made by the gentleman from Iowa, which the Clerk now has before him. I ask that they be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEPBURN. Of all the gentlemen that have spoken in opposition to the passage of this bill every one save one voted for it. There is some reason for change of front, Mr. Speaker. A number of those gentlemen like myself terminate their official life on the 4th of next March. And a large number of them, unlike myself, are now mendicants about the White House—

"Crooking the pregnant hinges of the knee

"That thrift may follow fawning." [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I deny the right of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] or the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] to speak for the Grand Army of the Republic of this country. I tell you, sir, that while those gentlemen did occupy honored places in the great army, and were everywhere esteemed, yet they are looked upon by the Grand Army to-day, when they rise in their places here to denounce their old comrades as vagabonds and scamps and perjurers and the scum of humanity, as Benedict Arnold was after his treason by his old comrades in arms. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there was a time when Benedict Arnold rode along the lines with flashing eye and gleaming saber, and when he met with the acclaims of a brave soldiery, who welcomed him with long huzzas as a leader without blemish or reproach.

Yet there was another period in his life when he held an interview with an American on English soil, he not daring to come on American soil. He asked that old comrade what he thought those who had worn the uniforms of the Continentals in the days of the Revolution thought of him—what would they do with him should they meet him? The reply was: "They would cut off your leg that was wounded at Saratoga and bury it with the honors of war, and the rest of your carcass they would hang upon a gibbet."

[Applause.]

It would be with such an answer as this that the old soldiers, the membership of the Grand Army of the Republic, would repudiate the claim of the gentleman to speak for them in support of the President's cruel veto.

Mr. Speaker, your table is now weighed down with petitions from the old soldiers calling for the passage of this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire only to add that very shortly after that speech was made the name of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, General Bragg, was sent to the Senate by the President for confirmation as minister to Mexico. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] And the name of another distinguished soldier, whom I will not mention here to-night, who also changed front in view of the Presidential veto, was speedily sent to the Senate for confirmation to an office at a salary of $7,500 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Chairman, I see that the bill now under consideration has been reported by the committee with an amendment reducing the proposed pension from $100 a month to $50 a month. I am glad to see that. It seems that the opposition which has been made in this House to this unjust discrimination in favor of officers and the widows of officers as against private soldiers and their widows is having some effect. And in hope that there may be additional good along this line, and that gentlemen on the other side of the House may be brought to see more fully the error of their way, I desire to send to the desk and ask to have read in my time a letter—

Mr. HARDY. You say "gentlemen on the other side." What side?

Mr. KEM. That side [referring to the Republican side].

I ask to have read a letter which I have just received from the adjutant of U. S. Grant Post, No. 12, Department of the Potomac, Grand Army of the Republic, Washington, D. C.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 29, 1896.

SIR: I have the pleasure of inclosing herewith copy of resolution unanimously adopted by this post, heartily indorsing the sentiment expressed and action taken by you upon the nonpensioning of officers or their widows at a rate greater than that of the private soldier, whose valor or patriotism was equal, if not greater, than those who wore the shoulder straps.

Very respectfully,

HORACE H. BROWER, Adjutant.

HON. OMER M. KEM,
House of Representatives.

Mr. KEM. In addition to that, I ask to have read the resolutions passed by that post in connection with this matter.

The resolutions were read by the Clerk, as follows:

At a regular meeting of U. S. Grant Post, No. 12, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of the Potomac, held on the 14th day of April, 1896, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the members of this post have with sorrow observed that the present Congress has, with a lavish hand, increased the pensions of the widows of certain officers of high rank far beyond the rates allowed by the general law; and

"Whereas, this Congress has not, down to this time, enacted any general law to benefit the widow of the officer or enlisted man, who receives but $8 per month, or to remedy the ruling of the Pension Bureau which denies to thousands of them even this small pittance if they have an income of $8 or more per month; and

"Whereas, the granting of large increases of pension by special acts to the widows of officers of high rank, while the widows of men of humbler rank, who were none the less brave, and whose lives were none the less precious, are ignored, is a great injustice, against which every patriot should protest; and

"Whereas recently certain honorable members of the House of Representatives have earnestly protested against this unjust discrimination and declared their determined opposition to such legislation: Therefore

"Be it resolved, That the members of this post hereby express their gratitude to the Hon. HENRY M. BAKER, the Hon. JAMES A. HEMENWAY, the Hon. OMER M. KEM, and the Hon. JOHN E. MCCALL for the words spoken and the attitude assumed by them on that occasion, and for which the veterans of U. S. Grant Post, No. 12, will ever hold them in tender remembrance; and "Be it further resolved, That these resolutions be made a part of the records of this post, and that a copy thereof be forwarded to each of the said members of the House of Representatives."

A true copy.

CHAS. S. HERRON,
Commander U. S. Grant Post, No. 12.

Attest:

HORACE H. BROWER, Adjutant.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "fifty" and making it "forty."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to amend the amendment by adding to that communication which has just been read the name of the gentleman from South Carolina, as he seems to have been omitted by the writers of it for some reason. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. I hope they will not put me in, but simply put in the name of Santa Claus. That will do as well.

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to ask who signs that letter which has just been read?

Mr. KEM. It is from the U. S. Grant Post, No. 12, of the Department of the Potomac.

Mr. PICKLER. It seems to me that the Grand Army posts of Washington are not likely to know more of our constituents and their needs than we ourselves do; and that they are hardly in a position to be able to instruct the representatives of the people as to their duty.

Mr. KEM. I presume that the Grand Army post in Washington is as capable of judging whether the action of Congress is just or unjust as anybody else in the country.

Mr. PICKLER. And I think they show very bad taste in making such comments.

Mr. KEM. They are men who as fully understand this question as anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TALBERT) there were—ayes 5, noes 78.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum.

Mr. PICKLER. Who makes the point of no quorum against this old widow of the Mexican war, 93 or 94 years old?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to state to the gentleman from South Dakota that I made it and am entirely responsible for it, and I did not do it in a whisper, either. It was not made against this widow, but some of the deserters and bummers who are to come after her on this Calendar. I have to make a fight all along the line.

The CHAIRMAN (having counted the committee). One hundred and nine members are in the Hall—a quorum.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

THERESA PEEBLES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4355) to increase the pension of Theresa Peebles, of Jefferson County, Ga.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Theresa Peebles, of Jefferson County, Ga., a widow of a soldier of the war of 1812, from $12 to $20 per month.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report.

The report (by Mr. BLACK of Georgia) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4355) granting an increase of pension to Theresa Peebles, have considered the same and report:

The claimant is the widow of Henry Peebles, who served as a private in Capt. John P. Harvey's Company of Georgia Volunteers from August 24, 1813, to March 12, 1814, in the war of 1812.

The soldier died September 21, 1880, and his widow (the claimant) has since been granted the pension of $12 per month allowed by the general pension laws to the widows of soldiers of the war of 1812.

Mrs. Peebles married the soldier in 1864, and she is now about 66 years old. The above facts are shown by the papers on file at the Pension Bureau, and it appears from an affidavit signed by Joshua F. Denton, J. T. Glover, James Stapleton, and E. N. Stapleton that the claimant is very feeble and afflicted, and that she has but little means aside from her pension. She has been living alone until recently, her condition becoming such that she has been obliged to hire a woman to live with her.

There are several precedents for the proposed legislation, and in view of the facts above set forth your committee respectfully recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment fixing the rate of pension at $18 per month.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, if I understood the reading of that report correctly, this lady is to be pensioned because she is the widow of a soldier of the war of 1812, and the report shows that she was married to him in 1864. If that is a correct statement of the facts, I would like the gentleman who introduced the bill to explain to the House exactly what loss this lady ever incurred because of his service in the war of 1812, and consequently what pensionable disability is in the case at all.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I introduced the bill, I will state to the gentleman from New Hampshire, and the facts are stated in the report of the committee. The report and the bill are in the line of precedents heretofore established by the House. The beneficiary of this bill is old and feeble. Her physical condition requires the attendance of a nurse. She has practically no means except the pension she is now receiving, $12 a month, and this bill increases it to $18.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Does the gentleman propose that every person who does not have property enough to support her, no matter what time she was married to an old soldier, shall be supported by the Government of the United States?

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. No; the gentleman does not.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then, under what rule does he support this bill?

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I support it because of her helpless, dependent condition, because she is the widow of an old soldier, and because it is in the line of a precedent already established. I will state to the gentleman very frankly that if this was an original question, I think there might be more merit in his objection; but inasmuch as it seems to be the policy of the Government to grant pensions to this class of persons, I see no reason why others should be pensioned and this applicant denied.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But I presume the gentleman does not intend to say that a bad precedent makes a right bill; and if there is any reason for this pension, it is because the lady is now old, and, as the gentleman says, penniless; but she is not old because of the service of her husband some forty years prior to the time of her marriage to him, and she is not penniless because of that service. Now, if the gentleman can tell why she should be pensioned, except on the ground of a bad precedent, I should like to know the particular reason.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. This old lady is already pensioned, and this is an application to increase her pension from $12 to $18 per month on account of her helpless physical condition. It is a small sum, smaller than has been reported in other bills which have passed the committee and the House.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then receiving a pension under a law which does not debar her on account of her late marriage to the soldier is in the gentleman's mind a justification for our pensioning her at a greater rate over eighty years after the soldier rendered his service, she having married him about fifty years after the war?

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I am willing to let the committee pass upon that question.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADA J. SCHWATKA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 710) granting a pension to Ada J. Schwatka, widow of the late Lieut. Frederick Schwatka.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension roll the name of Ada J. Schwatka, widow of the late Frederick Schwatka, late first lieutenant, Third Cavalry, United States Army, at the rate of $20 per month.

The Committee on Pensions recommended an amendment striking out "thirty" and inserting "seventeen."

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report.

The report (by Mr. COLSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 710) granting a pension to Ada J. Schwatka, widow of Frederick Schwatka, late first lieutenant, Third Cavalry, United States Army, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

Said bill is accompanied by Senate Report No. 55, this session, and the same, fully setting forth the facts, is adopted by your committee as their report, and the bill is returned with the recommendation that it be amended so as to fix the rate of pension at $17 per month, in accordance with the rank held by the deceased officer, and that as so amended the bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 55, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 710) granting a pension to Ada J. Schwatka, have examined the same, and report:

A similar bill was introduced in the Fifty-third Congress, referred to the Committee on Pensions, reported favorably, and passed the Senate.

The military record of Lieutenant Schwatka is fully set forth in the following communication from the War Department:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,

Washington, June 16, 1894.

"Statement of the military service of Frederick Schwatka, late of the United States Army, compiled from the records of this office.

"He was graduated from the United States Military Academy, and appointed second lieutenant, Third Cavalry, June 12, 1871; promoted first lieutenant, Third Cavalry, March 20, 1879; resigned January 31, 1885.

"He joined his regiment November 28, 1871, and served with it in Arizona and Nebraska to August 13, 1874; on duty with the Big Horn and Yellowstone expedition to October 2, 1874; with regiment in Nebraska and Wyoming to May 18, 1876; in the field on Big Horn and Yellowstone expedition to October 27, 1876; on duty at Camp Sheridan, Wyo., to November 25, 1877, and at Spotted Tail Agency, Dak., to March 6, 1878.

"He left his post in Dakota on the latter date, on leave of absence granted him for the purpose of taking command of the expedition to Lady Franklin Bay to search for the papers of Sir John Franklin's expedition, etc., and was absent on this expedition until September 20, 1880. He was on special duty in New York City from that date until January, 1881; was absent on account of sickness and subsequently on leave of absence until October 21, 1881; served as aid-de-camp to General Miles until May 8, 1884, and in the meantime, while on General Miles's staff, was in command of an exploring expedition in Alaska from May 20 to October 12, 1883. He rejoined his regiment in Arizona in May, 1884, and was on leave from September 6, 1884, until his resignation took effect, January 31, 1885.

"During his service he was on leave of absence for the following periods in addition to these above specified:

"From September 24, 1875, to March 24, 1876, and from February 28 to September 24, 1882.

"J. C. GILMORE,
"Assistant Adjutant-General."

It will be remembered that in addition to his military services Lieutenant Schwatka rendered the Government valuable service as chief of the expedition in search of the relics of the Sir John Franklin party. In Appleton's Cyclopedia of American Biography, Volume V, page 433, the following appears:

"Schwatka, Frederick, explorer, born in Galena, Ill., September 29, 1849. After graduation at the United States Military Academy in 1871 he was appointed second lieutenant in the Third Cavalry, and served on garrison and frontier duty until 1877. He also studied law and medicine, and was admitted to the bar of Nebraska in 1875, and received his medical degree at Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York, in 1876.

"On hearing the story of Capt. Thomas F. Barry, who while on a whaling expedition in Repulse Bay, in 1871-1873, was visited by Eskimos who described strangers that had traveled through that region several years before and who had buried papers in a cavern, where silver spoons and other relics had been found, Lieutenant Schwatka determined to search for traces of Sir John Franklin's party, and, obtaining leave of absence, fitted out an expedition on the 19th of June, 1878, and accompanied by William H. Gilder as second lieutenant in command, he sailed in the Eothen for King Williams Land.

"The party returned on the 22d of September, 1880, having discovered and buried many of the skeletons of Sir John Franklin's party, and removed much of the mystery of his fate. Lieutenant Schwatka found the grave of Lieut. John Irving, third officer of the Terror, and, in addition to many interesting relics, a paper, which was a copy of the Crozier record that was found in 1859 by Lieut. William R. Hobson, of Sir Leopold McClintock's expedition, and which contained two records, the latter, under date of 25th of April, 1848, stating the death of Sir John Franklin on the 11th of June, 1847.

"The expedition was also marked by the longest sledge journey on record—3,251 statute miles—during which a branch of Backs River was discovered, which Lieutenant Schwatka named for President Hayes. Afterwards he explored the course of the Yukon River in Alaska, and rejoined his regiment in July, 1884. In August of that year he resigned the commission of first lieutenant, Third Cavalry, to which he had been appointed in March, 1879.

"He commanded the New York Times Alaskan exploring expedition in 1886.

"Lieutenant Schwatka has received the Roquette Arctic medal from the Geographical Society of Paris, and a medal from the Imperial Geographical Society of Russia, and is an honorary member of the geographical societies of Bremen, Geneva, and Rome. He is the author of Along Alaska's Great River (New York, 1885); Nimrod in the North (1885), and The Children of the Cold (1886). See Schwatka's Search, by Col. William H. Gilder (New York, 1881); The Franklin Search under Lieutenant Schwatka (Edinburgh and London, 1881) and Als Eskimo unter den Eskimo, by Henry Klutschak (Leipzig, 1881)."

Lieutenant Schwatka died about three years ago at Portland, Oreg., leaving the claimant (his widow) and one child wholly dependent on Mrs. Schwatka's father for support. Since then her father has deceased, and she is left without any means whatever for the support of herself and child. This fully appears by affidavits on file with your committee.

In view of all the circumstances, your committee report back the bill, recommending its passage.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOSEPH S. BUNKER.

Mr. TERRY. I ask unanimous consent to call up a bill which was left in rather an indefinite condition in the House the other day. It is the case of an old man 80 years of age. The bill is No. 649, granting a pension to Joseph S. Bunker. It is away down on the Calendar, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill out of its order. Is there objection?

Mr. MAHON and Mr. BROMWELL objected.

JACOB TAYLOR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 713) for the relief of Jacob Taylor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to recognize Jacob Taylor as a member of Company K, First Regiment of Missouri Cavalry, and grant him an honorable discharge as of date February 27, 1864.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, that bill does not come under the rule. It is not a desertion case; it is to correct a record.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report.

Mr. PICKLER. This bill is not in order to-night.

Mr. WOOD. I think it is in order.

Mr. PICKLER. It is a bill to restore the applicant to some rank.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this is not a case of desertion, and that the bill is not in order under the rule under which the House is now proceeding.

JAMES M'GOWAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3524) for the relief of James McGowan from the charge of desertion.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War or other proper official be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion standing against James McGowan, late of Company F, Eighty-second Ohio Infantry Volunteers, and that the records be so amended as to show the said James McGowan to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report.

The report (by Mr. TRACEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3524) for the relief of James McGowan, beg leave to report:

It is shown by the records that James McGowan, aged 19 years, was enrolled February 21 and mustered into service February 23, 1865, to serve one year. He was forwarded March 2, 1865, to the Sixty-first New York Volunteers, but his name was not taken up on the rolls of either company of that regiment. He was transferred upon some date, not shown on the record, to Company F, Eighty-second Ohio Infantry. It appears that he served faithfully with said company until July 6, 1865. On this latter date he is reported as a deserter.

In application to the War Department for the removal of the charge of desertion he stated that the command was encamped at Louisville, Ky., at the time, and was ordered to Cincinnati, Ohio, to be mustered out; that in going to Cincinnati they would pass by his home at Madison, Ind., and that he, being sick at the time from a severe attack of diarrhea, went home to recuperate, with the intention of rejoining the regiment to be mustered out. Upon arrival at home he was compelled to go to bed and was unable to leave the same until long after the regiment had been mustered out. In going home he only had in view the obtaining relief which he could not obtain had he remained with the command.

Your committee also makes note of the historic fact that at the time the soldier is charged with desertion the war had ended and hostilities had ceased, which is an additional and very strong testimony corroborating the soldier's statement.

He is further corroborated by the statement of his sister, Anna McGowan, who testified, on the 28th day of November, 1892, that upon his return home her brother James was suffering from bowel troubles, and that two physicians (both of them since dead) were called to attend him; that he was confined to his bed, and was at no time able to rejoin his regiment until after July 24, 1865.

His brother, Thomas McGowan, testified to the same effect November 23, 1892. J. B. Baldwin, a sergeant in the soldier's company, testified that he knew that he was sick in May or June, 1865.

Maggie Dixon, a neighbor, testified, March 13, 1893, that she had known the soldier for thirty years and knew that he was sick when he arrived home, and was prevented from rejoining his regiment by reason of such sickness.

A. J. Grayson, who was first lieutenant of Company D, Sixth Indiana Infantry, testified, February 4, 1895, that he had known McGowan since he was a child, and that he had never been in good health since he came home from the Army. That he and his sister live near him and have done so for twenty-five years, and that he knows from personal knowledge that he has not been a well man during that time. That he had been and was at that time a mere shadow, looking so weak and bad that he had been repeatedly refused work because it was apparent that he could not do it.

His enfeebled condition is further testified to by other witnesses, and your committee believe, from the evidence presented, that the soldier did not intend to desert his company and regiment at the time he left them and went home; that he went home to obtain relief, and was prevented by sickness from rejoining his command to be mustered out.

Because of these facts, which appear to your committee to be sufficiently proven, and the additional fact that hostilities had ceased before the 6th day of July, the day upon which the soldier is charged with desertion, your committee recommend that the accompanying bill do pass.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear from the gentleman in charge of this bill more particularly some information in regard to the result of the application by this petitioner to the War Department to have the charge of desertion removed, why it was not, and the particulars in the case.

Mr. TRACEY. The application to the War Department was refused on the ground that the testimony was not sufficiently clear as to the inability of the soldier to return to his command in time to be mustered out.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. PICKLER. I make the point of order that the gentleman from South Carolina has spoken once on this bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he only rose for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. PICKLER. He said he wanted to ask the gentleman a question, and on that he got the floor and spoke on this bill. I make the point of order that he has spoken on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair thinks the gentleman proposed to do no more than simply ask a question.

Mr. TRACEY. If the gentleman wants to make any further inquiry I shall be pleased to answer him.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to state that it seems to me that this is going a little too far for this committee to take in charge the business of the War Department, where they have, or ought to have, all the official records of the soldier, and where the record of every soldier, if he has any record at all, can be looked up.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is going too far if this applicant can not go to the War Department and find sufficient evidence to remove the suspicion or charge of desertion as a soldier. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] He is claiming here that he deserted after the war had closed. It seems to me that the whole report of the committee is contradictory, and it also seems to me that the Committee on Invalid Pensions are very careful here not to bring in one scintilla of testimony that would seem in the least to militate against the granting of pension to a petitioner. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman had better strike that out of the record. This bill does not come from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but comes from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TALBERT. My remarks are in a general way.

Mr. PICKLER. I should say they are.

Mr. TALBERT. And if they happen to hit such a bird as the gentlemen from South Dakota and he flutters I can not help it. The gentleman seems to anticipate that something was going to be said about his attempting to smother evidence and not bring it before this House as chairman of the committee. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

It does not make any difference, Mr. Chairman, where this report comes from; there is nothing in this report that will lead me to vote for the removal of the charge of desertion from this soldier, if soldier he was, coming as he does under the head of a number of those mentioned by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. Bragg) thirty-one years after the war ended—to come up and hunt for a pension, and I am astonished at the rapidity with which gentlemen want to hurry up here voting pensions to such a class of citizens as this. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I want to say again that I propose to enter my protest against the passage of any such measure as this, and if they will pass them, why, the responsibility must rest where it properly belongs. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 3.

So the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EDWARD H. MUNSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4199) to correct the military record of Edward H. Munson, late a private in Company H, Thirty-second New York Regiment Infantry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now standing against the military record of Edward H. Munson, late a private in Company H, Thirty-second New York Regiment of Infantry, and grant him an honorable discharge.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. No one has demanded the reading of the report.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I can explain this bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. TRACEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4199) for the relief of Edward H. Munson, beg leave to report:

There appear to be some discrepancies between the records of the War Department and the testimony submitted, as follows: The records of the War Department show that Edward H. Munson was aged 20 years at the date he was enrolled as a private of Company H, Thirty-second New York Infantry, while the soldier claims he was but 16 years of age, and this is corroborated by the testimony of Thomas Ash, who knew him at the time of his enlistment, and who says he was a mere schoolboy about 16 years of age; that he enlisted without the knowledge and consent of his parents, and came home one day in the uniform of his regiment and told his people that he had enlisted for nine months; by Jane Ryder, who lived a neighbor and knew the family intimately, and who says that at the time of his enlistment he was about 16 years of age and a mere schoolboy, and by a photograph taken about the time of his enlistment and which gives him a very youthful appearance.

It is shown by the record that Munson rendered faithful service as a soldier from the time of his enlistment until the 28th of May, 1863, when the term of service of the Thirty-second New York Infantry expired and the regiment was mustered out, and the remnant, apparently consisting of the recruits, was consolidated with the One hundred and twenty-first New York Infantry and Munson was assigned to Company D of said regiment. Against this assignment Munson vigorously protested at the time, claiming that he had been enlisted only for the unexpired term of service of the Thirty-second New York Infantry, a period of nine months.

The report of his desertion is shown by the records on June 5, 28, and 29, 1863, but it is held by the War Department that the true date is May 28, the date of his transfer to the One hundred and twenty-first New York Infantry.

Munson testifies that he accompanied his command on the march to Gettysburg, but became separated therefrom and fell in with a Vermont regiment and participated in the battle, but of this there is no other proof.

The facts which appear to be fairly well established by the testimony presented are:

1. That Patrick Stanley, first lieutenant of Company K, Thirty-second New York Infantry, and William Evans, second sergeant of Company H, Thirty-second New York Infantry, were detailed by Colonel Matterson and given a furlough to go home as recruiting officers to enlist men to fill up the regiment. This is testified to by Alfred Lawrence, who was first lieutenant of Company H, Thirty-second New York Infantry, the company to which Munson belonged.

2. That these recruiting officers represented that they were enlisting men for the unexpired term of the regiment, which was a two years' organization, and at the time of Munson's enlistment had about nine months to serve.

3. That the boy Munson signed all the papers presented to him and as directed by the recruiting officers without reading them.

4. That Munson immediately after his enlistment declared to his parents and to a number of others that he had enlisted for nine months.

5. That he was a good and faithful soldier from the time of his enlistment until the expiration of term of service of the Thirty-second New York Infantry.

The father of the boy makes a statement which, although not sworn to, is strongly corroborated, that his boy enlisted for the unexpired term of the regiment, and that he was so told by the recruiting officer, Patrick Stanley, on the day of the enlistment.

Aletha A. Munson testifies to the same facts.

Edward O. Jones testified to his acquaintance with the boy, to his enlistment, and says he verily believes that Edward H. Munson was deceived by the enlisting officer as to his term of enlistment. The affiant was captain of Company H, Thirty-second New York Infantry, to which company Munson belonged, and Alfred Lawrence, first lieutenant of same company, testified to his personal knowledge of the truth of the captain's statements. Both testify to the faithful and reliable service of the soldier during his service with the Thirty-second, and that he earnestly protested against being transferred to the One hundred and twenty-first New York Infantry on the ground that his term of enlistment had expired.

Lieutenant Lawrence further testifies that in conversation with General Sedgwick the general said that Munson and others should be discharged with the regiment, as they had been deceived and would not make good soldiers; that the said Edward H. Munson was a good and faithful soldier during the time he was a member of Company H, Thirty-second New York Infantry; that he served until about the 1st of June, 1863, when he was transferred to the One hundred and twenty-first New York Infantry, and that on the 13th day of June Company H and the whole Thirty-second Regiment was mustered out of service in the city of New York.

It is extremely probable that the boy gave his age to the recruiting officer as 20 in order that he might be accepted, as a large number of boys of extreme youth are known to have done.

A careful consideration of all the testimony leads to the conclusion that the boy was deceived as to his term of enlistment, and fully believed that he had enlisted for the unexpired term of nine months of the Thirty-second Regiment New York Infantry.

In view of all the facts, his faithful service during the term for which he believed he had enlisted, and his extreme youth at the time, your committee report favorably and recommend that the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. Division.

Mr. PICKLER. A parliamentary inquiry. Was there any negative vote? If there was no negative vote, a vote can not now be taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it can.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 2.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is made. [After a count.] One hundred and thirteen members are in the House. On this question the ayes are 92, the noes 2; and the bill is ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. ELIZABETH M. WILLIAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5235) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth M. Williams, of Monroe County, Tenn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll at the rate of $8 per month the name of Mrs. Elizabeth M. Williams, widow of William Williams, late a private in Captain Weir's Company, Tennessee Volunteers, Florida war of 1836.

Mr. TALBERT. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. COLSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5235) granting a pension to Elizabeth M. Williams, have considered the same and respectfully report as follows:

The claimant is the widow of William Williams, who served as a private in Captain Weir's Company of Tennessee Volunteers in the Florida Indian war of 1836. The records show that he was paid for twenty-five and one-half days' service, and it also appears that he was a pensioner during his lifetime at $4 per month under certificate No. 7477, on account of a gunshot wound of left leg received in said service. After the soldier's death, which occurred November 10, 1876, his widow, the claimant, made an application for pension under the general law, alleging that his death was due to causes originating in the service, but owing to the long time which had elapsed since the war she was unable to furnish the necessary proof in support of her claim.

On September 3, 1892, she filed a claim under the Indian war service pension act of July 27, 1892, but the same was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the service, as shown by the records, lacked four and one-half days of the period required by the said act to give title.

It appears from the papers on file at the Pension Bureau that the claimant married the soldier in 1845, and it is shown by the affidavits of S. Y. Minnis and J. H. Kelso, sr., residents of Monroe County, Tenn., that she is about 75 years old, in very feeble health, and dependent upon her children for support.

It may be added that the records of the Treasury Department show that the soldier's enrollment took place June 30, 1836, and his discharge July 31, 1836, a period of thirty-two days; but as other records show payment for twenty-five and one-half days only, it was held that the claim did not come within the scope of the service act.

The passage of the bill is respectfully recommended, with an amendment changing the spelling of the captain's name, in line 7, to "Ware."

The amendment recommended in the last paragraph of the report was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HANNAH YAZELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1171) to pension Hannah Yazell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, the name of Hannah Yazell, of Hardin County, Ohio, as the widow of James Yazell, deceased, late of Company G, Eighty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LAYTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1171) to pension Hannah Yazell, having carefully examined all the evidence in the case, report as follows:

James Yazell, who was the husband of this claimant, served from October 31, 1861, to July 24, 1865. He died October 26, 1893, from disease of heart, for which he was pensioned. Mrs. Yazell filed claims in the Pension Office under both old and new laws, but she is informed that her claim can not be admitted there without proof of the divorce of the soldier from his first wife, and on this point she is unable to furnish evidence which is satisfactory to the officials of the Pension Office.

She was married to the soldier April 8, 1873, with the understanding that he had been divorced from his former wife, and lived with him as his wife and bore him six children. She is unable to find any record of the divorce, but the evidence shows that after the divorce both the soldier and his former wife remarried, the soldier having procured a license, which he could not have done where all the parties were known without satisfactory evidence of the dissolution of the prior marriage bonds.

The soldier and this claimant, as well as his former wife and her husband, appear to have lived in the same community, respected by all.

Your committee are satisfied from the evidence that the soldier was divorced from his former wife, and that his marriage to the claimant was legal. The former wife of soldier died five or six years ago, so there is no possibility of her filing a claim as widow.

The bill, in the opinion of the committee, is a meritorious one and should pass, and the committee so recommend.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the gentleman in charge of this bill give us some further explanation of it. The report is so brief that it is impossible to gather from it anything satisfactory as to the merits of the bill. If these parties, as the report says, "lived in the same community and were respected by all" their neighbors, the fact of their divorce ought not to be an obscure fact, but ought to be easily ascertained. If we do not have that fact established, or do not have some explanation or the case, we are simply voting another pension without knowing why we are doing it.

The question was taken on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation, and the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes none.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM W. FRENCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 137) granting an increase of pension to William W. French.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William W. French, late of Company B, Sixth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 137) granting an increase of pension to William W. French, quote from the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions the following, which they adopt as their own:

"Claimant enlisted in the Sixth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry on the 15th day of October, 1861, to serve three years. He was engaged in the battle at Camden, N. C., April 19, 1862; Chantilly, Md., September 1, 1862; South Mountain, Maryland, September 13, 1862; Antietam, Md., September 17, 1862, and was wounded in the thigh at the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., December 13, 1862. He was discharged on the 2d day of September, 1863, for total disability, the surgeon certifying (almost a year after the wound was received) that soldier had not the slightest use of his limb, from which the ball has never been extracted. From the day he received the wound until the present soldier has been a great sufferer, and is now a complete physical and mental wreck. He was first pensioned at $6 per month, which was increased to $8, $15, $18, $24, $30, and $36, the pension being granted for gunshot wound of left thigh, causing nervous prostration.

"Soldier has been confined to his bed for over five years, requiring the constant attendance of another person. He has been examined by many physicians and medical boards, and has almost uniformly been rated at $72 per month. At three different times the medical board at White River Junction, Vt., found him suffering from gunshot wound and resulting nervous prostration and insanity. The only medical testimony that throws the least doubt upon the case is that of a single member of this same board, who examined the soldier at his home, and ventured the suggestion that the nervous prostration was possibly not due to the wound. As the soldier was pensioned for nervous prostration, and this same physician had signed certificates with his associates on the board recognizing nervous prostration as a result of the wound, the value of his adverse testimony can easily be estimated.

"Dr. James A. Davis, of Lebanon, N. H., a skillful and experienced physician, certifies that the nervous prostration was constantly increasing, and that it undoubtedly arose from the gunshot wound.

"Dr. James A. Leeb, of Canaan, N. H., gave an affidavit in the case, in which he said:

"I have practiced medicine for more than eleven years, and have been attending physician to the applicant since August, 1888. He was at that time suffering from nervous prostration, which was so severe as to produce mania in a mild form, and has been a constant sufferer ever since I first saw him. At times the pain is intense. In consequence of this nervous prostration he has been confined to his bed more than four years, and has not been dressed since May 16, 1891, and therefore requires the constant aid and attendance of another person, and has for more than five years. This condition of helplessness I believe to be wholly due to the nervous prostration caused by gunshot wound in left thigh, received at the battle of Fredericksburg, as stated in my previous affidavits, and for which applicant is now pensioned. This affidavit is written by me from my own personal examination, and was not prepared or dictated by any other person."

"In April, 1895, soldier applied for increase, asking that the examination be made at his home, but notwithstanding the history of the case and the conclusive opinions of physicians and medical boards who had examined this man, a medical examiner of the Pension Bureau disposed of the case in these words:

"The evidence mentioned does not warrant another medical examination looking to increase from $36 to $50 or $72 per month for gunshot wound of left thigh, causing nervous prostration, for the reason that it does not show that claimant's helplessness is due entirely to said wound. He is shown by said testimony and medical certificates in the case to be suffering from mental impairment, which can not be accepted as a result of pensioned wound and results. Any nervous prostration arising from the wound appears to have disappeared."

"As a result of this opinion an examination was denied by the Bureau, under date of September 13, 1895.

"Comment is unnecessary on the medical statement upon which the action of the Bureau was based. It is well known to medical men of experience that mania frequently results from protracted nervous prostration, and there is not in the entire case a word or a sentence which justifies the statement that "any nervous prostration arising from the wound appears to have disappeared." On the contrary, it is conclusively shown that the nervous condition has steadily progressed, and is now more severe than ever before.

"Your committee are of the opinion that this case belongs to the class which, under the general laws, are entitled to $72 per month. This bill asks that the pension be increased from $36 to $50, and we therefore report the bill back favorably, with a recommendation that it pass."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word. I want this bill to pass. It is very strange to me, considering the condition of this old soldier, a private, perfectly helpless, with a helpless family around him, that these gentlemen come in and cut him down $23 below what the law would allow him. I can not understand these things, but this simply shows again the hypocrisy of gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. PICKLER. We are not doing that. The gentleman states what is not true. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS M. SCOTT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6132) granting an increase of pension to Thomas M. Scott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas M. Scott, late Company H, Seventy-eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $20 per month in lieu of the pension which he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. ANDREWS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6132), granting an increase of pension to Thomas M. Scott, late Company H, Seventy-eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, having carefully examined the evidence relating thereto, respectfully submit the following report:

Said soldier served from September 1, 1862, to June 17, 1865, and was honorably discharged. He was virtually in command of his company as captain from September 20, 1863, to February 15, 1865, but could not muster for want of men.

The prisoner-of-war records show that he was captured February 15, 1865, at Seneca, S. C.; that he was paroled March 1, 1865, and reported at College Green Barracks, Md., March 7, 1865; that he was sent to Benton Barracks, Mo., March 8, 1865, and reported there March 14, 1865.

Under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1884, and the acts amendatory thereof, he is considered by the War Department as commissioned to the grade of captain to take effect from March 20, 1865. He drew pay as captain from that date to June 17, 1865.

Both feet and ankles were seriously injured while he was a paroled prisoner, but a few days before he was mustered as captain, as per dates indicated above. He is now pensioned for those injuries at $8 per month, but would have received $20 per month if he had been mustered as captain.

Your committee believe that his service, the nature of his injuries, and his present physical and financial condition justly entitle him to an increase from $8 to $20 per month, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. PAYNE having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HEPBURN, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration sundry bills upon the Private Calendar and had directed him to report the same with various recommendations.

The hour of 10.30 p. m. having arrived, the Speaker pro tempore declared the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with recommendations in regard thereto, the draft of an act to amend the act excluding Chinese from this country, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BABCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8332) to establish certain harbor regulations for the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1578); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FLYNN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred House bill No. 4074, reported in lieu thereof a bill (H. R. 8616) for the relief of settlers on certain lands in Oklahoma, accompanied by a report (No. 1581); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2816) granting land to the Nashville Presbyterian Church, of Nashville, S. Dak., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1586); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6891) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to army nurses," approved August 5, 1892, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1585); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MAHANY, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8474) for the necessary and better protection of American labor and the enforcement of the law of domicile and the restriction of immigration to such a degree as will serve that end, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1589); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2708) to constitute a new division of the eastern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for the holding of terms of court at Beaumont, Tex., and for the appointment of a clerk for said court, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1590); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

By Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire: A concurrent resolution (House Con. Res. No. 45) providing for an investigation of the late purchase of seeds by the Department of Agriculture and of certain alleged statements of the Secretary and Assistant Secretary of that Department in regard to the conduct of Senators and Representatives in Congress—to the Committee on Agriculture.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills of the following titles were presented and referred as follows:

By Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 8623) granting an increase of pension to Martin Funk, late of Company C, One hundred and forty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8624) to remove the charge of desertion against the name of James Eagan, late of Company A, Fifty-ninth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BEACH: A bill (H. R. 8625) to relieve Samuel Schmitz from the charge of desertion—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8626) to increase the pension of Col. H. N. Whitbeck—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8627) for increase of pension to Mrs. Esta Snyder—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8628) to relieve William H. Taylor from the charge of desertion—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BROMWELL: A bill (H. R. 8629) to remove the charge of desertion against of John De Witt, late of Company D, Fifty-second Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and grant him an honorable discharge—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CLARDY: A bill (H. R. 8630) to correct the military record of Nathaniel L. Lightfoot—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COLSON: A bill (H. R. 8631) for the benefit of George W. Jolly—to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8632) granting restoration of pension to George J. Polston—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8633) granting a pension to Nancy Roberts, of Manchester, Clay County, Ky.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAGER: A bill (H. R. 8634) granting a pension to Mary Jane Crane—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HALTERMAN: A bill (H. R. 8635) granting a pension of $20 per month to Eleanor M. Laise—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MEREDITH: A bill (H. R. 8636) for the relief of Alphonso M. Potvin, late of Colon, Republic of Colombia—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MOODY: A bill (H. R. 8637) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Manning—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PATTERSON: A bill (H. R. 8638) for the relief of Patrick G. Meath—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. PICKLER: A bill (H. R. 8639) granting a pension to Matilda A. Higgins—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. QUIGG: A bill (H. R. 8640) to increase the pension of Mrs. Rebecca S. Foster—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8641) to pension Michael McAndrew—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SHAW: A bill (H. R. 8642) for the relief of H. R. Bryan, of Craven County, N. C.—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STAHL: A bill (H. R. 8643) to increase the pension of Capt. Hiram S. McNair, Third Maryland Cavalry—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WALKER of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 8644) for the relief of Waller R. Staples, jr.—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER: A bill (H. R. 8645) to refer the claim of Kennon H. Steger to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8646) for the relief of the heirs of Dr. Andrew Moore—to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania: Petition of citizens of Lock Haven, Pa., to accompany House bill No. 7935, for the relief of Capt. C. Wilson Walker—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BABCOCK: Petition of H. P. Proctor and 20 others, of Viroqua, Wis., praying for favorable action on House bills Nos. 838 and 4566, to amend the postal laws—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas: Petition of Percy Daniels, of Crawfordville, Ind., to accompany House bill for raising additional revenue, for reestablishing the distribution of the burdens and benefits of government, and other purposes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BULL: Petition of citizens of Providence, R. I., in favor of the adoption of the metric system—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Also, paper to accompany House concurrent resolution No. 44, to print 5,000 copies of the report on "The proposed American interoceanic canal in its commercial aspects"—to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Petition and remonstrance of citizens of Kenosha County, Wis., against the statue of Pere Marquette remaining in Statuary Hall—to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. GROSVENOR: Petition of Rev. John W. Young and others, of the State of Ohio, for the passage of House bill No. 6851, appropriating unclaimed pension and bounty money due the estates of deceased colored soldiers to military and educational purposes for the colored people—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HULICK: Petition of G. W. McMurch, J. & H. Glasceens, and other citizens of New Richmond, Ohio, asking for the passage of the pending bankruptcy bill—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of citizens of Lebanon, Ohio, in favor of the passage of House bill No. 4566, relating to second-class mail matter and bill No. 838, to reduce letter postage—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota: Petition of 3,049 citizens of the State of North Dakota, in favor of the Denny bill or some similar measure forbidding the issuance of Federal licenses in prohibition States—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MADDOX: Petition of citizens of Cartersville, Ga., for favorable action on House bill No. 4566, to amend the postal laws relating to second-class matter, and bill No. 838, to reduce letter postage—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. OTJEN: Remonstrances and petitions of Charles Ploetz and 15 other citizens of Milwaukee, Wis., regarding the Marquette statue—to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. QUIGG: Petition of Abraham Lincoln Council, No. 6, Union Veteran Protective Association, of New York; also petition of John E. Land and others, of New York City, praying for the passage of a law giving $8 per month to every soldier who served ninety days in the war of the rebellion—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of Michael McAndrew, late of the United States Navy on board of the Wamsutta, Mercedita, Chenango, and Banshee, for pension by special act, to accompany House bill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany House bill to increase the pension of Mrs. Rebecca S. Foster—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SOUTHARD: Petition of L. Franc & Co. and several other business firms of Toledo, Ohio, asking for the passage of a joint resolution of Hon. J. H. BROWELL, relative to shortening the bonded period on distilled spirits—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TURNER of Georgia: Preamble and resolutions of a town meeting at Dublin, Ga., of which W. S. Ramsey was chairman and F. C. Black secretary, relating to the case of A. J. Diaz, of Habana—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 2, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The VICE-PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I will take this occasion to state that in view of the agreement which was made yesterday that to-day should be devoted to finishing the naval appropriation bill, and as there are several Senators who desire to submit amendments and make remarks upon them, I shall be obliged to resist any request for unanimous consent to take up other measures, and immediately after the routine morning business is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the naval appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PEPPER. What is the request of the Senator from Maine?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To dispense with the further reading of the Journal. The Chair hears no objection, and the further reading is dispensed with.

EMPLOYEES OF THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Public Printer, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 20, 1896, a statement of the amount of leave money claimed to be due to employees of the Government Printing Office for the fiscal year 1892 and 1893; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 515) granting a pension to William Grose was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 7668) to establish a term of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Roanoke, Va., in the western district of Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the petition of John A. Wineberger and 12 other citizens of the District of Columbia, praying that an appropriation be made for grading and regulating Illinois avenue, in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of J. H. Danseur Post, No. 104, Department of Indiana, Grand Army of the Republic, of Lagrange, Ind., signed by J. J. Cookingham, commander, E. M. Hutchingson, adjutant, and H. M. Kromer, senior vice-commander, praying for the enactment of a service-pension law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of Local Union, No. 2, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the free coinage of silver; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the Manufacturers and Producers' Association of California, praying for the establishment of a department of commerce and manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HANSBROUGH presented a petition of the members of the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota, praying for a speedy ratification of the agreement entered into October 22, 1892, between them and the commissioners appointed under the Indian appropriation act of July 13, 1892; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed as a document.

Mr. CALL. I present a paper addressed to me in the nature of a petition by the Fort Brook Cooperative Association of Tampa, Fla., relative to their claims as settlers upon the abandoned Fort Brook Military Reservation. I ask that the substance of the petition and the names attached to it may be inserted in the RECORD, and that the paper may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HAWLEY. I object temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Florida state how long the paper is?

Mr. CALL. It is very short. It refers to a question of the right of certain settlers upon what were public lands immediately adjacent to the town of Tampa.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not see why on earth that should pad the RECORD, which is already so big that it takes a pair of oxen to carry away the bound volumes at the end of a Congress.

Mr. CALL. I will not occupy time further than to state that a large number of very poor people are greatly concerned in this matter, and they would be very much gratified if the facts in the case could be made known to Senators by having them appear in the RECORD. That is all there is about it.

Mr. HAWLEY. It will be cheaper to print 500 copies of the paper as a document than to print it in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands objection is made to the request of the Senator from Florida by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not object to printing the paper as a document for distribution.

Mr. CALL. Then I ask that it be printed as a miscellaneous document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2997) to provide for the fulfillment of the stipulations of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed at Washington on the 8th day of February, 1896.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 137) declaring a certain bridge across the Tallahatchie River, in Tallahatchie County, State of Mississippi, a lawful structure; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 167) authorizing foreign exhibitors at the Tennessee Centennial Exposition, to be held in Nashville, Tenn., in 1897, to bring to this country foreign laborers from their respective countries for the purpose of preparing for and making their exhibits, and allowing articles imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at said exposition to be imported free of duty, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2870) to permit Rene C. Baughman to lay pipes in a certain street in the city of Washington, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2778) to grant permits for the laying of pipe lines for commercial purposes in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 3011) for the relief of Nicolai Bros.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported an amendment, authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to permit the erection of telephone poles in the public streets, etc., in the District of Columbia, outside of the city of Washington, intended to be proposed to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2626) to amend the laws relating to American seamen, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2898) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Monongahela River from the city of McKeesport to the township of Mifflin, Allegheny County, Pa., reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2698) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River to the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, from some suitable point between the north line of St. Clair County, Ill., and the southwest line of said county, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 3012) conferring jurisdiction upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or any court in said District having general equity jurisdiction, to decree a sale of real estate in said District, belonging to insane persons, for purpose of reinvestment, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 3013) to change the pay and rating of machinists in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 3014) for the establishment of a soldiers' home at Southern Pines, N. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 3015) for the relief of Henry F. Miller; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 3016) for the relief of Col. George H. Mendell, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, retired; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 3017) granting a pension to Rebecca Waldron; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3018) for the relief of Benjamin F. Smoot; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3019) to remove the charge of desertion from the name of George W. Adams; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 3020) granting a pension to W. L. Faxon; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced a bill (S. 3021) granting a pension to Henry Walters; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3022) granting a pension to Philander Samples; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3023) granting an increase of pension to Isaac E. Boothe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3024) granting an increase of pension to John Wood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3025) granting an increase of pension to John C. Mitchel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3026) granting an increase of pension to Marshall H. Blodgett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3027) granting an increase of pension to Dudley Ashton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3028) granting an increase of pension to Henry J. Huston; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3029) granting an increase of pension to Erastus C. Evans; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3030) granting an increase of pension to Erastus F. Phelps; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3031) granting an increase of pension to Gerhard Shoemaker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. BLANCHARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the joint resolution (S. R. 109) directing the President of the United States to request the Government of Spain to grant to the people of Cuba the power of local self-government, and in case the Government of Spain shall refuse, to take possession of the Island of Cuba and hold it until its inhabitants can institute such government as they may wish, and organize and arm such forces as may be necessary to support it, introduced by me March 23, 1896, be taken from the Calendar and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

PRICES OF ARMOR FOR NAVAL VESSELS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Naval Affairs 100 copies of the testimony taken by that committee in relation to prices paid for armor for vessels of the Navy.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 137) declaring a certain bridge across the Tallahatchie River, in Tallahatchie County, State of Mississippi, a lawful structure, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 167) authorizing foreign exhibitors at the Tennessee Centennial Exposition to be held in Nashville, Tenn., in 1897, to bring to this country foreign laborers from their respective countries for the purpose of preparing for and making their exhibits, and allowing articles imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at said exposition to be imported free of duty, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on International Expositions.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I have no morning business to present, but if the morning business is over I ask the Senate—

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator from Georgia and to other Senators that yesterday by unanimous consent it was agreed that immediately after the routine business was concluded this morning the naval appropriation bill should be taken up.

Mr. GORDON. I beg pardon, I was not aware of it.

Mr. HALE. I have not any right to yield. I ask that the naval appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Maine, as I may be called away from the Senate, if there is any objection to allowing the amendment to be voted on which I offered the other day about the examination of a system of propulsion?

Mr. HALE. Not in the least.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have one other amendment that perhaps may be best disposed of at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill, as an additional section:

Sec. — That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to examine, through a board composed of line and staff officers, into the merits of any system presented for the propulsion of vessels by direct action against the water without the use of screws, in comparison with the steam engine and the propeller, and into the relative efficiency of the two methods as to displacement, waste of fuel, liability to accidents, and speed and endurance, and also into the applicability and special advantages of the direct system in connection with torpedo boats and coast-defense vessels.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is not a new idea. Actual experiments have been made and deliberate conclusions published. I should like to know from the Senator from New Hampshire whether there is any new light, any invention that promises any improvement in that process.

Mr. CHANDLER. Such has been called to my attention, otherwise I would not have offered the amendment. The dream, I suppose, of marine architects is to have some method of propulsion without engines and propellers. This is a plan for exploding combustible material in cylinders located lengthwise on the ship directly against the water. Very remarkable results have been produced by various methods of applying that principle. One that was called to my attention certainly gives great promise of success. I can hardly conceive that there can be any objection to calling the attention of the Secretary specially to the matter.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not, then, the old scheme of projecting steam directly against the water?

Mr. CHANDLER. Not with steam, but the process is more like the use of a gas engine.

Mr. HAWLEY. Throwing the gas against the water?

Mr. CHANDLER. By the explosion of gas at the end of cylinders against the water in the stern of the ship, and sending the ship ahead in that way.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not worth while to say nowadays that anything can not be done. It can do no hurt.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. In behalf of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMillan] and the Committee on Naval Affairs, I offer the clause I send to the desk as a substitute for the present provision in the bill as to the Naval Militia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. GORMAN. What has become of the amendment already pending?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Maine is allowing me to offer these amendments while we are waiting.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New Hampshire stated that he wanted action on the amendment which has just been adopted. I did not know he had more than one amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the amendment I now propose be read, if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. GORMAN. Under the general agreement debate closes at 2 or half past 2; I see it is 2 by the RECORD, and there are at least two important amendments to be acted upon, on which there will be debate.

Mr. HALE. I think there is great force in what the Senator from Maryland says. There will be an opportunity for putting in amendments under the five-minute rule, and I do not think that Senators ought to consume the time before 2 o'clock upon matters of that sort. The Senator from New Hampshire will be back in time, I understand.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would not have asked it if I had supposed that any one was ready to speak. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HALE. I think we can now dispose of the torpedo amendment, and then the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] will have an opportunity to address the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], which was pending at the time of adjournment yesterday.

Mr. HALE. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, after line 24, strike out all of the bill down to and including the word "dollars," in line 4, on page 51, and insert:

Torpedo gunboats and torpedo-boat destroyers with a minimum speed of 30 knots, and torpedo boats with a minimum speed of 26 knots, 20 in number, to cost in all, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $4,000,000.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I trust this amendment will not be agreed to. The bill as it came from the other House provided for 5 torpedo boats, the speed not to be less than 26 knots, for which there was appropriated $875,000, and 10 torpedo boats, not to exceed in all $800,000. The Senate committee proposed to strike out the 5 torpedo boats of 26 knots, and insert 3 torpedo boats of not less than 30 knots, and 10 torpedo boats the cost in all not to exceed $500,000. In addition to that there is a provision for 2 submarine torpedo boats known as the Holland type, proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, the cost not to exceed $175,000 each. This would make in the aggregate about $1,500,000 for torpedo boats, as the Committee on Appropriations reported the bill, giving the Navy vessels of faster speed and larger than those proposed in the bill as it came from the other House. I think under the present condition of affairs this is ample. Six months ago nobody in this country would have proposed constructing one of these torpedo boats to run 30 knots an hour, and it is only a suggestion now, or an offer by the builders that possibly they can accomplish it. As to the boats of 25 or 26 knots, they may be of use, and probably will be useful, but at the same time if we can construct them at 30 and 32 knots hereafter, the 25 or 26 knot boats will be of comparatively little use.

The amount involved in this appropriation, $4,000,000, as is proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, if the Department sees proper to do so, would be expended within one year and a half, for probably it would not require longer than eighteen months to construct these torpedo boats. So the direct charge on the Treasury by the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire would be greater than if we appropriated $4,000,000 for another battle ship.

In addition to that, these boats can be used practically, as the Secretary of the Navy says, only for harbor defense and near the harbor. They can not go to sea. On the other side they have tried the experiment, and found that men could not live very well on board of them when they were out. I think we have made an ample provision, probably greater than the requirements of the service. In fact, the Secretary of the Navy only estimated for 10 or 12. By the bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations it is proposed to give all in number that the Secretary has himself suggested.

Besides, the boat that is being constructed of the Holland type, of which we have provided that he may contract for two more at $175,000 if the one that is now being built is a success, and only on that condition, will in all probability revolutionize the whole construction of these boats not only here, but all over the world. As the Secretary and other officers of the Department stated to the committee, it is a boat that goes under the water. They believe that they have about perfected an arrangement by which, while they are down under the water 10 or 12 feet, by two small instruments run up from the boat, they can not only ascertain their bearings, but actually see whatever war vessel is in front of them. It is in the experimental stage yet, but they have confidence in producing that result, and if they do, then there is an entire revolution in the whole construction of these vessels, and the type that is now talked about would be obsolete and of no use.

I think we have given the Department a sufficient amount of money for this purpose. As I said before on the main amendment, I do not believe that the condition of the Treasury is such as to warrant this expenditure. I think it is all wrong to place so much money in the hands of any officer of the Government when we are in this experimental stage.

It is a fact stated by the Secretary that no torpedo boat yet has ever sunk a great war ship except when she was at anchor. I have no doubt of the utility and the necessity of having some torpedo boats, but I suggest to the Senate that we are going too rapidly in this matter, more rapidly than the service demands or than prudence demands.

I therefore trust that the amendment will not be adopted. I shall call for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I regret that the distinguished Senator from Maryland, who has never shown any unwillingness to make reasonable progress in the construction of the new Navy, should oppose the provision for additional torpedo boats, made advisable, as I think, because the provision for two of the battle ships has been stricken out. There has been saved, by striking out the two battle ships, $10,600,000. The bill as it came from the Committee on Appropriations provided for 5 torpedo boats at $875,000, and 10 torpedo boats at $800,000, at a total cost for torpedo boats of $1,675,000. Those provisions are stricken out by my amendment and 20 torpedo boats substituted. There is a saving by striking out the 2 battle ships and the 15 torpedo boats of $12,275,000, and there is substituted 20 torpedo boats of the two classes, at $4,000,000, making a net saving of $8,275,000. I submit to the Senator from Maryland that he ought to be satisfied with that. I suppose the Senator from Maryland has not overlooked the fact that my amendment only increases the number of torpedo boats over that provided by the House from 15 to 20. It increases the number only 5. But it does increase, and here is the point, the discretion in the Secretary of the Navy to build larger boats, by giving him an appropriation of $4,000,000.

Mr. President, I am not in favor of limiting the head of the Navy Department (acting presumably in questions of this great moment by the advice of the President) too much in matters of detail. I think we have been in the habit of too strictly defining what the Navy and Army expenditures shall be. I for one have been at all times ready to appropriate $10,000,000 a year for improving the fortifications of the country in accordance with the recommendation of the Endicott Board, and I have been willing to appropriate money by the millions, not exceeding eight or ten million dollars a year, for new constructions, to be expended largely in the discretion of the executive officers of the Government, for the increase of the Navy. I believe that is the practice in England. When additional navy appropriations are called for a credit is asked for the navy. Undoubtedly the law indicates in a general way what the expenditures are to be for, but a very much larger discretion is given to the executive officers engaged in the construction of the vessels of foreign countries than we have been in the habit of giving here.

I do not sympathize with the feeling of the Senator from Maryland that too much discretion is about to be given by this bill to the present Secretary of the Navy. He is not the Secretary of my party; I have had no relations with him other than those of a formal character; but I am prepared to bear testimony in a general way to his ability, fidelity, zeal, and discretion as Secretary of the Navy during the last three years. I have very little criticism to make of his conduct of the Navy Department. I am glad to say that with one or two exceptions there has been nonpartisanship manifested during the last twelve years in the reconstruction of the Navy.

I do not even consider the Senator from Maryland to blame for the introduction of so much political-financial discussion as has been introduced in the debate upon this bill at the present session, but I think that, dealing generally with this subject, we ought to give the Secretary of the Navy $4,000,000 with which to build torpedo gunboats, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats. I think, instead of the House provision, we had better say to him, "Take $4,000,000 and build 20 torpedo gunboats, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats, and so apportion the price as to get 20 boats for that money; but in all cases get vessels of the larger size that are capable of 30 knots' speed, and vessels of the smaller size that are capable of 26 knots' speed."

If the amendment is not properly drawn, if it needs to be altered in any way, the alteration can be made in the committee of conference, which of necessity must revise the language of all the various amendments that are made in the Senate in connection with the text of the bill as it passed the other House.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator from New Hampshire takes his seat I desire to make an inquiry of him for the information of myself and of the Senate. On page 52 there is provision made for the construction of certain submarine torpedo boats of the Holland type, if the one now being constructed in Baltimore shall prove to be a success. The question that I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire is, whether, in case the submarine boat of the Holland type shall prove to be a success, it will supersede the torpedo boats of the type of the 20 which are included in his amendment, or whether it is true that, even if the submarine torpedo boat of the Holland type shall prove to be a success, there will still be need for both the type of boats provided for in his amendment and also for boats of the Holland type?

I make the inquiry because it is a matter upon which I myself am not informed, and I think, in view of the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, it is a point on which the Senate should be definitely informed. If it is true that the success of the torpedo boat of the Holland type will cause the torpedo boat of the present type to be superseded, to be obsolete, to be of no value, then I think the point made by the Senator from Maryland is well taken. But if, on the contrary, there is still an office for each to perform, we might go forward, I think, without fear of overdoing the matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Georgia was present in the room of the Committee on Naval Affairs when the parties interested in and familiar with the Holland boat were before the committee. He knows all about it that I know. The nations of the world are trying to devise a submarine boat, a torpedo boat that can dive under water and approach the great battle ships of an enemy and destroy them. The whole business is experimental, as the Senator knows very well, and it is a matter of very great doubt whether a submarine torpedo boat can be made a success. If it could be made a success and be put into use within a certain sphere it does not by any means follow that it will supersede the torpedo boats, especially the larger-sized torpedo boats. If the Senator asks for my opinion I should say that even if we are to have the three torpedo boats of the Holland type we still ought to have the 20 torpedo gunboats, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats not of the submarine type, proposed by my amendment, and even more of them. That is my judgment.

Senators will notice that the two additional boats are not to be built unless the Holland boat now under construction proves an unqualified success. I very much doubt whether those two boats will be built, but I do not think that from the authorization given for them any argument is to be derived against the construction of the regular torpedo boats to move above water, such as are now being constructed by all the nations of the world.

Mr. BACON. I was, as the Senator has suggested, present when the plan of the Holland torpedo boat was explained to the committee. I believe I am correct in the recollection that there was no claim for it that it was possible to secure for that boat any such speed as is provided shall be one of the features of these proposed torpedo boats.

Mr. CHANDLER. I thank the Senator from Georgia for calling that fact to my attention. But the Senator will remember the point was also developed that if you can get a torpedo boat which can go down under water and move without the enemy discovering it, it is not material whether when under water it moves 8 or 10 knots an hour or 20 knots an hour, it will move stealthily and it will reach the battle ship without being discovered, while if it is above water it is liable to be discovered, and therefore it should be so fleet that not even a battle ship should be able to escape from it.

Mr. President, I do not intend to speak on this subject at great length, but I do intend to call the attention of Senators to the fact that a battle ship costs $5,300,000 according to the present estimates, and we can build 20 torpedo boats for less than the cost of one battle ship. One of the battle ships involves a vast amount of money. When she goes to sea she carries four or five hundred lives on her, and by striking a rock or by coming in contact with a torpedo of the enemy she is liable to wholly disappear and be lost to the Government, whereas for this sum of money we can put four or five torpedo boats into each one of the principal harbors of the country; we can do it within a year and a half or two years, and then, I say, we shall have secured better harbor defense, harbor defense more to be feared, for a smaller sum of money than we can possibly obtain in any other way.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he sits down, if he pleases. If these boats are provided for in the bill I suppose the building of them must be let to the lowest bidder?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the intention.

Mr. FRYE. Suppose they should all be contracted for on the Atlantic Coast, then there would be no torpedo boats for the Pacific Coast at all, and the Pacific Coast certainly needs some as much as the Atlantic Coast.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, I will state that it is proposed, if this provision goes through, that other amendments will be put in afterwards covering that point.

Mr. FRYE. So that a portion shall be built on the Pacific Coast?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is such an amendment now pending (I do not know whether it has been agreed to or not), providing that a certain portion shall be built on the Pacific Coast. It is to come in on page 51.

Mr. FRYE. That is all right, then. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. HAWLEY. The idea of propelling offensive boats under water and out of sight is by no means new. A young graduate of Yale College, Connecticut, during the Revolution, Mr. Bushnell, committed his own life to one on one occasion. The boat was used, and in one case it hit not the ship aimed at but destroyed a transport somewhere in the rear. Other experiments were afterwards made abroad and here, and it has been a dream of inventors from that time to this day. Perhaps we have found it now; I do not know. I have my serious doubts as to the speed and efficacy of that class of boats. The Senator from New Hampshire will perhaps correct me, for he may have looked at the facts more recently, but I think the Holland boat does not entirely disappear. I observe in the drawings of it a smokestack standing at some distance above the water. That can not be a picture of the boat when it is supposed to be submerged.

Mr. CHANDLER. It can be completely submerged. The tube of which the Senator speaks remains above water for a time, but it can be submerged and the boat, supplied with air for a certain time, can move entirely under water.

Mr. HAWLEY. But how is the escape of gas or air or steam to be kept from the sight of the enemy as it bubbles up? It would be a small volcano.

Mr. CHANDLER. When the boat takes a complete dive and disappears the fires are all put out; it is propelled by compressed air, and the crew breathe from air reservoirs.

Mr. HAWLEY. But the fires can not well be put out without making very serious trouble on board the boat.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator had seen the diagram and heard the explanation he would have found that all the points he is anxious about are carefully covered and with success, as the builders of the boat contend. They are so far solved that we are already paying for the construction of the Holland boat.

Mr. HAWLEY. I make no objection. I hope the thing will succeed. But the other kinds undoubtedly can be built. There is probably no method by which an equal quantity of offensive and defensive force can be so speedily supplied as by the building of these torpedo boats. I think the Senator's amendment is a perfectly wise one, especially after the immense reduction of $12,000,000 by reducing the number of battle ships.

The example of Great Britain in building a navy is not referred to with the idea of commending it entirely to us, for Great Britain's problem is very different from ours. She has an unceasing and eternal policy of aggression, and is also under the necessity of immense expenditures to defend what she has already seized in all quarters of the globe. An enormous fleet, such as she is now struggling to maintain and to create in addition, are a life necessity for her. We are aiming only at a reasonable policy of self-defense, for we do not contemplate aggression upon warlike neighbors or upon peaceful countries for the purpose of possession.

It is instructive as to what the opinion of the wisest men in this matter is as shown by Great Britain. She has 189 torpedo boats in service and is building 62 more. This shows that the nation whose absolute existence depends upon naval power thinks it wise to supply a very large number of these boats. I am willing to vote for at least 20 or 30 now, and for more next year.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I have ceased to be surprised at the scope and character of the amendments which have been made respecting this bill and the suggestions which have been made in connection with it. I therefore failed to be somewhat astounded, as I ordinarily would be, at the indorsement which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] gives to the present Secretary of the Navy. It follows very close upon the indorsement by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it looks as if we were about to have the spectacle presented of an indorsement by this side of the Chamber of the members of the existing Cabinet and their repudiation by the Senators on the other side.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator will pardon me one remark, in indorsing the policy of the present Secretary of the Navy it is an indorsement of the Republican policy. It was begun years ago under Republican administration.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The amendment suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire certainly seems to me rather curiously prepared. I do not wish to suggest that it has been prepared in undue haste, but it certainly does not seem to me to present an intelligent problem to the Senate. We have a Secretary of the Navy who estimated and recommended 13 additional torpedo boats, 3 to have a maximum speed of 30 miles, 10 without a maximum speed designated, and 2 submarine torpedo boats, if submarine torpedo boats should be a success. The Secretary estimated that the 3 torpedo boats which should have the maximum speed of 30 miles, or practically beyond which, I take it, we can not hope to go as present inventions stand, were to cost $175,000 each. The 10 torpedo boats to be constructed in such manner as to the Department should seem wise were to cost $80,000 each. The 2 additional submarine torpedo boats, if submarine torpedo boats should be a success, were to cost $175,000 each. That makes $1,675,000 for 15 torpedo boats.

Now, the Senator from New Hampshire comes in and yesterday morning he had an amendment to appropriate four and a half million dollars for 30 boats in all, which would add 15. He changed it in the twinkling of an eye yesterday to $4,000,000 for 20 boats altogether, so that, without an estimate, without a careful investigation by any committee here, we are asked to appropriate $2,325,000 for 5 torpedo boats, provided the estimate of the Secretary of the Navy was intelligently made. He wanted 10 boats, to cost $80,000 apiece, to have such speed as he should think best. He wanted 3 torpedo boats that would cost $175,000 each, to have a maximum speed of 30 knots.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator's mistake is here. The original bill provided for a speed of only 26 knots for the 3 boats. Thirty knots is the proposition proposed to be inserted by the committee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator does not wish to do me an injustice—

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. CHANDLER. The point is that the original boats were not sufficiently large and had not sufficient speed, and the additional money is necessary to cover the increase in those respects.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from New Hampshire knows very well that I do not wish for a moment to misquote him, but he must assume that the Secretary of the Navy knew what he was about; and he wanted 10 boats to cost $80,000 apiece, and he wanted 3 boats to cost $175,000 each; he wanted 2 submarine boats to cost $175,000 each.

Now comes the Senator from New Hampshire, and he says, "We know a great deal better than the Secretary of the Navy what he wants. This is not what he wants at all. What he wants is 20 boats, to build them as he likes." And although the Secretary of the Navy has put himself on record as wanting these boats at this speed, now the Senator from New Hampshire proposes to pour into his lap during this financial condition of our country an additional $2,325,000 with which he is authorized to build 5 additional torpedo boats. I do not wish to stand in the way—there is no Senator on this floor who does—of any legitimate and necessary appropriation. I was very much impressed by the argument of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who showed us yesterday and the day before that this country is gradually drifting into a condition of insolvency. I was impressed by the warning words on this side of the Chamber that every instinct of patriotism should prompt us to limit the expenses of the Government to its absolute necessities until we have revenue enough to pay its running expenses.

The Senator from New Hampshire says to the Senator from Maryland, "It is true you have made a great saving; you have saved us $10,000,000." We are already spending lavishly. We are building two battle ships, which the Senator from New Hampshire tells us are liable to be run into and sunk any day by torpedo boats. Nevertheless, we are building two, and now we are asked, in the face of our present financial condition, to appropriate $4,000,000 for additional torpedo boats, with seven torpedo boats now on the stocks and not yet launched. And the Senator from New Hampshire says to the Senator from Maryland, "You have saved us $10,000,000." Now, we will just take out $2,000,000, $4,000,000 in all for torpedo boats; and then the delightful spectacle is presented to the country of the Senator from Maryland having saved us $8,000,000.

If it be a fact that the Government during the present Administration has issued $262,000,000 of its obligations; if it is true, and no Senator on this floor has presumed to deny it, that the Government has run behind in its expenditures over its receipts during this Administration $139,000,000; if it be true, and no Senator has ventured to dispute it, that this country is marching on to the issue of additional bonds and that no power under heaven can stop it, then I ask what spirit of patriotism can animate us if we put upon the necks of the people interest-bearing securities that we may build 20 additional torpedo boats to cruise around our harbors?

Mr. President, if bonds are to be issued year after year what need have we of torpedo boats? Our country will present no glittering attractions to other countries. We will have enough to do to sustain the people, overtaxed and overburdened, who live within our own boundaries. No, Mr. President, our love of display and the spirit of competition will not justify this expenditure, for which the people must pay in added burdens year after year. If any Senator will tell me that every dollar we put into new ships does not mean the absolute certainty of additional bonds saddled on the people of the United States, I shall be glad to sink my individual judgment and to vote for additional boats. But if that be a fact, Mr. President, then I say that every instinct of patriotism as well as every duty of statesmanship requires us to forego something of our national vanity and to let our ships, already creditable, stand as a sufficient Navy until the Government is put back upon a paying basis where its receipts equal its expenditures.

Mr. President, this country is reasonably safe. We have been indulging in great hopes of conquest and, it inevitably follows, the construction of an enormous Navy. It was the theory of this Government that we were strong in peace; that we were a united and a happy and a prosperous people; that we interfered not in the affairs of our neighbors; that we proposed to protect our own integrity and our own autonomy at all hazards and under all circumstances, but that we would not interfere in the concerns of our neighbors. Our ships were to be used for purposes of discovery and for the spread of peaceful commerce. That was the theory upon which our Navy was constructed. Every additional warship, every additional cruiser, every additional battle ship but inspires the natural and inevitable love of competition in the minds of a free and progressive people, and is sure to instill the desire that we engage in some war of conquest or aggression in order that we may show that our ships are as strong and as able and our seamen as brave as those of any other nation whose ships sail the sea.

The unfortunate incident as to Venezuela seems for the moment to promise peaceful solution. The wise policy which the Administration appears to have pursued up to this time has apparently avoided the danger of any immediate collision with Spain. The Maybrick incident revived by a resolution solemnly offered in this Senate calling for her release seems to have passed without threatening danger of war, and under these circumstances it occurs to me that with 2 battle ships appropriated for, 7 torpedo boats on the stocks that have not yet been launched, and a bill reported by the committee containing provision for 15 additional torpedo boats, we can get along without 5 additional torpedo boats which are to require the issuance of Government bonds to the extent of $4,000,000 to pay for them.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I think there is no danger that this nation will embark on a policy of aggression and conquest. I do not recall a single person entitled to be called a statesman or ambitious to be a statesman who supposes it to be possible to lead our people into such a course of action. There is no country which we desire to seize and annex. A large part of what we have annexed from foreign countries during our history has been paid for in hard cash, even though we had first whipped the enemy.

But it is absolutely ludicrous to talk about our undertaking a war of aggression against naval powers, either with the Navy we have now or with one that is proposed by anybody. It is because we wish to make a reasonable attempt to guard our own shores, and to be able to repel, to delay, attack by hostile fleets that we desire a Navy, for the Navy is the outer guard that can delay the advance of transports and other ships coming to us until the various forts can be put in the best possible condition of defense.

Just now I say we are shamefully deficient in that which belongs to a nation of our power and with our enormous seacoast. I hear again and again the idea advanced that we are under no necessity whatever of providing ourselves with additional defenses, or that "an expenditure of five or ten or fifteen million dollars is foolishly extravagant." It is said that "nobody wants to attack us. Nobody will make war on us. We are safe. Our defense is in the hearts of the people," as if the heart were not an organ particularly susceptible to injury. The good will, the valor of a million unarmed, untrained men without great guns on the coasts and without fleets are nothing. I repeat, as I have quoted heretofore, what Wellington said, that such a people are only food for cannon. The Senator says are we going on for a series of years with a deficient revenue and continually running in debt and issuing bonds. He seems to contemplate a continuance of Democratic Administration.

Mr. WOLCOTT. No. Let me tell the Senator what I do fear, a continuance of gold monometallism, which is even more disastrous to the country. I should like to ask the Senator while he is on his feet if he knows how many millions this bill appropriates, and if in his opinion additional torpedo boats will not require the issuance and sale of Government bonds to pay for them?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know just how soon they may be built or when the Secretary of the Navy may think it wise to avail himself of the power to make the contracts and payments. But if he will make the day of payment some eighteen months hence I have strong hopes that we will have laws that will soon provide a surplus and a reduction of the debts we have already incurred.

The pretense that we are in no danger is provoking and aggravating. You gentlemen know that eighty-four years ago to-day a British admiral and a British general took seats in the House of Representatives and put to a vote before a mob of British soldiers the question whether this harbor of Yankee democracy should not be burned, and the Capitol was burned and many other buildings—indeed, all the prominent offices of the Government. The dockyard was burned to save it from the enemy. The navy-yard was burned, the War Office was burned, the Treasury was burned, the White House was burned, the ropewalk was burned, and various buildings that might be supposed to be useful and many private houses were burned. The "hearts" of the people that were to defend the country ran through this town, as ordered by the general commanding—before firing a shot in the suburbs of the city—and retreated through Washington and Georgetown; and the best that General Winder, in command of the forces, could do was to suggest that they should fill the windows of the Capitol with rifle-men, and the others should stand out and shoot a while. But he got scared before the firing and ordered a retreat.

Just where the President of the United States spent that day history does not tell us; but at night his wife, who almost alone of all the people in Washington gained real glory on that day, met him on the shore of the river, where a boat was ready, and it took them over to Virginia. They found a refuge in some country hotel. They abandoned that and hid in the woods. Is it possible for imagination to conceive of deeper national degradation than all that? And yet three or four or five days before the troops were here members of the Cabinet said there was no danger, that Cockburn and his officers were not after Washington, which was a mere provincial village, and that Baltimore was the object of attack.

I do not dwell upon the details. A half hour might profitably be spent in showing the gentlemen who think we are always ready to repulse any enemy how wretchedly and ignominiously we failed then. Four thousand regular troops would have prevented that calamity. We had 6,000 troops here, of whom 2,300 were Maryland militia, and Maryland militia have been capable, after training, of performing some of the most brilliant deeds of valor in the Revolution and afterwards. But the President or the Secretary of War forbade calling them into service before they should appear.

The whole chapter exhibits idiotic management. We shall not repeat it; at least I hope not. We had only 300 regular troops and several hundred of Barney's sailors and marines, who made a gallant defense at one time against the approach of the enemy. Four thousand regular troops, I say, would have saved us that chapter. There were 4,000 against us, many of whom were veterans of Wellington's command.

I forbear to dwell upon it, but I say that the supreme duty of an American Congress is to put the nation in a reasonable condition of defense. By improving the fortifications and enlarging the fleet I know—I say I know it as much as any man can know such a thing—that this Congress will touch the hearts of the American people. They are American all over, in their pride, in their desire that our honor shall be maintained under all circumstances, and the persons who evade our duty—I make no specific charges—but the people who show timidity, who refuse to come up to this popular sentiment, will find that the people of the country are chilled toward them.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], who always desires accurate information, did not mean to mislead the Senate in regard to what he said about the torpedo boats. There are no estimates from the Secretary of the Navy with regard to torpedo boats. Estimates, I think, are never given for propositions of authorization. The Secretary recommends what he thinks ought to be authorized; but when he requests authorization he does not furnish an estimate. I have his recommendation before me; and, as Senators well know, it is for 2 battle ships and 12 torpedo boats. In the hearing before the House committee the Secretary may have made a statement as to the cost of torpedo boats, but he furnished no estimate. Since the Secretary made that statement—since his report, certainly—the English torpedo boat Desperate has reached the high speed of over 30 knots; and it becomes necessary for us to attain with our boats the same high speed. That necessarily increases the expense.

Mr. President, I called attention yesterday to the sudden explosion of economy directed against the Navy. We have passed a good many appropriation bills here. There are millions in the Indian bill for land, and in other bills millions to build public buildings. We have a river and harbor bill here with millions more, not for national defense, but for national improvement and comfort. The river and harbor bill as reported by the Senate committee has been raised a couple of million dollars, I think. I notice an increase of $400,000 for the harbor of Baltimore alone. But the explosion of economy was against the Navy, against the defense of the country, and not against these other less imperative expenditures. We are told that we must not have ships because we shall be obliged to borrow money.

Mr. President, when we were engaged in defending the country in its great struggle for existence we borrowed every dollar for ships and men. National defense has never been placed on the same level with other expenditures; and yet here it is made the one and only subject for economy. Millions after millions go through, and we have to wait until we come to the ships of the American Navy to learn that we must not spend so much money. This great deficit is to be met, how? It is to be met by cutting off 2 battle ships. A deficit of $130,000,000, or whatever it is, as the Senator from Maryland stated it, is to be met by cutting off 5 torpedo boats and 2 battle ships.

As I said yesterday, it seems to me this is the one place where we should never consider economy. All that we need consider, all that the American Congress should regard in dealing with the question of national defense, is what is required for the proper defense of the nation, both by land and by sea. We do not require a great navy for aggression. No one proposes that this country should enter on a career of aggression or of conquest, but we do need a navy and we do need national coast defenses that shall act as a sure guaranty of peace. When the difficulty as to Venezuela was at a crisis in this country some people were crying out that we should not stand up for the rights of the United States because we were not in a position to resist aggression, because New York was not fortified, because we had not ships enough in case England made war upon us; and now the very same people who used that argument against our taking proper American ground in regard to Venezuela come forward and oppose anything looking to a suitable national defense. It is an argument that can not work both ways. But it is used because these people wish us to be defenseless before foreign nations. That is not the way to maintain peace. Proper national defense is the greatest assurance and guaranty of peace that can be made.

But, Mr. President, as the debate has gone on we have got through the apparent economical opposition and come to the real resistance behind it. The economical opposition is not serious. Every Senator realizes, I know, that this is not a point at which to begin to save money. Behind the economical opposition comes the real opposition, resting on the general policy of not allowing the United States to be placed in a position to take the part that she ought to take in all foreign questions affecting her interests. We are going to settle the Venezuelan question, but surely the lesson which that situation taught us should not be lost. We are also told now that there is no danger of war with Spain. I hope and trust not; but let me say that the Cuban question will not down because gentlemen dislike to speak of it. Everyone reads day after day in the newspapers the hideous atrocities going on in that island. They pile up and pile up from disinterested witnesses, and we sit here with folded hands, while having ample strength to put a stop to it, and yet do nothing.

There are many questions outside the borders of the United States affecting us nearly. There are questions of national defense, like the Isthmian Canal, where we must have a naval force to secure the interests of the United States. If we desire, as I believe we all do, that the United States should take a position becoming a great people in international affairs which concern us closely, and should be able to maintain peace in the Western Hemisphere, which I regard as one great duty of this Republic, I think that the best guardian of peace, the greatest assurance of peace, lies in our being sufficiently defended and protected. With our coast properly defended, with a suitable navy, we need never have a war, and we can control the policy of the two Americas with regard to other nations. It is because a strong navy and suitable coast defenses guarantee the peace of the United States that I favor these appropriations.

Mr. President, after voting millions of appropriations in the other bills, here we are disputing over a couple of million dollars to be devoted to the defense of the country. Let me say that however much the people may deplore a deficit caused by the existing revenue laws, however much they may criticize some of the expenditures made by Congress, the American people, with hardly an exception, will never criticize proper appropriations to defend their cities and to build their fleets.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I have before in the course of my life heard practically the same speeches as those which have been made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I have seen the flag waved all around the Capitol and flying over all the works of industry in the country; and the demands for these appropriations as a matter of course constituted the substantial thing behind the flag on all those occasions.

The Senator from Massachusetts is the foremost statesman in this line. By speech at least he is in favor of the most aggressive policy for the United States. He has announced to-day that he wants a navy and an army so strong that we may become the guardian of all the Republics south of us. He complains that we have attempted to enforce economy upon the naval bill, on an appropriation where he seems to think the honor and the interest and the protection of the country are at stake, and he intimates that those of us on this side of the Chamber who are appealing for economy have permitted large appropriations on other bills to pass without a word.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is not accurate. He is so absorbed in what is termed the jingo policy that he has failed to look at the Treasury or the condition of the appropriation bills. There has not been an appropriation bill that has passed the Senate so far where the appropriations are not necessary to pay the current expenses of the Government under existing law, with the possible exception of the Indian bill. There is not an item in any of them so far as I know that has passed the Senate that is not absolutely necessary for the support of the Government under present laws. Here is the first opportunity for the exercise of economy, where an expenditure is proposed that is not necessary for the support of the Government. Here is the first proposition to go out of the usual line and to increase the appropriations, to make them greater than they have been made at any time since we began the construction of the Navy. Here is a bill containing $51,000,000 as it came to us to support and maintain the Navy, greater by millions than the amount which we appropriated during President Cleveland's first term, when we had no navy and were about to construct one. At that time it was necessary to be liberal in order to enable the Bethlehem Works to establish their great plant and Mr. Carnegie to establish his near Pittsburg. Then we had not a built-up gun of steel in the United States. We could not make a tube for a 6-inch gun or a shaft for a vessel. We were compelled to go abroad to buy all those necessary things. Yet, in building up that magnificent structure, which we created under Harrison's Administration and under Cleveland's Administration, no Secretary of the Navy, no President of the United States, and no man who felt his responsibility to the taxpayers of the Union ever suggested such an appropriation as is contained in the pending bill.

The Senator from Massachusetts complains that we begin to exercise economy here. Here is the first great extravagance that has occurred in this Congress. Here is the first great useless appropriation which has been attempted to be made, running far in advance of the requirements of the country.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] twits us on this side with the fact, or rather intimates, that there is a Secretary of the Navy who is not of his party whom we criticize, and that we want to limit him as to what he should do with the $4,000,000. I know how sensitive the Secretary of the Navy is upon this point. I know he feels as if he has been too carefully dealt with. I know personally that he has resented the same course which I pursued a year ago as to the limitation of his power in the amount of money to be expended by him. Weak men, Mr. President, always want power; weak men always want to have both money and men at their command and to deal with them as in their opinion may seem proper. I have dealt, so far as I am concerned, I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire, with this Secretary of the Navy precisely as I dealt with Mr. Whitney when he was Secretary of the Navy and with Mr. Tracy when he was the Republican Secretary of the Navy. There never was an item of appropriation as to which Congress did not determine how much money he should spend for a cruiser or a battle ship. We limited the amount, as we ought to limit it, as to all these items. We limited the amount he was to expend for armor and for guns; we limited the number of men he was to command and to have in service. I have applied this same rule to the present Secretary of the Navy, observing his opposition to that policy with regret, with great regret; for personally I have a high regard for him, he having served upon the Appropriations Committee when he was in the other House. As to his integrity and honesty of purpose I never have had a doubt; but I recognize that when placed in that high position because of the success of the Democratic party, under the rule which has governed that party in its councils in Congress, and in its action as to the Executive branch, there must be some limitation, always a strict limitation, upon the amount of money placed in the hands of any public officer for expenditure.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORMAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to know if the Secretary of the Navy has complained that a greater restraint has been placed on him than has been placed upon other Secretaries of the Navy heretofore?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; to an extent that is true. He has in a statement before the Committee on Appropriations on this very item asked Congress to give him a lump appropriation to do as he pleased with, without regard to the types of torpedo boats to be constructed. I say to my distinguished friend from Mississippi that one year ago, when I stood in this Chamber trying to limit the appropriations on account of the Navy, and when we had succeeded in doing it, in striking off one battle ship, and limiting the other appropriations for the construction of guns in the navy-yards, I had every reason to believe that the Secretary himself, or his assistant, by means of the newspapers, denounced me personally for it. It may have been because some of the officers of the Administration at that time were supposed to be trying to affect the elections in Maryland, that that was the motive for doing it; but the fact remains that no such criticism, to my knowledge, of the action of Senators in attempting to limit appropriations and reduce expenditures has ever occurred under any previous Administration.

Now, we find the spectacle of our friends on the other side of this Chamber, the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and the distinguished Senators from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], coming here to pour out the public treasure and put in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy the amount of $4,000,000, without a limit as to what he shall expend on either one of the boats. I should oppose it whether he were a Democratic or a Republican Secretary of the Navy.

The only time an act of the sort has been done of which I know since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor was when Secretary Tracy came in the last hours of a session and said to the committees, "It is necessary to give me $1,000,000 to enable me to use nickel in the manufacture of steel." There were circumstances connected with that transaction which did not confine his negotiations to our own country; and, as in the case where an appropriation is made for the State Department for foreign purposes, no question was then raised regarding it; but Congress afterwards required and had from the Secretary of the Navy an account of what he did with that million dollars. Otherwise we have limited every Secretary in his expenditures, providing that this vessel should cost so much, or not more than so much, and the other vessel so much, and that the types of boats should be such and such.

What is the reason for it, Mr. President? It is because the naval board of the Navy Department and the great naval officers—for they are great—deserve the thanks of the people of the Union for the skill and enterprise and honesty with which they have conducted that Department. There is a contest between the branches of this service now as to the types of these vessels, and while I am talking a naval board is considering what changes should be made in the plans for the construction of the vessels provided for by this bill. It was only at the last session of Congress that the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], in charge of a similar bill, myself, and others in the Senate had inserted a clause, without the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy and that of the skillful constructors of the Navy, to substitute for these great vessels six composite boats, with sail and with steam, and whilst there was opposition to it by the head of the Navy and whilst some of the bureaus disagreed to it, I venture to say that the action of the National Congress in that matter will save the Government millions of dollars. There is no controversy now as to the wisdom of that action. That was a limitation against the opinion of the head of the Department and against that of the constructors and the great naval officers who sail these ships. The result is that these vessels can be sent to all the coasts south of us, wherever you please, to look after our commerce. They are not vessels of war in the sense of great battle ships, but they can be sailed cheaply and will enable the young men from Annapolis to go on board of them and learn the art of running a vessel under sail without steam power, so that if we capture in time of war a vessel of commerce with sail they can understand the matter of navigation. They were cheap in construction, they are cheap in the cost of maintenance, and will protect our commerce and carry our flag wherever we desire.

The Senator from New Hampshire, when he intimates that there is a desire on my part or, so far as I know, on the part of anybody on this side of the Chamber, to unduly hamper this Secretary of the Navy, or if he thinks so, it is not true. We have placed the same limitations upon his predecessors. Congress has been more liberal with this Secretary of the Navy than with any of his predecessors. He has had the opportunity to make greater contracts and build more ships. Whether he has in all these cases acted wisely remains to be seen. I hope he has. I believe he has been as honest as any of his predecessors.

Mr. SQUIRE. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Maryland that the first question is as to whether this Government desires to have torpedo boats and torpedo destroyers built on a scale compatible with the pretensions of our Government as to its present and prospective naval organization. If that is to be done, then we should exercise proper discretion in doing it.

It appears that the new conditions which exist in great foreign navies, such as the English navy, are now so clear in respect to the character of torpedo-boat destroyers and of the superior class of torpedo boats that we have to meet them, and it is not clear yet at what prices torpedo-boat destroyers having a speed of 30 knots can be constructed in this country. We all saw the statement made by Mr. Jaques in his letter to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], which was quoted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], as to the cost of these new torpedo-boat destroyers and the new torpedo boats in England. We all realize that we can not construct vessels in the United States so cheaply as they can be constructed in England, where the trade of building this class of vessels has been learned, where the Thornycrofts and that class of people are engaged and have been engaged for many years in constructing a superior class of vessels of the torpedo order.

It appears to me that this Congress should allow the Secretary of the Navy some latitude, some discretion. You do that in regard to your battle ships. As was explained the other day, the amount proposed to be appropriated, $3,750,000, was not necessarily all to be used, but it was to be the extreme limit of cost. Perhaps there might be saved $200,000 or $300,000 of that amount, as was the case with the ships contracted to be built at Newport News, and it may be the same as regards these torpedo boats. But in the present condition of the art of constructing torpedo boats, there never having been a single one of the torpedo-boat destroyers constructed or contracted for in this country; there never having been a boat built for torpedo purposes having a record speed of over 24 knots; there never having been one contracted for by the Navy Department upon the plans and specifications of the Department requiring a speed of over 26 knots, and even in the case of the Herreshoff contract, in which that firm has such a large liberty as to drawings and plans, there being a guaranty of only 27½ knots—I say under these circumstances it is right and proper to give to the Secretary of the Navy some discretionary authority, so that if needful to pay $300,000 for a 30-knot torpedo-boat destroyer he can do so under the law.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I agree, of course, that whenever the torpedo boats are ordered that is the effect. The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations limits the amount; but we say to the Secretary of the Navy, "You may construct three of a certain class and the cost per boat shall not exceed a given sum;" and the sum given is more than the Secretary himself estimates. So it is with every other appropriation for every class of vessels contained in this bill.

I am not going to detain the Senate but for a moment. The Senator from Connecticut says we shall have money enough later on; that a year from now we shall probably have another law providing revenue sufficient to support the Government. Mr. President, we have never had a law from the date of the passage of the McKinley bill until now which has given the Government enough money to pay its current expenses and to meet the extraordinary appropriations which have been made by Congress.

I said a few days ago that the Republican party, in control of the other branch of Congress and of the machinery, so far as the committees are concerned, of this body, have permitted these appropriation bills to stand as they came to us, and increased them by inserting items in addition to what we were bound to place upon them for the current expenses of the Government, thereby laying the foundation for and making further increased taxation absolutely necessary, not to meet the deficit of $30,000,000 caused by the decision of the Supreme Court in striking from the last tariff act the tax on incomes, but an increased levy of from sixty to one hundred million dollars a year necessary on account of these extravagant appropriations. When I made the statement as to the amount going out of the Government, which is a charge against the $170,000,000 which is in the Treasury, it was questioned, and it was supposed that possibly I had gone too far. So as to be perfectly accurate about it I have gone to the fountain head to ascertain just what that balance is, and I am certain it will astonish every Senator here when it is stated. On the 1st day of January of this year, just past, without taking into account the $100,000,000 which is due the sinking fund, if it had been kept up from Harrison's time down to now at the rate of forty-nine to fifty million dollars—leaving that matter as not necessary to be accounted for—I will read the balances that have been appropriated for, which are charges upon the Government and which will come against it at some time. I stated a portion of it may lapse into the Treasury, but only a comparatively small amount. Here is the statement:

Statement of balances of appropriations and expenditures (not including the sinking fund) on January 1, 1896.

Civil establishment.....	$55,508,491
Military establishment.....	39,594,500
Naval establishment.....	20,032,236
Indian service.....	38,006,361
Pensions.....	105,108,738
Grand total.....	258,450,326

Mr. GEORGE. On the 1st day of January?
Mr. GORMAN. On the 1st day of January, 1896.
Mr. GEORGE. What was the balance in the Treasury then?
Mr. GORMAN. About $160,000,000, as I recall it. I have not the figures before me, but it was, I think, less than $150,000,000 at that time. It is between $160,000,000 and $170,000,000 now.

Mr. President, part of that money will never be paid out. Part of it is the Indian trust fund, which will be held and the interest paid upon it, and a portion of it on account of pensions will probably never be paid out; but I say, beyond peradventure, $160,000,000 of it must sooner or later go out of the Treasury, whatever may be its condition. Add to that the appropriations we are making here of $520,000,000, with only an estimated revenue of $450,000,000, and then $84,000,000 of contracts, and I leave it to Senators to determine whether or not it is wise to make this appropriation at this time. If you do make it, I can predict that the statement of the Senator from Connecticut will be more than verified, that one year from now you must tax the people of this country $100,000,000 a year in addition to that which they are now paying or issue more Government bonds.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President—
Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to make a suggestion before he goes on?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.
Mr. CHANDLER. It has been agreed that at 2 o'clock we should proceed under the five-minute rule. Fifteen minutes have been accorded to my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] to speak upon a special subject, and it has also been agreed that we should close this bill to-day. Mr. President, I hope that Senators will confine themselves hereafter, as far as possible, to the discussion of the particular amendments which may be pending to the bill; otherwise we shall find ourselves lacking in time and heavily burdened at the close of the day.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has a special interest in his amendment, that the pending amendment be laid aside temporarily, and then the Senator can introduce his amendment and make his fifteen-minute speech upon it. Then, if we can get a vote upon his amendment, we will get it or debate will go on under the five-minute rule after that. That will enable the Senator from New Hampshire, who last night waived his objection to the unanimous agreement, to get the fifteen minutes he desires, as I said to him that I would try to get him the opportunity to speak before 2 o'clock. That will give any Senator the opportunity afterwards of speaking under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Is that agreeable to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALL. I have but very few words to say, and then I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire. What I have to say will not cause him any serious delay, probably not more than five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has the floor.

Mr. HALE. Of course I can not take the Senator from the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that my colleague go on after the Senator from Florida finishes.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Maine thinks it is very important to have his fifteen minutes I will accord it to him.

Mr. HALE. It is not I. I do not want it. It is the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CALL. Or the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. I would like the Senator from New Hampshire to have an opportunity of making his remarks, as I promised it last night.

Mr. CALL. I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire for fifteen minutes. It is understood that I shall have the floor again, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.
The SECRETARY. After line 19, on page 21, it is proposed to insert:

Dry dock, Portsmouth, N. H.: For construction of a dry dock at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard of such size, design, and material as may be determined by the Secretary of the Navy, $200,000, $100,000 of which shall be immediately available.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the amendment that I have offered is in these words:

For construction of a dry dock at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, of such size, design, and material as may be determined by the Secretary of the Navy, $200,000, of which $100,000 shall be immediately available.

To that amendment I desire to speak briefly.

Mr. President, I have listened attentively to the discussion concerning the building of battle ships, and while I have always cheerfully voted for liberal appropriations for increasing the Navy I am strongly of the opinion that it is of far greater consequence that we have additional dry docks than additional battle ships. The bill we are considering, as it came from the House of Representatives, provides for four new battle ships, the cost of which will be about $25,000,000. The Senate has voted to reduce the number to two; but he would be a rash man indeed who flattered himself that the amendment will be adhered to in conference. These large appropriations are being made for battle ships in face of the fact that there are only three dry docks in the entire country in which our largest vessels can be accommodated. The simple statement of that fact ought to be sufficient to turn the attention of Congress in the direction of making liberal appropriations for the immediate construction of one or more modern docks of sufficient capacity to meet the requirements of the largest vessels of our Navy. Believing this, I propose to make a brief appeal for the construction of a dock at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, the most northerly naval station on the Atlantic coast. Such a dock will cost only about one-tenth that of a modern battle ship, and yet in this bill it is proposed to appropriate money for four huge battle ships, while no provision is made for the building of a dry dock in any part of the country.

Mr. President, twice or three times since I have been a member of this body an amendment providing for the construction of a dry dock at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard has been added by the Senate to a similar bill to the one now under consideration only to meet a coup de grâce at the hands of the conference committee, and now it is suggested that the amendment which I have just offered will be ruled out on a point of order. It is quite as well that it should be disposed of in that way as to be killed by the Senate conferees tamely agreeing to drop it from the bill in conference; so that it really matters little to me how it is disposed of if, as I understand, the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations have determined that no appropriations for new dry docks shall be made this year.

This determination I greatly regret, believing, as I do, that every consideration of wise public policy demands that a modern dry dock be immediately constructed at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard. It strikes me that there is no excuse for longer delaying this work; the only reason for which that I have heard advanced, except that the Treasury is practically bankrupt, being that as certain other points are clamoring for appropriations for the same purpose, there must be an adjustment of the rival claims before anything can be done for any one of them. This argument if persisted in will inevitably result in the abandonment of Portsmouth as a naval station, as it is quite improbable that an agreement outside of Congress will ever be reached as to where dry docks shall be located. For instance, our neighboring State of Massachusetts not only asks and will receive a million and a quarter of dollars or thereabouts to improve the harbor of Boston, but she also insists that the Portsmouth Navy-Yard shall be neglected until a large sum of money shall be expended on the dry dock at Charlestown. New Hampshire approves of and will aid to secure the appropriation for Boston Harbor, but New Hampshire will never agree that the Charlestown Navy-Yard shall be built up by appropriations from the public Treasury at the expense of the Portsmouth Yard.

Mr. President, on the 21st day of January, 1892, I spoke at considerable length on the subject of a dry dock at Portsmouth, dwelling especially on the fact that the old floating dry dock at that station, which was built in 1851, was going to decay, and that it ought to be replaced by a modern dock. To-day I will briefly give the reasons why this much-needed improvement should be provided for at once, and be built at the earliest possible day. Well did the Portsmouth Daily Evening Post of March 24, 1892, editorially say, and I commend the utterance to my associates here to-day:

There is here no natural obstacle to the fulfillment of every requirement of a first-class yard, while there are scores of reasons why it should rank, in extent and quality of equipment, with the best in the land. It is landlocked, and approached through a capacious harbor of refuge. It has an inshore depth of water at all points, and at all tides and seasons, wherein any ship in the world may ride at will. Its waters have never frozen and are freer from destructive effect upon wood or metal than any other maritime waters in the world.

It is the northernmost naval station on the Atlantic Coast; its climate has restored to health the most pronounced invalid and crushed out infection from fever-laden ships from southern stations times without number. Its mechanics are among the first in the land, and their handiwork has challenged and does challenge that of the civilized world.

It stands to-day a monumental interrogation point before the honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled, demanding a recognition of its unparalleled advantages.

Mr. President, the question of providing sufficient docking facilities for the ships of our new Navy is one which has not received anything like the attention and consideration which would seem necessary when its vital importance is fully understood. We have built during the last twelve years, or have in process of construction, counting all classes, large and small, excepting tug-boats, 61 vessels, and only six docks have been built to provide for their necessary repair and preservation, and the four docks (not counting the old floating dock at Portsmouth) which we possessed previous to that time are only available for the smaller classes of our modern ships. All of these ships, except the six small gunboats recently contracted for, have unsheathed steel bottoms, and it is absolutely necessary for their preservation that they shall be docked for cleaning and painting at stated intervals, besides which it frequently becomes necessary to make repairs to the under-water portions of ships, thus occupying the docks for considerable periods of time to the exclusion of other ships which may need cleaning and painting only.

All maritime nations in modern times have recognized this necessity. England and France, with their limited coast line, possess, respectively, 43 and 34 dry docks, and both nations are constantly adding to the number. There are now completed at the Portsmouth (England) dock yard 18 docks, and several more are in process of construction or projected. They range from 200 to 650 feet in length, and some of them are capable of accommodating ships drawing 40 feet of water—a contingency which may easily arise in the case of ships damaged in action. Only two of our naval stations are provided with more than one dock—Norfolk having two and New York three, one of which is still uncompleted. One of our important naval stations has no docking facilities at all worthy of the name, for the antiquated wooden-balance dock at Portsmouth is long past its usefulness, and, while it was large enough for the majority of the ships of its day, it would accommodate very few of our modern ships, even if it were serviceable. Considering the natural advantages which this station possesses for the construction of basin docks, it seems strange indeed that the construction of one at least has yet to be authorized. An old waterway exists between the two portions of the yard, which is too shallow to float any ships in its present condition and has to be bridged over for communication. This could be closed and the entire length of it occupied by basin docks. The existing channel would largely reduce the amount and cost of excavation necessary, and there would be ample depth of water at the entrance to accommodate the largest ships.

The Portsmouth Yard is the oldest of our building naval stations. Its natural advantages for this purpose attracted attention almost with the first settlement of the country, and as early as 1690 the frigate Falkland, of 54 guns, was built here for the British navy. The sloop of war Bedford followed in 1697, and the frigate America in 1749. At the breaking out of the Revolutionary war the site of the present navy-yard was tendered to the Continental Congress by its owner for naval purposes, and as early as March, 1776, the construction was commenced of the frigate Raleigh, of 32 guns. So rapidly was the work carried on that she was launched on the 21st of May, in just sixty days from the time her keel was laid. She was built under the act of Congress of December 13, 1775, authorizing the building of "13 sail of cruisers," and she rendered distinguished and brilliant service during the naval operations of the Revolutionary war. The next ship built here was the sloop of war Ranger, which was probably the first ship which bore the new national ensign to Europe. The next ship to be built here was the 74-gun ship America, which was, in her time, the heaviest ship yet laid down on the continent after which she was named. She was presented to the French Government before she was launched as a token of gratitude, to replace the French 74-gun ship Magnifique, which was lost by an accident in Boston Harbor.

The site of the navy-yard was purchased by the Government for naval purposes October 1, 1800, and work was at once commenced on its development. The first commandant was Capt. Isaac Hull, who took command of the navy-yard April 3, 1813. In March, 1814, the keel of the 74-gun ship Washington was laid here, the port being closely blockaded by the British at the time. She was launched in July, 1815, shortly after the conclusion of peace. From this time until the 14th of June, 1839, when the sloop of war Preble was launched from the new ship house, little of any importance was done in the way of shipbuilding, but preparations in the way of facilities for future shipbuilding were actively under way and began to show a result. The Preble, which did good service until she was burned by the Confederates at Pensacola, was followed immediately by the frigate Congress, the keel of which ship was laid August 16, 1841. This was a fine ship of 1,867 tons; 190 feet long by 50 feet beam; a very large ship for her day. She had a fine record, having made six long cruises in most of the waters of the world between 1842 and 1859. Her career was ended in Hampton Roads March 8, 1862, when she was burned in action with the Confederate ironclad Merrimac. The sloop of war Portsmouth, a fine ship, which was in service until very recently, was built and launched here in 1843. The first steam vessel built at the yard was the side-wheel steamer Saranac, the keel of which ship was laid in May, 1847. She was in active service throughout the civil war, and was finally sunk June 1, 1875, by striking a sunken rock near Vancovers Island. The keel of the steam frigate Franklin was laid in 1855, and the old Mohican was launched in February of the same year. In 1861 the Kearsarge and Ossipee were built here, the former being launched October 5, 1861. She sailed from the yard on her first cruise February 5, 1862, having been fitted out to search for and destroy the Confederate cruiser Alabama, which duty she finally performed more than two years later.

During the war the yard was very active, and the list of ships built and fitted out there is a long one. In the years following the war little was done, as at other places. The nation was resting. On the 14th of August, 1870, Admiral Farragut, who was visiting the commandant of the yard, died there. In 1873 work was resumed by the construction of the Enterprise and Essex, but the long building record of the yard closed with them, for no ship has been launched there since, though many have been repaired and refitted. Why the superb facilities of this station have been neglected is a question hard to solve. With a harbor among the best, having water enough for the deepest ships and being never closed by ice, a climate favorable to work at all times of the year, surrounded by a population famed for mechanical ability of the highest order, and with a past shipbuilding record second to none, it would seem as though all the elements existed for the establishment of a great naval station, and it is to be hoped that the nation's opportunity in this regard will not much longer be neglected. But whether shipbuilding is resumed there or not, ship repairing is carried on there, and a suitable dry dock is urgently needed. The old dock has served its purpose and repaid its cost. It was suited to its day, but its day is past.

It should be borne in mind that when the emergency comes the nation will need dry docks and that badly. The lack of them in an emergency will cost us more than the construction of a hundred docks, and in no place can a dock do better service and be more economically constructed than in the time-honored Portsmouth Navy-Yard, for it must be remembered that in event of war the larger portion of our fleet would be concentrated on the coast from Virginia to Maine, the territory embracing all the larger cities, which would become the objective point of the enemy. Dry docks are therefore necessary in the vicinity in order that vessels can be immediately repaired.

In this connection I wish to refer to the opinion of Chief Constructor Philip Hichborn, United States Navy, as contained in his report for the year 1895. He says:

From past experience it is fully realized that steel ships must be frequently docked in order that their bottom plating may be preserved from deterioration, and that the rapid fouling of the bottom may not entail a wasteful expenditure of coal to maintain a moderate rate of speed. But on account of docks being occupied for a long time by vessels under repair, it is sometimes impracticable to dock our cruising vessels as promptly as experience has shown to be advisable.

If such a condition confronts a Department in time of peace, it is easily realized how serious a defect it would prove in time of war, when the casualties of battle and necessity for keeping the bottoms of vessels in such condition that they might develop their highest speed would largely increase the demands on our docking facilities.

The navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H., is especially lacking in docking facilities, and at the present time is the only Government shipbuilding or repair establishment which is not provided with a properly equipped dry dock. In the opinion of this Bureau this is a serious deficiency and should be rectified at an early date. The balanced floating dock at this station has been in service for nearly half a century, and is now not only obsolete, but in such a condition as to make it inadvisable to use it in docking a vessel of even moderate displacement.

There are unusual natural advantages of location at this yard which would greatly reduce the cost of construction of a dock, and the machinery plant in the construction and repair department has been enlarged and modernized, so that all ordinary repairs of steel vessels can now be satisfactorily executed.

The climatic advantages of this station deserve serious consideration in fitting out or repairing vessels which have had a long tour of duty in southern or tropical waters and constitute another argument for the proper equipment of this yard for making all ordinary repairs due to the wear and tear and casualties.

For the above reasons the attention of the Department is respectfully invited to the necessity of providing adequate docking facilities at the Portsmouth (N. H.) Navy-Yard.

Although all the other Government shipbuilding and repair yards are provided with at least one dry dock, they are hardly equal to the present necessities of the service, and must surely prove inadequate to meet the rapidly increasing demands of the fleet—taking account of the vessels in reserve as well as those in active service.

The Bureau is much impressed with the needs of the service in this most important element in the efficiency of our Navy, and begs to urge upon the Department the necessity for immediate action.

That opinion of Constructor Hichborn, admittedly one of the ablest naval officers of the Government, is in the same line of the recommendation of Commodore N. H. Farquhar, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, in his report to the Secretary of the Navy, October 14, 1891, in which he spoke of the dock at the Portsmouth yard as follows:

The balance dry dock at this station requires extensive repairs. It is of wood and has been in constant use for forty years, but as its capacity is not beyond 3,500 tons it is useless for the larger vessels, and therefore I do not recommend that a large sum be expended upon its repairs. If this yard is to be maintained a new dry dock is required. It is believed that by taking advantage of the channel the bottom and sides of which are between the two islands which compose this yard, closing one end and putting a gate at the other, with the necessary pumping machinery, a stone dock capable of docking the largest ships will be obtained at a comparatively small outlay. As this yard with its fine climate is a sanitarium for ships to go after a cruise in the tropics to refit, it is recommended that steps be taken to construct this dock by appropriating $100,000 to commence.

UNITED STATES NAVY YARD, PORTSMOUTH, N. H.

In the History of the United States Navy-Yard at Portsmouth, N. H., by Rear-Admiral George Henry Preble, it is related that in 1782, toward the close of the war of the Revolution, the Marquis of Chastellux, who was then visiting Portsmouth, noted in his journal the following:

There is every appearance of its [i. e., Portsmouth] becoming to New England what the other Portsmouth is to the old; that is to say, that this place will be made choice of as the depot of the Continental marine. The access to the harbor is easy; the road is immense, and there are 7 fathoms of water as far up as 2 miles above the town; add to this that, notwithstanding its northern situation, the harbor of Portsmouth is never frozen, an advantage arising from the rapidity of its current.

One hundred and fourteen years have come and gone since that was written, and note the sequel. Portsmouth in Old England has 18 dry docks, with more in process of construction, while Portsmouth in New England is begging for an appropriation for a single dock, which is persistently, if not contemptuously, denied to her!

Mr. President, I need not say much more. Congress has heretofore been deaf to the pleas that have been made in behalf of Portsmouth, and the indications are that Congress will be equally deaf to-day. It may be that there will be an awakened interest some time in this historic old town, and that its advantages as a naval station will again attract the attention of our legislators. If any word that I have ever uttered will contribute to that result I will be content, as I am still hopeful that I may live to see the time when New Hampshire's only seaport will again receive the fostering care of the Government, to the end that her mechanics may be employed and the unsurpassed facilities of her navy-yard be utilized in the great and necessarily increasing work of ship repairing and shipbuilding. In my judgment we can not afford to do otherwise than build up this important station, the first requisite of which is a first-class modern dry dock.

In conclusion, let me recapitulate, even at the risk of repetition:

1. The largest and deepest dry dock on the eastern coast of the United States ought to be at Portsmouth, for the depth of water at the entrance to the dock would be no less than $5\frac{1}{2}$ fathoms (33 feet) at low water, and at any other place in its approaches not less than $6\frac{1}{2}$ fathoms, with an average rise of tide of about 8 feet; and there is no bar to delay the entrance of a deep-draft ship at any time. This might be of vital importance in time of war, for a difference of five or six hours might prevent the sinking of one of our battle ships when wounded, if it could be placed in dock immediately.

2. This yard is the only Government shipbuilding and repair establishment which is not provided with a properly equipped dry dock. This is a serious deficiency, and should be rectified at once. The floating dock at this station is nearly fifty years old, and is only safe for a vessel of about 1,200 tons displacement, and it would be of no use for any of our large new vessels.

3. From its geographical situation it would be an important point in a defensive war with another nation possessing a stronger fleet than our own, and every means for quick repairs should be provided there, as well as means of defense to make it a harbor of refuge.

4. There are natural advantages of location there which would reduce the cost of construction. The excavation for the dock is partly made, and the debris excavated could be utilized in filling up the rest of the channel near the dock to make the necessary roadways, instead of carting it away to a distance.

5. The foundation is rock and would never be subjected to the danger of sinking from insecure foundations.

6. The machinery plant in the construction and repair department has been enlarged and modernized, so that all ordinary repairs to steel vessels can be properly executed.

7. The climatic advantages of this station deserve consideration in fitting out or repairing vessels which have had tours of duty in tropical waters or which might unfortunately be stricken with yellow fever. An epidemic could much more easily be managed at Portsmouth than in one of our large cities like Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or Norfolk.

8. One of our largest vessels if chased by an enemy's fleet could enter the lower harbor at any time, while at New York or Boston it might be delayed at the entrance of the harbor by lack of water, and while so waiting be captured.

9. Portsmouth can be entered at all seasons of the year, while all of the other navy-yards, down to and including Norfolk, may be closed by ice, but Portsmouth never is so closed.

10. At all the other navy-yards it is necessary to dock large vessels at about the point of high water; at Portsmouth a dock could be constructed to dock vessels at half tide or with less water even than that.

Mr. President, New Hampshire gets practically nothing out of the vast sums distributed throughout the country by the river and harbor bill. The ten millions directly appropriated and the sixty millions prospectively appropriated in the river and harbor bill of this Congress will go elsewhere than to New Hampshire. Of this we do not complain. We have few streams to improve, but we have a harbor—one of the best in the world—for which we plead, and for which we have pleaded in vain for many long years. Can it be that a plant that has cost $4,000,000 will be permitted to go to decay for want of an appropriation smaller than is frequently made for a public building in some city of the country?

My colleague and I recently made a visit to the Portsmouth Navy-Yard and carefully inspected the plant, taking especial pains to examine the site for the proposed dry dock. As a result of our examination, and believing that it will be valuable for future reference, we have had a diagram made of Portsmouth Harbor, showing the location of the contemplated dock and its surroundings, which, in the absence of objection, I will have inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

Mr. President, I trust that the point of order will not be made against the amendment, but that it will be allowed to become a part of the bill, and that the Senate conferees may see their way clear to insist that it shall remain, to the end that this long-delayed and much-needed improvement may be speedily undertaken. Let us give Portsmouth a dry dock this year, and in the near future Charlestown and Algiers can be provided for. This is a plain business proposition which ought to commend itself to every member of this honorable body.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President—

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to raise a question of order upon the amendment unless the Senator from New Hampshire desires to discuss it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to say a word on the pending amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I reserve the right to make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to say that I concur fully in all that has been said by my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] in behalf of an appropriation for a dry dock at Portsmouth, N. H. I thank my colleague for having so carefully investigated the question and for the full and complete and, as I think, conclusive exposition which he has made.

I regret, Mr. President, that a controversy between localities as to the erection at those localities of additional dry docks and an assumed necessity growing out of the condition of the Treasury are likely to prevent an appropriation for a dock at the Portsmouth yard at the present session. I hope that at no very distant period an appropriation may be made and the Portsmouth yard may be given a dock which will make that yard one of the finest and best yards in the world.

I ask that there may be inserted in my remarks the joint resolution of the city councils of the city of Portsmouth, passed on the 26th day of March, 1896, setting out the desire of Portsmouth for the construction of a dock and the advantages to the public to be gained by such construction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). In the absence of objection, the paper will be inserted in the RECORD.

The paper referred to is as follows:

In the year 1896. Joint resolution of the city councils of the city of Portsmouth.

Whereas Portsmouth Harbor and the Piscataqua River seem to have been designed and created by nature for the purpose of commerce, navigation, and as a birthplace for a mighty navy; and

Whereas, by the entire freedom, even in the severest winters, from ice which the Piscataqua River and Portsmouth Harbor enjoy, free ingress to and egress from said harbor and river are to be had at all seasons of the year; and

Whereas said river and harbor are broad, deep, safely navigable, and afford ample shelter for a large fleet of battle ships, where the anchorage and holding grounds are perfect; and

Whereas the water in the harbor and in the river to the United States navy-yard at Kittery, and for miles in the river above the navy-yard, is deep enough, at every stage of the tide and at all seasons of the year, to float the largest ships ever constructed: It is therefore

Resolved by the city councils of the city of Portsmouth, That the Senators and Representatives representing the State of New Hampshire in the national Congress be, and hereby are, invited and requested to use their utmost influence to secure the passage of the bill now pending appropriating a sum of money for the construction, by the Government of the United States, of a dry dock at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the city clerk to each Senator and Representative from New Hampshire.

Passed the common council March 26, 1896.

JOHN K. BATES, President.

Passed the board of mayor and aldermen March 26, 1896.

WILLIAM O. JUNKINS, Mayor.

Mr. COCKRELL. I make the point of order that the proposed appropriation is not estimated for by any Department and not recommended by any committee. It would place the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate in conference in a very bad position. It would be impossible to hold an amendment so placed upon the bill against the objections of the members of the conference on the part of the other House. I hope the point of order will be sustained.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the Chair rules upon the point of order, I desire simply to state that in two previous Congresses the Committee on Naval Affairs have reported an amendment recommending an appropriation for a dry dock at Portsmouth. It is true that in the present Congress the amendment, which was submitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, has not been reported back, and I do not contend that the amendment is in order under the rules of the Senate. I had, however, hoped that the point of order would not be made against it.

Mr. COCKRELL. We are forced to do it simply because there are a number of other applications for dry docks, and we could not possibly discriminate, as the Committee on Naval Affairs had made no recommendation in regard to any of them, and we simply excluded them all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ground upon which the point of order is made being admitted, the Chair sustains it.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a moment,

I will state that I had contemplated offering an amendment to the bill requiring one of the battle ships to be built at Portsmouth, Va., where there is not only a dry dock, but where there are most ample facilities for constructing almost any work that the Government might desire. I doubt very much the policy which predominates in the pending bill of giving out those vessels to private contracts. In fact, I think it would be better if a portion of them at least were built at the navy-yards which the Government has constructed at such great expense. But I have not thought it advisable to attempt to put an amendment upon the bill, because I have been advised by those who have it in charge of the objections which would be urged to it, and I did not wish to consume the time of the Senate in what seemed to me to be a vain and useless endeavor.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, I wish to make the same statement as has just been made by the Senator from Virginia in respect to the dry dock at Algiers, in the State of Louisiana. Several commissions of naval officers have heretofore reported in favor of Algiers as the proper place for the erection of a dry dock for the convenience of the Gulf coast; but having understood that it was the policy of those in charge of the appropriation bills in the Senate that none of the propositions for dry docks would be permitted to go upon the naval appropriation bill, my colleague [Mr. CAFFERY] and myself have not thought proper to make the vain attempt of having an amendment to that effect adopted on the pending bill. However, we wish now to give notice that at the next session we intend to press the appropriation for the construction of a dry dock at Algiers, in Louisiana.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, reverting now to the amendment proposing $4,000,000 for 20 torpedo gunboats, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats—

The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 2 o'clock p. m.). The Chair will state, before the Senator from New Hampshire proceeds, that by agreement yesterday the bill will now be open to amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand that from this time on the debate is to proceed under the five-minute rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. VILAS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire oblige me by stating how long it requires to build one of these torpedo boats? Within what time under a fair exigency could one be constructed?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President—

Mr. SQUIRE. I can answer the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PEPPER. I rise to a question of order. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. PEPPER, providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that we may proceed with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair, 2 o'clock having arrived, to enforce the rule which was established by the agreement yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has announced that the debate will now proceed in accordance with the agreement of yesterday, and the Chair has recognized the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. I dislike to undertake to answer technical questions of the kind asked me by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], because I may be much out of the way. My impression is that any one of these largest gunboats might be built by contract in a year or a year and a half. Some of the smaller boats might be built in less than a year. I suppose there are half a dozen or perhaps ten establishments in the United States that can compete in public competition for the construction of these 20 boats. The more establishments there are to compete and to build the more rapidly I assume the torpedo boats could be constructed.

I would not be unwilling to be put in the attitude of voting to intrust more discretion to the Secretary of the Navy in the building of torpedo boats than the Senator from Maryland is. It would be perhaps a singular sight to see the Senator from Maryland, a distinguished leader of the political party which has placed the Secretary of the Navy in his present position, showing distrust of that officer. It might be equally surprising to see a radical Republican Senator willing to give him more discretion. How that comes about I will not undertake to say; but I say in reply to the Senator from Maryland that I do not think he will conceive that too much discretion is given to the Secretary. Under the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives there are to be 5 boats at a speed of 26 knots, to cost in all not exceeding $800,000, and 10 other boats to have the highest practicable speed for vessels of their class, to cost not exceeding $500,000. There is the limit as to the 15 boats that we find in the bill as it was passed by the other House.

The limitation which I put in my amendment is simply that the Secretary of the Navy shall take $4,000,000; that with that $4,000,000 he shall construct 20 torpedo boats or torpedo gunboats—that is to say, at an average price of $200,000; and that the larger boats shall attain a speed of 30 knots and the smaller boats attain a speed of 26 knots. It seems to me that here are sufficient limitations. Here are all the limitations which ought to be imposed. Senators ought to be willing to intrust that much discretion to the Secretary of the Navy. If there was no provision as to the number of ships and no condition as to the speed of the torpedo boats there might be objection. It would not do, I admit, to say to the Secretary of the Navy, "Take $4,000,000 and build as many torpedo boats as you choose, and build them with just such speed, high or low, as you choose." But here is a safe, proper, judicious, and effective limitation, and I can not conceive that any Senator who is willing to vote to increase the authority to build torpedo boats will be unwilling to vote for the amendment as thus limited.

In reply to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], who said certain estimates had been made by the Secretary of the Navy which were not being conformed to by the committee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has shown that no estimates have been submitted by the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy simply recommended the construction of 2 battle ships and at least 12 torpedo boats. The House of Representatives concluded to appropriate for 4 battle ships and 15 torpedo boats. The Senate has stricken out 2 battle ships, bringing the appropriation down to the number recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, and it is now proposed by this amendment to construct, instead of 15 torpedo boats, 20 torpedo boats. But, Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER. One word, by unanimous consent. The appropriation is increased in order that we may get larger and better torpedo boats.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words upon the pending amendment.

The arguments of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] demand that we shall reduce all the appropriations, stop the public buildings, cut off the salaries, stop everything. If this country is bankrupt, if it is in serious financial distress, the proposition to cut off two or four million dollars upon the arguments made is insignificant, and is a conclusion that does not result.

Again, the proposition that there is no form of the public credit that can be properly used except bonds with interest payable in gold is another untenable proposition. Are we to stop the employment of labor? Is the public credit, which is the most important factor in the whole world in all financial enterprises, to be used only in the form of gold-interest bonds? I heard the other day that in the New York World recently there was a statement that the Rothschilds—less than 40 men—had accumulated within the last few years over $20,000,000,000. Did they have it? We know that was a myth. We know it was the public credit of the nations of the world and the pledged taxpaying power in bonds drawing interest.

Mr. President, if we need any measures for the public interest, if we need public buildings, if we need a navy, if we need an army—if these are objects of public utility the proposition that this country is bankrupt is entirely untenable. It is the richest country in the world, whether in accumulated wealth or in the wealth that belongs to the people generally.

If the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Colorado desire to lessen the burden of oppressive taxation, let them stop taxation by corporate powers, by trusts and syndicates, which, where there is one dollar collected by the Government, collect ten from the people.

That is the point of view in which the policy of taxation should be attacked, not that which looks to the preservation of the Government and the public defense. This country is the richest country in the world, and if the Senator from Maryland is right he should be here demanding that Congress shall prolong its session that revenue may be supplied. Where is the trouble with a tax on beer, a tax on spirits, a tax on tobacco, a tax on luxuries, on accumulated wealth? The resources of the United States are unlimited, and if there are errors of public policy, it is the business of Congress to correct them. If there are errors in the existing law, it is the business of the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Colorado to propose to correct them, not to speak of financial embarrassments which are the result of our own negligence and our own fault.

Mr. President, if I had it in my power I would issue the public credit of the United States in the form of Treasury notes or silver coin, and I am confident that every appropriation in the pending bill would be gladly accepted in the form of the public credit of the United States in the shape of circulating notes payable at the will of the Government. Why should it not be so? Why, sir, the credit of this country is the most valuable property in the world. It is the most secure Government in the world. The proposition of the Senator from Colorado is that the people of the United States are to take no part in the great measures of public policies that look to the advancement of the people, the comfort of the great masses of the people, the employment of the unemployed, the general distribution of comfort and prosperity, but that we are to be confined to the mere question whether some Administration has administered the finances of the Government in the wisest manner, and whether it is subject to the severest censure and condemnation. This is not a question for the Senate, but it is a subject which imperatively demands our attention, not only that we shall supply adequate volume, but also that we shall not stifle and embarrass and hinder the enterprise and energy and thrift of the people, and also that we shall not fail to use the public credit in such method as will least injure and benefit most largely the people.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the little I have to say, perhaps, can be better said at this point than at another during the discussion of the bill.

I am opposed to the increase of our Navy beyond what is provided for under existing laws. I think that the true policy of the United States is to maintain peaceful relations with all its neighbors beyond the sea as well as with those immediately adjoining us. I do not believe that we are in danger of collision with any nation in any part of the world either now or in time to come, and that the only danger with which we are threatened is in our own midst, if there be any danger.

I am willing to make large appropriations for the improvement of our harbors and our rivers and the opening up of our public lands, the building of highways, railroads, reservoirs for storing water, canals and aqueducts for the transportation of water, and the division of public lands into small geographical areas in order to make homes for the people; in other words, to develop our latent resources, to get the people at work at home, to build school-houses and churches and railways, and in all other respects develop the resources with which a bountiful Providence has blessed us.

In addition to that, I do not believe that the millennium has quite reached us, or that it has even approached within sight. The war spirit among nations has not entirely subsided. There may possibly be danger in the future; we do not know what will arise. I would have no objection to the construction of coast defenses and the manning and equipping of them for the purpose of defending our interior.

The interests of the American Republic are all bound up in the little word "peace"; peace with all the world, peace among ourselves. With our Northern neighbors, our Canadian friends, we shall some day be united in eternal wedlock. Our railways now pass across both of the countries; their people are becoming assimilated. Some of ours are going beyond the border and some of theirs are coming to this side in order to help one another. Our railways are now piercing the Mexican Republic, and it will not be many years until Canada and Mexico and the United States of America will be one great nation, if we will only pursue a peaceful policy among ourselves.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to suggest to him that the exception he makes in connection with the proper defense of the country ought to induce him to vote for the 20 torpedo boats, for they are purely defensive?

Mr. PEPPER. Oh, Mr. President, torpedo boats are made for the purpose of running out into the waters on the outside and destroying the commerce of the enemy, if we should happen to have any—

Mr. CHANDLER. They are for defense.

Mr. PEPPER. Or the battle ships of the enemy. It is in the line of war spirit.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is purely defensive.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am influenced in the vote I shall give on this question not by any want of confidence in the Secretary of the Navy, but solely by the fact that we are in no condition to build any greater number of vessels than are actually demanded by the exigencies of the country. I do not anticipate any war, and I am decidedly in favor of a strong, comparatively small increase of the Navy. The proposition now made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], it seems to me, ought not to be supported at this time. The House of Representatives have provided in the bill for the increase of the Navy to the extent of 5 torpedo boats, 4 seagoing coast-line battle ships, and 10 torpedo boats, the 10 torpedo boats to cost $500,000.

It seems to me we ought to go no further. There is no occasion for entering upon the enlargement of the Navy to any undue extent. There is nothing in the signs of the times, there is nothing in the condition of our foreign and domestic relations, that demands any haste. There is no danger of a war with any country at present; and although the increase of the Navy might be conducted properly and efficiently, so as to have a navy strong enough to defend our coasts, I would not now enter upon that course further than is absolutely necessary.

Since the Committee on Appropriations have provided for a reduction of the number of torpedo boats (and the Senate has already determined upon building only two seagoing coast-line battle ships) I think we ought to stand by the Committee on Appropriations. I shall therefore vote for no increase whatever that is proposed in respect to the Navy beyond the limits fixed in the bill. I think the Committee on Appropriations were very wise in reducing the number of torpedo boats. They can be easily and quickly built in case of exigency. They can be built within a year, according to the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. There is, therefore, no pressing necessity for entering upon their construction now. I am always reminded that we have an insufficient revenue to carry on the Government. It has been shown by the vote already taken in the Senate that this body is opposed to any additional taxes. It is opposed to an increase of public revenue in that way, while it is conceded on all hands, by the Secretary of the Treasury as well as others who took a more hopeful view of it a while ago, that there will be a deficiency in the revenues this year of about $31,000,000. In that condition of affairs it is not right, it is not just, for the Senate of the United States to provide for greater increase in the Navy. This is a merely permissive authority. It says, "The President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract," etc. It is not mandatory, and in my judgment, if the President acts wisely, he will not exercise the power already given here to build boats unless the signs of the times are more favorable to an increase of revenue.

I think the next Administration to be elected this fall had better be intrusted with any measures that are necessary to enlarge the Navy, and it will also be prepared, no doubt, whatever party may prevail in this country, to provide additional revenue. Until that is done I think all works of any kind or any description whatever, all the appropriations contained in the river and harbor bill, all the appropriations that depend upon the discretion of the Executive authority ought to be limited, and that we ought not in any case to extend the amount of the appropriations beyond the amount of current revenue. I shall therefore vote against any proposition to increase the number of vessels of any kind whatever to be built. I voted yesterday for the reduction of the number of seagoing coast-line battle ships to 2. I did it entirely for that reason. I should like to see the 4 built, but this is not the time to do it. We should wait until our revenues are sufficient to justify the expenditure.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I propose to take very little of the time of the Committee of the Whole, as there are many amendments to be offered; and I have not, by the way, although the bill has been before the Senate for a full week, taken in all of the time of the committee over twenty minutes.

The other House sends to us a provision for two classes of these boats, in number 15, at a cost of $1,675,000. There are no limitations except as provided in the clause. The last appropriation of $800,000 under the bill as it comes from the House is to be devoted to 10 torpedo boats. That would authorize what I believe would be practically the squandering of this money. It would build little torpedo boats that are obsolete and good for nothing. No other powers build them. In that regard the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] is much better, and it increases the appropriation, not in the large sum that has been stated, but, to be exact, $2,325,000 over the House appropriations, the $4,000,000 being that much more than the House provision.

The amendment sets out each class, into the type of torpedo boats that are now being built by the great nations of the world, with a minimum of 25 or of 30 knots. I doubt whether the 20 boats can be obtained for the $4,000,000, but they can pretty nearly. I do not see any objection if any Senator proposes to say that no one of these boats shall cost more than $375,000. I give that figure because a singularly competent man who has been engaged in the building of naval ships and has had the run lately of the French and English yards informs me that it is these large torpedo boats alone that are being built now. The others are considered creations of the past. I should hope, as the amendment increases the appropriation above the House provision for this class of vessels only $2,325,000, that with some limitation of that kind the amendment would pass. But I do not propose to take any more of the time of the Committee of the Whole, being very desirous that a vote shall be taken, and as other important amendments, in the discussion of which Senators desire to participate, are coming up.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I should like to make a few remarks in respect to this matter. My theory of the true course for the Government to pursue in respect to the Navy is to build such ships as it would require a long time to build, to make such provision as it might in the case of exigency be impossible to make within a limited time, and to leave to the arising of the exigency such action in regard to other matters useful to the Navy as can be thus properly left. What is the object of our now expending millions on smaller vessels like these torpedo boats that can be built in a short time? Before they are built there will be something better devised, and they will be useless. The Government never built a ship which has not become somewhat obsolete. As was stated by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] the other day, not a vessel which has been constructed in our new Navy is now up to date except the very last ones. It seems to me that the course of wisdom is to provide those things for the Navy which can not be done in a hurry and to leave those things which can be done quickly to the occurring of the exigency for them.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] informs me that under one contract for constructing a torpedo boat only ten months are required to build it. I have no doubt such boats could be built, if the occasion required, in four months. If that be true, why build a large number of vessels which may become entirely useless when the occasion arises for them? This is the only suggestion I desire to make. I do not understand that the American people are striving to build a navy to go a-jingling with, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] substantially put it this morning—to equip ourselves with a whinger, in order to become a national swashbuckler in the world.

Mr. GORMAN. I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That not more than $375,000 shall be expended in the construction of any one of said torpedo boats.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] as amended.

Mr. GORMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment be read once more.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Cockrell,	Hill,	Quay,
Allison,	Daniel,	Kyle,	Roach,
Bacon,	Davis,	Lodge,	Sherman,
Baker,	Dubois,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Bate,	Elkins,	Martin,	Squire,
Berry,	Frye,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Blanchard,	Gallinger,	Mitchell, Wis.	Teller,
Brown,	Gear,	Morrill,	Tillman,
Burrows,	George,	Nelson,	Turpie,
Butler,	Gibson,	Pasco,	Vilas,
Caffery,	Gordon,	Peffer,	Walthall,
Call,	Gorman,	Perkins,	Warren,
Cannon,	Hale,	Pettigrew,	White,
Carter,	Hansbrough,	Platt,	Wolcott.
Chandler,	Harris,	Pritchard,
Clark,	Hawley,	Proctor,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire, as amended, upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "each," in line 24, page 50, down to and including the word "dollars," in line 4, page 51, and insert:

Torpedo gunboats and torpedo-boat destroyers with a minimum speed of 30 knots, and torpedo boats with a minimum speed of 23 knots, 20 in number, to cost in all, exclusive of armament, not to exceed $4,000,000: Provided, That not more than $375,000 shall be expended in the construction of any one of said torpedo boats.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAFFERY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. I am informed that he would vote "nay," if present, and I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I transfer my pair to the junior senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE] and vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WALTHALL. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired on this question with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]. I ask that this announcement may apply to all yea-and-nay votes taken during the day.

Mr. CAFFERY. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. Under our agreement either of us is authorized to vote on a question nonpolitical, and I will therefore cast my vote on this question. I vote "yea."

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask the Senator from Georgia to transfer his pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has voted anyhow, and it will make no difference.

Mr. BACON. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. PASCO (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON], with whom I am generally paired, has not voted. I propose a transfer of pairs with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], so that the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will stand paired, and in that way I will let my vote stand. That arrangement will leave the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] free to vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the affirmative). That will permit my vote to stand. I have already voted.

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McBRIDE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Bacon,	Davis,	Hale,	Morrill,

So the amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After line 13, page 7, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and required to pay, immediately, to the patentee the $25,000 appropriated in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1895. Said act providing "for the exclusive rights to and for ordnance appliances now in use on naval vessels and protected and covered by patent No. 533171, said patent being embraced in a contract dated January 23, 1893, and signed by the Secretary of the Navy and the patentee."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask who the patentee is and what the payment is for. We are to be economical.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the amount, and for what is it to be paid?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be read. The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I would say that the Committee on Appropriations examined that matter, but not in time to put it on the bill before it was reported. It was submitted to the Senator from Maine and myself, and we decided to let it go on.

Mr. HALE. It is to carry out a contract.

Mr. TELLER. It is to carry out a contract made with the Government, and to carry out a law of last year.

Mr. HALE. This was a provision made in last year's appropriation act, which has not been paid. The Senator from Colorado and I looked the matter over, and made up our minds that, under the circumstances, the man was entitled to his pay. Let the Secretary read the provision in the last naval appropriation act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated. The Secretary read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to pay, should he consider such payment desirable, for the exclusive rights to and for ordnance appliances now in use on naval vessels and protected and covered by patent No. 533171, said patent being embraced in a contract dated January 28, 1893, and signed by the Secretary of the Navy and the patentee and authorized in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available.

Mr. TELLER. I would say that the patentee is a young man of the name of H. B. Hurst, who is a resident of the State of Mississippi when he is at home.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that a provision of this kind ought to be reported from the Committee on Claims or some committee which has immediate charge of such subjects. It seems this was appropriated for last year and that the Secretary of the Navy did not hold it to be binding upon the Government; at least that is the inference. I think, under the circumstances, we ought not to put a claim of this kind upon an appropriation bill. It is a private claim and could be objected to upon that ground, without putting it upon the broad ground that the money had not been paid by the executive authority, they deciding it not to be a just claim, or at least not paying it. I think we ought not to put it on here. Let it stand like any other private claim, to be referred to the proper committee, reported by them, and then acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it is a private claim. It was on the appropriation bill of last year, and the Secretary, acting in his discretion, did not pay it. The ground taken by the Department, I understand, is that it was discovered, as claimed by the Department, that certain inventions covering the same principle had been made by officers of the Navy Department, and that therefore this was not needed, and was superfluous. The Senator from Colorado and myself did not believe that that was sufficient ground, but the Department thought it sufficient to prevent this man who got the appropriation last year from being paid the money. The whole consideration now about it being a private claim ended last year when Congress adopted it, and we have recommended that it be paid now in accordance with the action of last year. The Senate, of course, will do as it pleases about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I notice the phraseology of the statute of last year reads:

To enable the Secretary to pay, should he consider such payment desirable.

It seems he did not consider such payment desirable; at least he did not pay it. There are thousands of meritorious claims against the Government. New Hampshire has several, but I do not expect to live to see the time when they will be appropriated for on a naval appropriation bill or any other bill. It does seem to me, when this claimant has a right before Congress to ask that his claim shall be adjudicated and the Court of Claims is open to him, that we ought not, certainly without a very full consideration of this matter, to cause the Government to pay $25,000 for a claim which, I take it, is in controversy. I think there are very grave reasons why this amendment should not go upon the present bill.

Mr. TELLER. The Government of the United States made a contract with this young man for these patented articles. They have had the use of them and they are using them now. The question is whether they shall pay for them. That is the whole matter. It was considered by the committee last year, and has been reconsidered by the committee at this session, and we believe he ought to be paid. There is not any time under the five-minute rule to go into any very extended explanation of the case, and it would be quite impossible to make the proper statement of it in that time, but it has been twice before the Committee on Appropriations, twice thoroughly considered, and it is to carry out a contract contained in the law of last year.

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt the claim is a very good one, but there are a great many good claims against the United States to carry out contracts which are not paid, and which are delayed year after year. This bill, as I understand, is for the support of the Navy, and it seems to me the proper place for a claim of this kind is not on the naval bill, but on the general deficiency bill, where payments of that sort are made. It is rather unusual to pay a private claim on a naval appropriation bill, and it seems to me when the deficiency bill is up, and we shall not be under the five-minute rule, there will be an opportunity to understand the claim. I have no desire to oppose an honest claim unreasonably, but all we know about this is that the Secretary of the Navy, on its being left to him, did not think it a good claim and refused to pay it. That is really all we know about it. It seems to me that it would be better to allow it to come up on the general deficiency bill. Then it can be explained, and I have no doubt, if it be a proper claim, as I suppose it is, it will be passed.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not concerned whether this amendment goes on this bill or not. I do not see why it can not be paid on this bill, if it ought to be paid at all, just as well as to be paid on any other bill; but I rose for the purpose of inquiring from some person who knows, presumably the Senator having this bill in charge, as to what it is proposed we shall pay for? The amendment itself does not disclose anything. We are paying for some patented articles, and the amendment does not disclose what the act read a moment ago gives us to understand that we are paying for some patented articles; but we are not told what those articles are, nor what title we are obtaining to them.

I rose, in the second place, to ask the attention of the Senator from Maine to a statement that he made a moment ago, that naval officers are engaged in patenting certain articles which are used by the Navy. I should like to know if that be true.

Mr. HALE. It appears every now and then that officers in the Navy and the Army get out patents.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator from Maine mean to say that officers who are in the service of this Government and who have been educated by the Government are taking advantage of their education and their experience as naval officers by patenting articles and selling them to the Government?

Mr. HALE. That raises another question about selling them to the Government. They generally give them to the Government.

Mr. ALLEN. Still they get money out of the Government for them?

Mr. HALE. They do not get any money generally.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not speaking generally. Are there patents in existence of that kind?

Mr. HALE. I do not think, unless there has been a special provision authorized by Congress, that there is any case on record where army or navy officers getting out patents have received money for them. Sometimes I have known of cases so remarkable, so meritorious, that Congress has authorized some recognition of such patents by giving some small sum to the patentee.

Mr. ALLEN. We are talking about a patent. What is this patent? What does it consist of?

Mr. TELLER. I will tell the Senator.

Mr. HALE. The officers do not get royalties.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Hurst patented certain improvements in cartridges and breech-loading guns.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is this gentleman an officer of the Army?

Mr. TELLER. No; he is a private citizen. His patents also cover the use of a practice rifle inside of a large gun. It is taking a large gun and putting inside of it another gun, taking out the breech lock and using it for practice purposes, for training men, etc., and there is a recoil to prevent the smaller gun from injuring the larger gun. He has invented various kinds of machinery of that sort, which are complicated and difficult to understand. Having made these patents, he went to the Navy Department and made a contract with Mr. Tracy, who was then Secretary of the Navy. Thereupon inquiries were made—and I have a letter here showing that they inquired of the Navy Department—to know if he could get these patents and whether they were interfering with anything else, and also as to whether he made any assignment. Then he entered into a contract with the Government that it might use these appliances, and the Government has used them. Afterwards the Department said that somebody else had made the discovery simultaneously with him, although nobody else had got a patent, and no patent had been taken out for such appliances. Thereupon they declined to pay him. The committee, after investigating, believed that Mr. Hurst was the original inventor, and as the Government had had the use of his inventions, and is now using them, they could see no reason why the contract should not be carried out and why the money which was appropriated last year should not be paid.

I can say to the Senator that we have given some attention to this matter, and I have had some knowledge myself regarding it, because when the contracts were made by this young man I went with him and introduced him to the Secretary of the Navy, so that he might be able to make the contracts. He has made them. I believe his appliances are valuable, and after examining the subject last year and examining it again we think this amount ought to be paid him. It would take an hour or two to read the documents which the young man has left with me or with the Senator from Mississippi to be presented to the Senate. That can not be done under the five-minute rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator's remarks will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator to pardon me. I did not suppose that my remarks would come out of his time.

Mr. ALLEN. I will make this inquiry. I want information. The Senator from Colorado has not yet disclosed what we have bought from this man or what we are to get from him.

Mr. TELLER. We have the right to use this patent. If the Senator wants to go into a careful statement of it I have the document here, but it would take some time for him to understand the matter, and unless he is a better machinist than the average Senator he would not be able to understand it.

Mr. ALLEN. Do we get the exclusive right to the invention, or the right to use it?

Mr. TELLER. We get the exclusive and absolute right. It is good for nobody except the Government of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Then we are the assignees of the patentee?

Mr. TELLER. We are, if we pay the money.

Mr. ALLEN. Do we have anything to pay after this payment?

Mr. TELLER. We have nothing to pay, no royalty. The Government is going to use it, and will use it whether it is paid for or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I make the point of order that it is a private claim and not in order on an appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated.

Mr. HALE. All there is in parliamentary law on that subject is found in clause 4 of Rule XVI. Undoubtedly no private claim can be put upon a general appropriation bill unless it is under the conditions which are prescribed in clause 4.

Mr. VEST. Read the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will first read the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. GEORGE, as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and required to pay, immediately, to the patentee the $25,000 appropriated in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1895. Said act providing "for the exclusive rights to and for ordnance appliances now in use on naval vessels and protected and covered by patent No. 533171, said patent being embraced in a contract dated January 28, 1893, and signed by the Secretary of the Navy and the patentee."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the fourth clause of Rule XVI.

The Secretary read clause 4 of Rule XVI, as follows:

No amendment the object of which is to provide for a private claim shall be received to any general appropriation bill unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. On that point the existing law does not correspond with this amendment. The existing law is that the Secretary shall pay the amount at his discretion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is made against the proposed amendment by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. The Chair has caused to be read the rule, which is familiar to the Senate, and the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment does not carry out existing law, as it is not mandatory, but is discretionary with the Secretary of the Navy. For that reason the Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. HALE. I hope, Mr. President, we shall now proceed with the reserved items. I ask the Secretary to read the first amendment which has not been acted upon, at the bottom of page 50, line 25.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reserved amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 25, on page 50, before the word "torpedo," it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "three"; so as to read:

And three torpedo boats, to have a maximum speed of not less than, etc.

Mr. HALE. This is a committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next reserved amendment was, on page 51, line 1, before the word "knots," to strike out "26" and insert "30"; in line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "and seventy-five"; in the same line, after the word "and," to strike out "not to exceed"; in line 3, after the word "ten," to strike out "or more"; and in the same line, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "eight" and insert "five"; so as to read:

And three torpedo boats, to have a maximum speed of not less than 30 knots, to cost in all not exceeding $800,000; and not to exceed ten torpedo boats to cost in all not exceeding $500,000, and to have the highest practicable speed for vessels of their class.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next reserved amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 51, line 5, after the word "class," to insert:

And not more than two of said battle ships and not more than three of said torpedo boats shall be built in one yard or by one contracting party, and in each case the contract shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest best responsible bidder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next reserved amendment was, on page 51, line 21, after the words "battle ship," to strike out "and one of said torpedo boats"; so as to read:

And, subject to the provisions hereinafter made, one seagoing battle ship shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean or in the waters connecting therewith, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be regarded as agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. We want to have something to say about that.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. SQUIRE. I propose to substitute the word "three" for the word "one"; so as to have it read:

And three of said torpedo boats shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean, or in the waters connecting therewith, provided that said battle ship and torpedo boats can be constructed at an additional cost not exceeding 5 per cent, etc.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. In other words, the Senator from Washington proposes to amend the amendment of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington will be stated from the desk.

Mr. HALE. That goes back to the amendment on lines 21 and 22.

Mr. SQUIRE. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. SQUIRE. In that connection I have dispatches from the Navy Department which I wish to submit to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I will agree to the Senator's amendment rather than have them read.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask that these dispatches be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The dispatches referred to are as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, April 28, 1896.

Hon. WATSON C. SQUIRE:

In the naval appropriation bill, as now before the Senate, providing for 10 torpedo boats not to cost over $500,000, and to have the highest practicable speed, the Department, while adhering to its original view, that it should be given the largest possible discretion in letting these boats so as to get the best results for the Government, has no objection, if the Congress so desires, to it being provided that one or more of these boats shall be built on the Pacific Coast, with a proviso regarding cost similar to that with reference to the battle ship.

W. MCADOO, Acting Secretary.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, April 29, 1896.

Hon. WATSON C. SQUIRE:

In reply to your written inquiry of this date, I have to say that if all conditions as to price and the capacity of the builders be fair, the Department would consider it good policy to encourage shipbuilding, including torpedo boats for the Navy, on the Pacific Coast.

W. MCADOO, Acting Secretary.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 1, 1896.

Hon. W. C. SQUIRE:

Replying to telegram of April 29, the estimated cost for sending a torpedo boat similar to the Cushing from New York to San Francisco, most economical rate of speed, for coal, oil, and engineer's stores, would be $4,000.

F. M. RAMSAY, Acting Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Washington indicate his amendment?

Mr. SQUIRE. After the word "battle ship," in line 21—

Mr. WOLCOTT. How is the RECORD going to appear? There were no remarks made, as I understand, by the Senator from Washington. A suggestion was made that some remarks would be submitted, whereupon the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said that rather than have the remarks he would accept the amendment. Now, the Senator from Washington proposes to print some telegrams in regard to remarks which were not made.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Washington desires to have them printed as part of his remarks.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I did not so understand. I should be glad to have the dispatches printed in connection with the speeches of both the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SQUIRE. I thought I had the floor at the time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask the Senator from Washington to restate his amendment.

Mr. SQUIRE. On page 51, line 21, after the words "battle ship," I move to insert "and three of said torpedo boats."

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not need to do that. The amendment of the committee proposes to strike out the words "and one of said torpedo boats." Before the vote is taken on that, the Senator can move, as he has a right to do, to strike out "one" and insert "three." That is all that he needs to do, and then the vote will be taken upon the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. SQUIRE. I accept that suggestion and will move the amendment in that way.

Mr. HALE. I accept it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee, in line 25, on page 51, by striking out the word "one" and inserting "three"; so as to read:

And three of said torpedo boats shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean, or in the waters connecting therewith.

Mr. GORMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Maine to accept that amendment?

Mr. HALE. I do. So far as I am concerned I agree to it.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator objects, of course the vote must be taken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. The amendment does not increase the number to be built, but it does provide that 3 of the 10 torpedo boats shall be constructed in the waters of the Pacific.

Mr. HALE. Three out of 13.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; 3 out of 13.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It ought to be 5.

Mr. SQUIRE. Certainly it ought to be 5.

Mr. HALE. I thought it better not to increase from 3 to 5. I thought the Senators were getting along pretty well with 3.

Mr. GORMAN. I always wish to deal, and have always dealt, very liberally with the Pacific Coast. They have the great navy-yard at San Francisco provided for in this bill, and one of the battle ships is to be constructed there at $500,000, or whatever it may cost. As to torpedo boats, you can not compete for them on the Pacific Coast, considering, as the Secretary has a right to do, the cost of transportation of such a boat from this side over there. You have in that matter absolutely open competition with the balance of the United States, and there is no good and sound reason, in my judgment, why such a provision should be placed in this bill. I know we have been in the habit of encouraging enterprise of this kind, providing that one shall be constructed on the Gulf and one on the Pacific Coast, but I think our friends on the Pacific Coast ought to be satisfied with this bill.

Mr. SQUIRE. I wish to say a word if the Senator from Maryland is through.

Mr. GORMAN. I am through.

Mr. SQUIRE. Last November the Government entered into a contract for the construction of one torpedo boat on the Pacific Coast, in the waters of Puget Sound, at a cost of $160,000, to be completed in fifteen months from the time the contract was let.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And there was sharp competition for that boat in three or four different places.

Mr. SQUIRE. Very sharp competition.

Mr. GORMAN. But the Senator will observe that he proposes that three of them are to be built there.

Mr. SQUIRE. Yes; at various places, if suitable bids are made.

Mr. GORMAN. There is no discretion at all left in the Department.

Mr. SQUIRE. That is only 3 out of 13, and discretion is left to the Department. I wish to state further to the Senator from Maryland and the Senate that it is the policy of the Government, as shown in the dispatches I sent to the desk, to encourage the construction of some of these torpedo boats on the Pacific Coast. There is now a torpedo boat yard there already established, that is, I mean in the hands of a private company, quite equal, if not superior, to any yard of that kind that exists on this side. There is only one great battle-ship building concern on the Pacific Coast. I mean, as everybody knows, the Union Iron Works, of San Francisco. There never has been a torpedo boat built on the Pacific Coast. One has been contracted for, and is to be built on the waters of Puget Sound for $160,000. As the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] just remarked, the bid was accepted by the Government after very severe competition and at a very low price. The law at that time authorized the construction of a boat to cost $175,000, and the Department, in the exercise of its discretion, deducted a small amount covering the cost of the armament, and I believe that the Government deducted more than was necessary for the cost of the armament, and the Department concluded to make this contract $160,000, which was $15,000 less than the amount authorized by law.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Washington allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SQUIRE. I would prefer to complete my statement, if the Senator from Colorado will allow me.

It is the policy of the Government to continue the existence of the shipbuilding concerns on the Pacific Coast; and when the company at Seattle gets through with building the one boat contracted for they ought to have a chance to build another. They can not very well compete with the yards on the Atlantic Coast. It costs more for wages. They have to get every pound of their steel from the Atlantic Coast. Every pound of steel used in the construction of the battle ships at San Francisco and all the armor plates come from Pittsburgh. I am informed that it will be the same in regard to the torpedo boats.

I want to mention one fact before I leave this point. I have here a dispatch from the Secretary of the Navy stating that the cost of transferring one of the smallest torpedo boats from the Atlantic Coast to the Pacific Coast—the Ericsson, for instance, or the Cushing—would be $4,000 just for the expense of the coal and the oil and the necessary expenses, without including anything for the wages of the officers or crew or any estimate for the cost of pilotage or any reference to the question of risk to be encountered in going around Cape Horn.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. SQUIRE. In a moment.

Four thousand dollars is about 5 per cent on the cost of the Cushing, which was $82,750. So you can see you must have some of your torpedo boats on the Pacific Coast, and it is absurd to spend the money to send them around the Horn when you can have them built there, and so distribute the money in part upon the Pacific Coast in payment for these vessels; besides encouraging the building up of another important shipyard for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Washington if he has any objection to having the Gulf of Mexico inserted as one of those places?

Mr. SQUIRE. That is already included.

Mr. WILSON. The Gulf of Mexico is already included.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to ask the Senator from Washington and the Committee on Appropriations if this would not be a fair proposition all around, that in the bill there should be some limitation of the percentage of cost over which the Pacific Coast should not go? That is to say, in the battle ships, one of them is to be built on the Pacific Coast, provided it can be built at the price mentioned. That is right; that is reasonable. Now, the Senator states, which is probably true, that 5 per cent would not be enough perhaps to make up the difference of cost in the torpedo boats; but if you are to build 3 on the Pacific Slope the United States ought to have some sort of a percentage on which it can protect itself; because if you have three yards on the Pacific Coast capable of building these torpedo boats, the Government will find those three yards pooled, and the 3 boats compelled to be built on the Pacific Slope will cost the full amount appropriated. If the Government is required to build the whole 3 boats on the Pacific Coast, I suggest that there should be some measurable limitation, that the cost of the torpedo boats should not be more than 5 per cent over the cost of building elsewhere.

Mr. HALE. If the 3 are put in, the clause should read: "Provided, That said battle ship and torpedo boats can be constructed at an additional cost not exceeding 5 per cent of the lowest accepted bid," etc.

Let me say here that one reason which led me, so far as I was concerned, to accept the proposition of 3 out of the 13 was that in last year's bill we provided for 3 torpedo boats, and provided that 1 of the boats should be built on the Pacific Coast. The percentage is not nearly so large this year as it was last, and we considered the expense of transporting these boats around the Horn. We have to take into consideration the fact that if we can build torpedo boats there that was not an unreasonable number, although I was besought to agree to 5. For that reason I shall vote for the 3, and I shall move to insert after the word "battle ship," to which the 5 per cent applies, the words "and torpedo boats"; so that the provision will cover the two.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There will have to be another amendment made.

Mr. HALE. I will move it.

Mr. BACON. I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the proviso on the fifty-second page, which will affect torpedo boats as well as battle ships. That puts it in the discretion of the President to have these vessels constructed elsewhere if, after the bids are opened, it is found that they can not be economically constructed on the Pacific Coast.

Mr. HALE. That is cured by the limitation in line 11, which says:

Subject to the limitations as to cost hereinbefore provided.

That was put in in order that the Secretary can not overrule the 5 per cent. The committee has been very careful about this clause, and I think it is very well guarded.

Mr. CALL. My object was to make it imperative that one of these boats should be constructed upon the Gulf of Mexico, and I think that ought to be done. I think the laboring people and others in that portion of the country ought to have the advantage of whatever accrues from the disbursement of this money. Under the language of the bill, which I understood to be remedied by the amendment of the Senator from Washington, it would not be imperative, but under that amendment it is imperative that they shall be constructed there.

Mr. SQUIRE. I will state to the Senator from Florida that the provisions which have been suggested or prescribed by the Senator from Maine are very clear. On page 52 it is provided "that if it shall appear to the complete satisfaction of the President of the United States, from the biddings for such contracts, * * * that said vessels can not be constructed at a fair cost," etc. That is all very well expressed in the next page.

Mr. CALL. "At a fair cost," the Senator will observe.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the fact that the bill as it is now proposed to be amended would provide that three of these boats shall be built on the Pacific Coast, provided, as I understand, that provision is also to be put in that the cost does not exceed 5 per cent of those constructed elsewhere. Then follows the provision for one torpedo boat on the Mississippi River and one torpedo boat on the Gulf of Mexico, but there is no 5 per cent limit as to them.

Mr. CALL. That is what I understood. It is to be left entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course, when we provide that any of these torpedo boats shall be constructed in a particular place, we limit the field of competition, and we run a risk of having to pay a larger sum than we would pay with full and complete competition. On this proposition I am willing to provide that one of these boats shall be built on the Pacific Coast, whatever the cost may be, within the limit, but if three are to be built there, I should like to be informed how many establishments there are on the coast that can bid and what the probabilities are as to competition.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There are three separate and distinct establishments in the city in which I live, the city of Portland, Oreg.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Washington has, I know, full information concerning the Pacific Coast. Will he tell us how many establishments there are on that coast which can build one of these torpedo boats?

Mr. SQUIRE. I think we have as many as six or eight. We have at Seattle, Moran Bros. Company, and there is at Port Townsend another firm—Heffernan—which has now a contract with the Government for the construction of steam launches. We have other concerns at Portland, whose names I do not now recall, and at San Francisco there are several concerns.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Willamette Iron Works and Zwicker Bros.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON] confirm this statement?

Mr. WILSON. I do not think "the junior Senator from Washington" can inform the senior Senator from New Hampshire upon any subject.

Mr. HALE. I am afraid these inquiries will extend to the number being increased to 5 or 6. I should like to have a vote on 3.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Let us have a vote.

Mr. HALE. Yes; let us vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE], to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out by the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I did not intend to delay the vote upon the pending measure, but I have thought, in view of the fact that the Naval Committee has been very generous in distributing the torpedo boats or locating the places where they shall be constructed, that it would not be improper for me to ask the honorable Senator from Maine who has the bill in charge to permit one of these boats to be constructed on the Missouri River. One of them is to be constructed on the Upper Mississippi River, I understand, which is not as large nor as important a stream at the location of the proposed construction as the Missouri River.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska, as I hope he will not forget, that the South Fork of the Platte also runs through his State?

Mr. ALLEN. I was coming to that, and I hope the five-minute rule will not be called upon me in exact time. I was going to mention the fact that the Missouri River from its mouth to its source is something like 2,700 miles long 2,200 miles of which are navigable not only for boats but for boats. It is one of the great streams of the United States. One of these vessels is to be constructed on the Upper Mississippi River. I am glad to know that it is to be constructed there and to be constructed at a city where my honorable friend the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] resides, a city of some 35,000 inhabitants. Nebraska has a city of 200,000 inhabitants on the navigable waters of the Missouri River; and why should not we, who have been drought-stricken there for years and have encountered all the hardships of pioneer life, have the profits as well as the honors to be derived from the construction of one of these torpedo boats?

The Senator from Washington wants two or three of these boats to patrol the creeks and the ditches and the obscure estuaries of the Pacific Slope. We are citizens of the United States, Mr. President, and taxpayers. We are citizens to the manner born. Why should we not have a torpedo boat to patrol the Missouri River, to patrol the meanderings of the Platte, the meanderings of the Republican, the meanderings of the North and South Loup, and the many magnificent streams that flow through our State? Why should not North and South Dakota have a torpedo boat constructed upon the Upper Missouri so that it might patrol and guard the commerce of the Jim River, which intersects, or bisects, as my friend from Illinois would say, both of those great States?

Mr. KYLE. I should like to know if the Senator refers to the rivers that cross my State?

Mr. ALLEN. I refer to the Jim River, which for some four or five hundred miles is one of the great and important streams of the West. Do you not want a boat constructed on that river and kept there to patrol it?

Mr. KYLE. We do; and when we come to the river and harbor bill we shall propose—

Mr. ALLEN. I know the Senator from South Dakota to be a candid man, and I put the question squarely to him: Do you not need a torpedo boat to patrol the waters of the Jim River?

Mr. KYLE. Indeed we do.

Mr. ALLEN. On page 52, after the amendment of the Senator from Washington, I will attach the language to the amendment of the Senator from Washington, in addition to what he proposes—I move to so amend the bill that one of the torpedo boats shall be constructed upon the Missouri River and shall be used to patrol the waters of that river.

Mr. HALE. The best place is in line 9, page 52.

Mr. ALLEN. I will accept the Senator's suggestion. I presume it is just as well there as any other place.

Mr. HALE. It would come in more properly there.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, it would come in more properly there; and if the Senator from South Dakota wants one I am perfectly willing that he shall amend my amendment. I hope the amendment will be voted upon, and that the same reasoning which carries through the project of the Senator from Washington will take these two propositions through.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the first question is as to whether it is worth anything at all for this nation to try to defend itself anyhow against anybody under any circumstances. If adding to our force would make us too aggressive, the only way to keep us peaceable is to make us utterly defenseless. But I take it for granted that is not the wish of Congress and the people. We must have something.

Now, torpedo boats are thought to be worth having by all the world except the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. It is a wise and proper thing, as the Navy Department says, and as we all know they have said and all of us have said before, to encourage the building up of yards on the Pacific Coast, in which can be built something for national defense, and we have sent some there to be built. It is desirable there should be torpedo boats there if we have any anywhere, and we must either build them there or take them around the Horn, at a cost of about $4,000 each. If we build them over there, we get the advantage of building up an industry that is valuable to us, as valuable to us as if we owned the shipbuilding establishments there, precisely, because we can always avail ourselves of them. I think it is entirely a sensible thing to let them build two or three over there, that they may have shops which can help us hereafter, under the limitation that the cost shall not go above 5 per cent over what they can be built for on this coast. A dispatch that the Senator did not read, from the Navy Department, says:

If all conditions as to price and the capacity of the builders be fair, the Department would consider it good policy to encourage shipbuilding, including torpedo boats for the Navy, on the Pacific Coast.

And another dispatch speaks favorably of the limitation of 5 per cent. I think it ought to go through.

Mr. GORMAN. Who signs the dispatch?

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. McAdoo.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to suggest to the Senate in all seriousness that we have just as great capacity at Omaha, Nebr., for the construction of one of these vessels as can be found at any interior city in the United States. We have the means of transportation. We have, I was going to say, a dozen great transcontinental lines of road centering there. We have just as good means upon the Missouri River for the construction of one of these boats as they have upon the Mississippi River. There is no reason why we should not encourage the construction, if we are to start upon the process of encouraging the development of industries, and build up great works upon the Missouri River, which is the important river of the United States, and more important than the Upper Mississippi. There is no more reason why we should not encourage the development of one of these great industries by the construction of a torpedo boat at Omaha, or Kansas City, or some other important city along the Missouri River, than that one of the boats should be constructed upon the Mississippi River. We pay our taxes according to our population, and we pay them promptly. We are citizens of the United States. Why should ten of these boats be constructed here upon the Atlantic Coast, where everything is pooled, and where there is practically no competition? And why should the Senator from Washington be permitted to take the other three over upon the Pacific Slope, with the single one that has slipped up the waters of the Mississippi River?

Mr. SQUIRE. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit an interruption?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. SQUIRE. I wish to occupy just one moment on that point. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that I would not be opposed to the construction of one or more of those vessels on the Missouri River, or on any other practically navigable river in the West. I would not be opposed to it at all. Therefore it is useless, in my judgment, in discussing the amendment that I propose, to offset anything that was said by me or by other Senators in favor of my proposed amendment by the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, because we may be able to vote as he wishes when we come to that question.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand the Senator from Washington, then, to accept my amendment as a part of his amendment.

Mr. SQUIRE. I do not understand that the Senator's amendment is to come in at this place. I understood him to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Maine that his amendment should come in on page 52, line 9, after the words "Gulf of Mexico." That is the proper place for it to come in, and I understood the Senator from Nebraska to consent that it should come in there.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; let it come in there. I do not care where it comes in.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska also if he does not begin to feel out there in Omaha some shiver of fear from that attack which is to be delivered upon us when the cordon is complete from Halifax, by way of Jamaica, entirely around the United States, and the Hawaiian Islands brought into the circle?

Mr. ALLEN. No; I do not feel any fear of that attack, for the simple reason that I am satisfied the gentlemen who would make the attack, if they had the opportunity, would be lost upon the great plains of Nebraska, and they would not be furnished with any guides to assist them to penetrate our section of country. We are a people who have acquired some experience—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE].

Mr. PALMER. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amend line 21, page 51, by striking out the word "one" and inserting the word "three"; so as to read:

And three of said torpedo boats shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out the clause as amended.

Mr. HALE. That is only a formal vote. The expression of the Senate already is that there shall be three built on the Pacific Coast; but a formal vote should be taken on striking it out. The committee report in favor of striking it out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee striking out the provision as amended.

The question being put, there were, on division—yeas 19, nays 29.

Mr. VEST. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the question stated. What is now the question before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendment, in lines 21 and 22, page 51, is to strike out the words—

And three of said torpedo boats.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The clause has been amended by striking out "one" and inserting "three." The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment, striking out the clause as amended.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The text was amended by changing one to three.

Mr. HALE. That has been passed upon. The committee amendment was to strike out one torpedo boat. The Senate has put in three, and the question is, will the Senate now strike those three out. Those in favor of retaining three will vote "nay." Of course those in favor of striking it out will vote "yea."

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. I understand that he would vote "nay" upon this question, and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). On this question

I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON]. If he were here, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DUBOIS. With the consent of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], I will announce the pair of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON. I will transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY]. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23; nays 41, as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. Now, in line 24—

Mr. ALLEN. I hope—

Mr. HALE. I am only having this clause perfected before we come to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

Mr. HALE. After the words "battle ship," in line 24, page 51, I move to insert "or torpedo boats"; and on the next page, after the word "ships," I move to insert the same words.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "battle ship," in line 24, page 51, it is proposed to insert "or torpedo boats," and after the word "ships," in line 1, page 52, it is proposed to insert "or torpedo boats"; so as to read:

Provided, That said battle ship or torpedo boats can be constructed at an additional cost not exceeding 5 per cent of the lowest accepted bid for the other battle ships or torpedo boats provided for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Before going to the lower part of the bill, there is an amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to be considered, coming in after the words "Gulf of Mexico," in line 3, page 52.

Mr. ALLEN. I have the amendment in form here. I move to strike out the word "and," in line 2, page 52; after the word "Mexico," in line 3, to insert "and one torpedo boat on the Missouri River," and after the word "Mississippi," in line 8, to insert "or Missouri."

Mr. HALE. All those changes perfect the clause.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "river," in line 2, page 52, it is proposed to strike out the word "and"; after the word "Mexico," in line 3, to insert the words "and one torpedo boat on the Missouri River," and after the word "Mississippi," in line 8, to insert the words "or Missouri"; so as to read:

And one torpedo boat on the Mississippi River, one torpedo boat on the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, and one torpedo boat on the Missouri River: Provided, That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President of the United States from the biddings for such contracts when the same are opened and examined by him that said vessels can not be constructed at a fair cost on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean, or on the Mississippi or Missouri River, or the Gulf of Mexico, he shall authorize the construction of said vessels, or either of them, elsewhere in the United States, subject to the limitations as to cost hereinbefore provided.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not hear the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. I merely wish to inquire whether there is any establishment on the Missouri River capable of building a torpedo boat.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no doubt about it. There is on that river Kansas City, Mo., where there are large iron works; there is the city of Omaha, Nebr.; the city of Council Bluffs, in Iowa, across the river; Sioux City, Iowa, and several important cities. Two of the important capitals of the nation are on the upper Missouri River, Pierre and Bismarck. I have not the slightest doubt that there is as much capacity at those cities to construct one of these torpedo boats as there is at any city on the Mississippi River. We are an industrious people in that section. We can very soon get ready to build one of these boats if there is anything lacking. I do seriously hope, in view of the fact that these boats are being sent around to the different parts of the Union for construction, one being sent to the important river, the Mississippi, which I heartily approve, that the other one will be located on the Missouri River, to be let to some contractor for construction on that river.

Mr. CHANDLER. I congratulate the Senator from Nebraska upon having made one of his shortest speeches and having gained one vote.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WHITE. There is one feature of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska which appeals to me very strongly, and that is that the torpedo boat when built at Omaha will at least be safe. Admiral Walker in the hearing before the Committee on Coast Defenses was asked by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]:

Under the conditions existing now, what would be the effect if the English navy should engage ours?

Admiral WALKER. They would probably capture or destroy our whole Navy.

So the element of safety which surrounds this case, as I have already stated, appeals to me with much force. I would prefer for the same reason that the boat should be built in the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. That I can not get, and I will accept Omaha.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. On page 52, after the word "Mexico," in the third line, I ask the Senator from Maine to insert the same provision that is to be found on page 51:

Provided, That said battle ship can be constructed at an additional cost not exceeding 5 per cent of the lowest accepted bid for the other battle ships provided for in this act.

Mr. HALE. I could not, of course, agree to do that. The exception was made in the case of the Pacific Coast on account of added cost of transportation of materials there and added prices and cost generally. But I could not by any means agree to apply it, because there would be no end to it. It would want to be applied to the Mississippi River and everywhere else, and there is no expense especially in taking materials to those places or in taking a ship from them. The reasons that apply to California and the Pacific Coast do not apply to these other places. It never before has been asked for by any other place. I hope the Senator from Florida will not urge the amendment.

Mr. CALL. The reasons apply in part to the extent of the difference in the distance; that is all. The principal object of the clause is to give the people in this portion of the country where the ships can be constructed the opportunity to do so. This is an absolute discretion in the President and the Secretary. They can do as they please about it. There is no use to put a clause in the bill providing that one vessel shall be constructed on the Gulf of Mexico and say if the Secretary or the President choose to do it. That is all I have to say about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. There is a very meritorious claim, a just claim against the Government, which has been ruled out on the point of order.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to complete this clause?

Mr. GEORGE. I merely want to offer an amendment. Let me dispose of it right now.

Mr. HALE. All right.

Mr. GEORGE. I offered the amendment, which was ruled out of order by the advice of some of the most experienced parliamentarians in the Senate. I have now been advised to offer the amendment which I hold in my hand, which I presume will not be objected to. It may be, upon the ground of order; I do not know about that. The object of the amendment now offered is to submit to the Court of Claims the question of the right of this party against the Government. Certainly there can be no objection to that. It has been shown here already by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] that the Government made a contract and purchased this man's patent and is now using his device. The question of payment having been ruled out of order, I hope at least that Senators will allow this amendment to go into the bill and let the claim be referred to the proper tribunal to decide whether or not the Government owes anything—whether or not it has taken his patent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 13, on page 7, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and required immediately to pay to the patentee of the patent No. 533171, out of the $25,000 appropriated for certain rights under patent No. 533171 in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, the sum of $976.22, being the total amount expended by the patentee at the Washington Navy-Yard in cartridge and small-bore small-arm experiments made at said navy-yard. The balance of said $25,000 the Secretary of the Navy shall hold subject to the order of the Court of Claims, said court being hereby directed and required to advance and adjudicate this claim under said act providing for payment "for ordnance appliances now in use on naval vessels and covered and protected by patent No. 533171." The Court of Claims to determine, first, whether the Government has infringed any one or more of the claims of patent No. 533171; second, whether said patent was covered by the contract signed by the patentee and the late Secretary of the Navy and authorized in the act making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes; and third, the amount of compensation, including reasonable damages and costs, that the patentee is entitled to receive under said contract. The Court of Claims to admit as evidence all the correspondence and documentary proof in this case.

Upon judgment for the patentee by said court the Secretary of the Navy shall use the balance of the $25,000 appropriated for patent No. 533171 to satisfy such judgment in full or in part, and pay the same to the patentee.

And the said Court of Claims may render a separate judgment, including reasonable damages and costs, should infringement be proven by the Government of either of the other inventions covered by said contract, applications filed March 23, 1892, serial No. 426539, and July 23, 1892, serial No. 441433.

Mr. SHERMAN. This proposition is subject to the same objection that I made heretofore. Besides, this man can sue in the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims has jurisdiction of all cases of private citizens against the United States, and there is no reason why we should give this particular litigant any particular favor. I make the point of order against the amendment. It is the shortest way to do it. He can sue in the Court of Claims any day he chooses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is made against the amendment submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order under the rule.

Mr. HALE. The next committee amendment is on page 52, line 14. Let it be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, line 14, before the word "days," it is proposed to strike out the word "ninety" and insert "one hundred and twenty"; so as to read:

Provided further, That the contracts for the construction of the vessels herein provided for shall be made within one hundred and twenty days from the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now let the next committee amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to contract for the building of two submarine torpedo boats of the Holland type, at a cost not exceeding $175,000 each, said boats to be constructed and delivered to the Navy Department within four months from the date of contract: Provided, That the Holland boat now being built for the Department shall be accepted by the Department as fulfilling all the requirements of the contract, and as being satisfactory to the Secretary of the Navy; but no action shall be taken therein until said Holland boat now being built for the Department shall have been fully tested to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, and thereupon accepted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, line 7, before the word "hundred," it is proposed to strike out "six" and insert "three"; so as to read:

Construction and machinery: On account of the hulls and outfits of vessels and steam machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, and of the vessels authorized under this act, $7,370,679.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "seven," before the word "million," in line 7, and inserting "six"; so as to conform to the action of the Senate in regard to battle ships.

The SECRETARY. In line 7 it is proposed to strike out "seven" and insert "six"; so as to read "$6,370,679."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now let the next clause be read.

The Secretary read the bill, beginning with line 9, on page 53, to the end of line 21, on the same page.

Mr. HALE. In line 20, on page 53, I move to strike out the word "eight" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 20, page 53, it is proposed to strike out the word "eight" and insert in lieu thereof "three"; so as to make the clause read:

Armor and armament: Toward the armament and armor of domestic manufacture for the vessels authorized by the act of August 3, 1893; of those authorized by the act of June 30, 1890; of those authorized by the act of July 19, 1892; and of the vessels authorized by the act of March 3, 1893; of the three torpedo boats, act of July 23, 1894; of the vessels authorized under the act of March 2, 1895, and of the vessels authorized under this act, $4,371,454.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senator from Maine whether that sum can not be further reduced?

Mr. HALE. No; I am afraid I have proposed to reduce it a little too much. There will be very little armor contracted for this year, and if a certain amendment—

Mr. GORMAN. All right.

Mr. HALE. I think that is far enough.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. HALE. To come in at what point?

Mr. SQUIRE. I should like to offer an amendment on page 21.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator wait until I can get through with the committee amendments?

Mr. SQUIRE. Very well.

Mr. CALL. I should like to know of the Senator from Maine whether there was an agreement made to vote on the bill at a specific hour?

Mr. HALE. There was not; but it was agreed that we should stay to-night until the bill was finished and passed. I now wish the committee would go back to the reserved amendments, as I want to have them taken up first.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator permit one amendment from the committee on page 2, as to surgeons of the Navy?

Mr. HALE. I would rather take up the reserved clauses before taking up other amendments.

Mr. GORMAN. Very well.

Mr. ALLEN. I have an amendment to offer, if it is in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me make an inquiry of the Senator from Maine. Does he intend to proceed with the committee amendments and dispose of them first?

Mr. HALE. I propose first to take up the reserved amendments which have been passed over.

Mr. CHANDLER. The committee amendments?

Mr. HALE. They are committee amendments. Then any amendments will be in order. The natural order is to take up those which have been reserved and passed over. Then the Senator, of course—

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection to that. I do not wish to be shut out, however.

Mr. HALE. Of course the Senator will not be shut out. I ask the Secretary to go back and read the committee amendment on page 43.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, after line 2, it is proposed to strike out:

Pay of 10 sergeants, 40 corporals, 12 drummers, 12 fifers, and 426 privates, to be enlisted in accordance with the provisions of section 1596, Revised Statutes, $74,560, to be immediately available.

Mr. HALE. These amendments, the amendment on page 45, lines 19 to 23, the amendment on page 46, lines 3 to 7, inclusive, and the amendment on page 50, lines 10 to 15, inclusive, are all one amendment substantially; that is, they apply to the Marine Corps. One amendment is for pay; another is for articles of furniture; another is for provisions, and they all go together. The committee, I will simply say, believing that this could wait and is not so imperative as the increase of the force of the Navy, the enlisted men, struck it out, thereby saving some three or four hundred thousand dollars, and it is for the Senate to determine. I should like consent to be given that the amendments may be considered all together, because one goes with the other. I do not wish to take up any more time.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Maine would set forth a little more in detail the reasons why the Marine Corps should not be enlarged. I suppose there will be some large vessels going into commission before long with large crews. In short, the conditions that require a marine corps are going to be very much enlarged.

Nobody thinks of dispensing with such a corps. It has been found in the best of navies and in our own from the beginning of the Government to be essential to the wise and safe government of a ship, and a very valuable instrument in case the necessity is imposed upon a naval vessel to enter a foreign harbor and protect American property and the lives of American citizens. In such cases a marine corps, a well-drilled, faithful body of men, is always ready to be thrown ashore to protect a consulate or a legation, and our Marine Corps has made very honorable records during all this time. It has nineteen times been thanked by votes of Congress, and I think the wisest and most experienced naval officers consider that a certain body guard, a certain reserve of purely military force, or nearly so, is essential to the wise conduct of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. The committee did not think the burden was upon it to show why the Marine Corps should not be increased. The burden is on the advocates of the increase. The committee did not think that under present conditions 500 men, including the lower grades of officers, were imperatively needed now by the Marine Corps. They did not believe they were so much needed as the thousand men for the enlisted part of the Navy given last year or the thousand men given in the bill for this year. It was thought, comparing the two together, that this matter could wait. The impression, I think, was general in the committee in reporting the bill, that the reasons for the increased expense were not sufficient to justify us in putting it on.

Mr. CHANDLER. One presumption in favor of the amendment is that it has already been adopted by the House of Representatives.

Mr. HAWLEY. Not the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Not the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. The original proposition.

Mr. HALE. Not the amendment; the original clause.

Mr. HAWLEY. The provision for the increase comes from the other House.

Mr. CHANDLER. The proposition to increase the noncommissioned officers and privates in the Marine Corps met the favor of the House of Representatives. The Senate committee proposes to strike out the increase. The necessity for the increase is proved by the increase in the number of our ships. The Marine Corps are the soldiers of the Navy, and it is important that we should have in every naval station a good strong company of marines. It is important that we should have upon every vessel of the Navy a strong, well-filled company of marines. These marines are wanted for the battle ships, the large cruisers we have built which are going upon the ocean, to be a credit to the country in every way, and just as much as we want the increase in seamen so we want the increase of 500 marines. The other House and its committee have studied this subject carefully, and they believe that considering the growth of the Navy this increase in the Marine Corps ought to be acceded to.

No additional officers are provided for. There is no increase of captains and lieutenants, but only of noncommissioned officers and privates. The increase of the ships of the Navy is such that if we are to man the various vessels which we propose to send out to the world to our national credit as they ought to be manned, we should have the additional 500 marines. They are just as much a necessity as the increase of the number of seamen of the Navy.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that the Secretary of the Navy informed the House committee that this is an absolutely essential addition; that it is impossible for the present force to do the work required of the Marine Corps.

Mr. HALE. He did not make that statement to the Senate committee.

Mr. LODGE. I am informed that the statement was made in writing to the House committee.

Mr. HALE. The committee of the Senate asked the Secretary which he considered the more essential or the essential thing in the force of the Navy, and he said the enlisted men in the line of the Navy rather than the Marine Corps. I do not mean by that that he was not in favor of an increase of the Marine Corps, but, taking the two together, he stated that the essential thing was the other and not this.

Mr. LODGE. I do not mean to say that the Secretary did not consider the seamen more essential than the Marine Corps, but if the Marine Corps is to be maintained, and in his report he argues very strongly in favor of maintaining it—I understand he formally wrote to the House committee that it was absolutely essential to have this addition.

The Marine Corps is the police of the Navy, both on the ships and at the yards. The increase of the Navy necessarily requires a larger force of marines. There has been no addition to the force since this large increase in the Navy has been made, and they are really becoming every day more and more unable to perform the necessary work. That is, the Department either have to send ships to sea without the marines or they have to leave the Government property, the yards, unprotected. If the Marine Corps is to be kept up at all, and I suppose it is, because all the best judges concede it to be a very important branch of the Navy, it seems to me we ought certainly to make it able to perform the duties which it is called upon to perform.

It may also be said in regard to the Marine Corps that under the conditions on the new ships the marines are able to perform many duties which they were unable to do upon the old ships. The privates and officers of the Marine Corps can be trained to handle and work the guns, so that a sufficient force of marines on board ships not only supplies the Marine Corps and takes care of police duties, but it is also to a certain extent able to perform duties of seamen and in that way prevent a further increase in that direction. It seems to me that if the Corps is to be kept up at all we should follow the provision of the House, made after careful deliberation and full hearing of the Secretary and the commandant of the Marine Corps, and give the increase asked for, which is not an excessive one.

Mr. MILLS. Why would it not be a good idea to divide up the increase between the seamen and the marines, giving 500 to each?

Mr. LODGE. We have already given the increase as to seamen.

Mr. BACON. If I am not mistaken in my recollection—and if I am the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and other members of the committee will correct me—the Secretary of the Navy communicated to the Naval Affairs Committee what were the wants of the Navy with reference to the increase of seamen. The numbers and the reasons were stated by him, and if I recollect correctly there was no statement made by the Secretary of the Navy, either then or at any other time, to the Naval Affairs Committee to the effect that an additional number of marines was desired for the service of the Navy. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], or the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], or the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], all of whom were present at the time, will correct me if I am in error about the matter.

Mr. HALE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not hear his statement.

Mr. BACON. I stated to the Senator that the Secretary of the Navy had communicated with the Naval Committee upon the subject of what increased number of seamen were needed, and that while he stated the number of seamen that were needed, he did not state that any increased number of marines were required.

Mr. HALE. The communication the Senator refers to was, as I understand, limited to an increase of the enlisted men of the Navy, and did not refer to this.

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have here a communication sent to the House committee by the Secretary of the Navy, in which he says:

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith copy of a letter from the Colonel Commandant of the United States Marine Corps, calling attention to his statements, and to request, for the reasons therein mentioned, that an appropriation be made to provide for 500 additional men in the Marine Corps. The law already authorizes the enlistment of these men, so that only an appropriation is necessary.

Very respectfully,

H. A. HERBERT, Secretary.

Hon. C. A. BOUTELLE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

He indorses the report of the commandant, which I have here, and this report is at some length. He states, as I have said, that it is absolutely essential to have this additional increase of marines, and he asks also that some of them be immediately available, as the pressure is so great. He gives extracts from some of his published reports, in which he says, among other things:

The increased demand for sea service has rendered it necessary to so reduce the number of men on shore as to make it impossible to furnish sufficient men for guard duty at the different navy-yards without a severe strain upon the enlisted men.

Mr. HALE. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. LODGE. I am reading from the printed report of the commandant of the marines, indorsed by the Secretary of the Navy—

In fact this strain has been so great as to cause considerable dissatisfaction and discontent in the ranks, and has resulted in the corps losing many of its old soldiers, and to deter others from joining it. It is not an unusual occurrence for the enlisted men to be forty-eight hours on guard consecutively, with but twenty-four hours off, thus allowing them only one night in three to "sleep in." At no army post in this country is such severe guard duty performed.

These men are engaged directly in the protection of Government property at every navy-yard in the country and at every naval station. They are the only police to guard that property, and when an order comes for them to go on board ship, they have to be taken from the yards, and the property of the Government is exposed, as there is no other police to protect it. They have not got enough to meet the quotas which are required for the new ships which are coming into commission every day. Unless the Senate is prepared to enter upon the policy of abolishing the Marine Corps, which would be a very violent step, which, I think, nobody recommends—if we are going to have the Government property properly guarded, we certainly ought to have the addition for which the commandant asks, and which the Secretary of the Navy has formally indorsed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. I will merely say in addition that the Secretary says—and I call attention to the fact—the law authorizes now 3,100 men, and all that is needed is the appropriation. It is not to authorize an enlistment of new men, but it is simply to carry out existing law.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Navy stated to us at the last session that he wanted an increase of a thousand sailors, which would cost half a million dollars a year. In this bill there is provision for an increase of 1,000 sailors in addition to those of last year, making the increase of sailors 2,000, and there is also an increase of 500 marines. I understand the Department prefers the increase of the number of sailors rather than of the Marine Corps, if they can not have both; but it is due to the Secretary to say that he would like to have 2,000 sailors and 500 marines, so as to have our Navy on a war footing in a time of peace.

I understand there is very great division of sentiment among the officers of the Navy as to the propriety of increasing the sailors and marines, some holding that the marines on these great ships are of more use than the sailors. They are certainly cheaper. The Committee on Appropriations has not agreed with that recommendation, and thought it unwise at this time to give 1,500 additional men to the Navy. Therefore I trust that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CHANDLER. There may be some difference of opinion among naval officers as to the propriety of standing by the Marine Corps, but there seems to be no hesitancy on the part of the present Secretary of the Navy, who at this time is in some disfavor with the Senator from Maryland—

Mr. GORMAN. Not at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. As to the wisdom of keeping up the Marine Corps. The Secretary devotes a page of his report to the Marine Corps, and I will quote only one sentence:

There has always been more or less objection on the part of some officers of the Navy to marines on board ship, but as marines have constituted a part of our naval establishment both on shore and at sea from its infancy, it may fairly be presumed that experience has, in the opinion of those who control, demonstrated the wisdom of maintaining this branch of the service.

Then the Secretary proceeds to argue at length, and says in conclusion:

For these and other reasons the Department decided to put 60 marines and 2 marine officers on board the Indiana, and it will put marines on the other battle ships as they are severally commissioned.

This country is not reduced, Mr. President, to such a petty strait, even under the present Administration of the Government, which it seems necessary for the Republicans all the time to defend from Democratic attacks, that it can not, in connection with the increase of its Navy, authorize the 500 marines who are now needed.

Mr. President, two-thirds of this country thirty years ago expended $5,000,000,000 and ran into debt $2,700,000,000, and it did not distress it half so much as the Senator from Maryland seems to be distressed to-day on the question of whether we shall expend $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 more or less now because we have not money in the Treasury to pay the bills. The country expects that Congress will provide for the national defense here and now, not extravagantly, not recklessly, but judiciously and appropriately; and when appropriations are made, somehow or other—either by President Cleveland or Secretary Carlisle or in some other way—the money will be provided, and all this discussion about the condition of the Treasury which has been indulged in in connection with this bill seems to me to be out of place. I repeat, it is pitiful to think that we are to be told that we can not give 500 additional marines, if they are needed to complete the corps, because there is not money enough in the Treasury to do it, when the Senator from Maryland is going back to his Republican State to tell the people there that he did succeed in saving two battle ships—$10,000,000.

Mr. BACON. I simply wish to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that we had a very different system of finance at the time to which he refers.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, so that we may know about this matter, if there is any pressing necessity to increase the Marine Corps until the battle ships are constructed? It will take, as I understand, some two or three years to construct them and to put them in a condition where they will be fit to be armed and manned. Why start at this time, three years in advance, to increase the Marine Corps?

I want to observe in connection with this question, so that the RECORD may contain it and it may appear as part of the proceedings here, that it occurs to me that this is part of the old scheme by which the people of this country have been buncoed for the last twenty-five or thirty years, of making lavish appropriations and lavish contracts for the Army and the Navy, and for other Departments of the Government, with the ulterior purpose, and possibly with the sole purpose, of laying the foundation to increase the burdens of taxation upon the people to meet those obligations.

I believe there is no necessity for any increase of these marines, and I do not think there is the slightest necessity for an increase of the Navy at this time—the naval force.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. Let that apply also to the amendment on page 45.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next reserved amendment reported from the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 45, after line 18, to strike out down to and including line 23, as follows:

For 500 noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates, to be enlisted in accordance with the provisions of section 1596, Revised Statutes, §30,612.75, to be immediately available.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the amendment after line 2, on page 46, be rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 46, after line 2, it is proposed to strike out from line 3 to line 7, as follows:

For 500 noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates, to be enlisted in accordance with the provisions of section 1596, Revised Statutes, §17,255, to be immediately available.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. Now let the amendment on page 50, from line 10 to line 15, be rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, after line 9, it is proposed to strike out as follows:

For iron bedsteads, mattresses, mattress covers, pillows, clothing boxes, and other articles for 500 noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates, to be enlisted in accordance with the provisions of section 1596, Revised Statutes, $3,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. I believe the Senator from Maryland has a committee amendment to offer.

Mr. GORMAN. I offer an amendment from the Committee on Appropriations, to come in at the end of line 17, on page 2.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after the word "action," in line 17, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That such surgeons in the Navy not in line of promotion as may have been appointed to that position in accordance with a special act of Congress for meritorious services during yellow-fever epidemics shall have all the benefits of their previous service in the same manner as if said appointments were a reentry into the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I offer, by request, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, after line 19, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War shall first cause to be tested the improved battle-ship armor and method of working the guns of W. W. Hubbell, together with his dynamite shells and armor-piercing shot in the high-power guns, which, it appears, he first invented and proposed in 1883 and 1884 to the Senate Select Committee on Heavy Ordnance, reported by them and now adopted in the Navy and Army, the armor to be used in place of the armor now being made when it proves superior in resistance or less in weight of equal resistance; and appoint a board of officers and report to Congress what is a just compensation to said Hubbell for his invention and proposal of said high-power steel guns now used, said armor for battle ships, method of working the guns, and said shells and shot, or either of them, for the secret or the public service of the United States Navy and Army.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SQUIRE. I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in on line 13, page 21, after the words "sixty thousand dollars."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 13, on page 21, it is proposed to insert—

Machinery for said shops, $25,000.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement very briefly on this matter. I suppose a point of order can be raised on the amendment. I do not find in the report of the Secretary of the Navy that there is a specific recommendation of an appropriation for this amount; but I think it is right and proper that the statement should be made to the Senate, and I hope the committee will allow the amendment to come in without raising the point of order. I have here a very brief dispatch from the Secretary of the Navy, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, April 20, 1896.

Hon. WATSON C. SQUIRE:

In reply to your inquiry asking how much it will cost for machinery for the new shop provided for in the pending naval appropriation bill at the naval station, Port Orchard, Puget Sound, and also if the Department had the money, could it equip this shop during the coming fiscal year with such machinery, I have to say that it would cost $25,000 to furnish the shop with proper machinery, and that the same could be put in there by Department during the coming fiscal year.

W. MCADOO, Acting Secretary.

I would also, in this connection, by permission of the Senator having charge of this bill, present a letter from the Navy Department, dated May 1, 1896, which, with the permission of the Senate, I will read:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 1, 1896.

SIR: In reply to inquiries of Hon. WATSON C. SQUIRE, United States Senator from Washington, the Department telegraphed to him that if $25,000 was appropriated in the present bill for the purpose of equipping the new machine shop at Port Orchard, Puget Sound, the machinery would be placed in there during the coming fiscal year. If the appropriation for the shop now in the bill carries work will be immediately commenced on it after the 1st of July, and it will be very speedily completed. If the bill also carried an appropriation for machinery the Department would have the same ready for the shop when it was completed.

An estimate in detail for ship fitters and machine-shop tools, amounting to $31,628, is inclosed herewith. As will be seen, the estimate is made by the Chief Constructor, the shop in question being for the use of the Bureau of Construction and Repair. The dock at Port Orchard, now completed, is one of the largest and most efficient in possession of the Government.

Very respectfully,

W. MCADOO, Acting Secretary.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

Here is a list, which I do not suppose it is necessary to read, prepared with great care, signed by Philip Hichborn, Chief Constructor, United States Navy, which amounts in the total to $31,628; which I shall insert in my remarks:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR, May 1, 1896.

1 No. 2 Universal trimmer.....	84.00
1 46-inch grindstone, 4-inch face.....	55.00
1 No. 3 self-feed saw table.....	345.00
Total.....	5,538.00

Grand total..... 31,628.00

The above does not include plumbers' and coppersmiths' appliances, hand tools, dry dock, and general outside outfit, etc., these being more in the nature of stores or supplies which would be provided out of the current annual appropriation.

PHILIP HICHBORN,
Chief Constructor, United States Navy.

I have here a newspaper, the Post-Intelligencer, printed in Seattle April 23, giving an account of the successful testing of the great dry dock at Puget Sound, illustrating this great dry dock, and showing the dock as it appears with a vessel after it enters the dock. I do not desire to do more than simply call attention to the fact that this great dock, which has been the subject of appropriations during the past three Congresses, has just been completed. I have taken the greatest interest in securing the appropriations for this dry dock from first to last. At last the efforts put forth have been crowned with success, and I have a right to be proud of it. It is the greatest naval dry dock in the United States, and one of the two or three greatest in the world. At this juncture that dock has been accepted, and it is found to be all right, and yet it is without any machinery for its shops. It is provided in the present bill—

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President—

Mr. SQUIRE. Let me finish this sentence, if the Senator please.

Mr. ALLEN. I make the suggestion of the propriety of the Senator sending his documents to the Secretary's desk and having them read. I should like to hear them.

Mr. SQUIRE. I do not desire to inflict details of that kind on the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Washington has expired.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask unanimous consent to say a word or two more.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will withhold unanimous consent unless the Senator allows me to ask him a question, and if he consents I shall interpose no objection to his going on as many five minutes as he likes.

Mr. SQUIRE. Very well.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask the Senator from Washington this question: He says at this juncture it is found that this magnificent dock has no machinery. I see by this bill the Senator gets $101,000 for the State of Washington. Is the Senator not willing to chop off $25,000 of the $101,000 he has got, and put that into machinery, so that the aggregate appropriation will still be $101,000, and yet he will still get $25,000 for machinery? Is not that possible?

Mr. SQUIRE. I thank the Senator from Colorado for his suggestion.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am in hearty sympathy with what the Senator desires.

Mr. SQUIRE. We wish to have the machinery, but I doubt whether it would be wise to diminish the appropriations for other purposes named in the bill. With reference to the naval station at Puget Sound, let me call attention to what the Senator from Colorado refers. The bill states:

Dry dock, Puget Sound Naval Station, Wash.: For construction and repair shops at dry dock, $60,000; storehouse, $20,000; two steel tanks, $11,980; water main, and purchase of land adjoining station containing a spring for water supply, $4,000; clearing the grounds about the station, $5,250; in all, $101,230.

I do not believe it is wise to undertake to change any of the figures as they are already in the bill, and it seems very evident to me that it is unwise to go without proper machinery for the shops. The committee have passed upon that part of the bill which calls for the construction of shops to cost $60,000, and yet this great shop erected there is not to have any machinery. It seems very strange to me, and I do not understand for what purpose it is necessary to build shops and not put machinery in them.

I asked of the Chief Naval Constructor what they could do with this shop, and they said they could store paint there. What can they do with this dry dock which is without any machinery for repairing vessels? What can they do with it except simply to scrape the bottoms of ships and paint them? The Monterey has just been docked. It is in the dock at present, to remain a few days to be painted, and yet nothing can be done without the assistance of a private concern if there happens to be anything out of order about her machinery, the steering apparatus, or what not. It appears to me that this matter of an appropriation for machinery has been unintentionally omitted in the regular estimates of the Secretary of the Navy, and I think the estimate now made by the Department of $25,000 is so small that I shall ask the Senator in charge of the bill not to make the point of order, but to admit the amendment.

Mr. HALE. We could get at it in a way which would be entirely satisfactory to the Senator if he did not exceed his five minutes, though we are always glad to listen to him, no matter how long.

Mr. SQUIRE. Thank you.

Mr. HALE. We could take this amount out of the buildings provided for.

Mr. SQUIRE. If you want to have machinery, you require the buildings; otherwise you can not have a place wherein to put your machinery.

Mr. FRYE. There is another way, from the success which the Senator has had on the river and harbor bill, which I suggest to him, which is that he offer his amendment to that bill. He can get it in there without the slightest difficulty.

Mr. HALE. How much has the Senator from Washington got in that bill?

Mr. FRYE. Only two or three million dollars.

Mr. HALE. For his State?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; that is all.

Mr. SQUIRE. I think the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, does too great honor to my humble efforts by his statement in connection with the public works in my State; but I think he speaks in a very sportive mood when he talks about my having secured so much, because no such amount has been secured by me in that bill, although it is true that two important contracts are provided for, besides only about $355,000 in all actually appropriated in the bill ($100,000 of this amount is conditioned on the right of way being obtained free of cost to the United States); and this for a State that has many important rivers and harbors; and, having only recently come into the Union, it has never hitherto had any large appropriations for river and harbor improvements, and only about $497,350 in all hitherto for that purpose from the beginning of time. Of course this does not include the amounts to be counted under the head of "Oregon and Washington."

I fail to see how anyone can express any jealousy on that point; and the little that has been obtained for rivers and harbors ought not to affect the question of furnishing machinery for the completed dry dock.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote, and dispose of the matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 15, on page 50, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the contracts for the construction of said ships shall be payable in silver coin of the standard prescribed in the laws or in United States Treasury notes of full legal tender, redeemable at the option of the Government in gold or silver coin of the standard now prescribed by law.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, a great deal was said here yesterday by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] about the necessity of issuing bonds. I have voted for every provision of this bill for the increase of the Navy. We have nothing provided for the South, not even the building of one ship, for which there is an imperative necessity. We are very unanimously of opinion in all that section of the country that it is not necessary to issue bonds of the United States bearing interest, but that the silver coin of the United States and the Treasury notes should be accepted for all contracts which may be required by law. I should like to have a vote on that proposition.

Mr. HALE. I raise the point of order, of course, that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. CALL. What is the point of order?

Mr. HALE. It is absolutely new, and very general legislation. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALL. When a proposition is made that contracts shall be paid for in lawful money of the United States, it is very singular to say that is new legislation. That is the law now. It is no change of the law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine makes the point of order against the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida that it is new legislation. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BACON. There is an amendment which was offered by me several days ago by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to come in on page 52, at the end of line 15, which I ask may be now considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 15, on page 52, it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That in case the Secretary of the Navy shall make separate contracts for the armor and armor plate for said battle ships, he shall not accept bids at a rate exceeding an average of $350 per ton of 2,240 pounds; and in case the said Secretary can not make contracts for said armor and armor plate within said limit he shall delay action and report the offers made to the next session of Congress.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I desire, with the assent of the Senator in charge of the bill, to offer an amendment, to come in on page 37, after line 2.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after line 2, on page 37, the following:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to transfer to the Enterprise one of the two boilers of the Galena, now at the navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H.: Provided, That all expenses incurred in the installation of such boiler in the Enterprise shall be borne by the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask an explanation of that amendment. I am unfamiliar with its provisions.

Mr. LODGE. I can state it very easily. The Enterprise is a Government ship, lent to the State of Massachusetts for a nautical training school by the Government. She is a very old ship, and her boilers are entirely worn out. At Portsmouth there are lying two old boilers belonging to the Galena or to one of the vessels of the Galena class. They can not be used in any other ship; they are entirely useless to the Government; and all I ask is for the Secretary of the Navy to have authority to put this Government boiler in a Government ship at no expense to the Government whatever.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was a little suspicious about the amendment, for the reason that Massachusetts a little while ago undertook to take the Constitution from us. I think they ought to have these boilers, but we are going to keep the Constitution so long as we can.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted on page 2, after the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] a day or two ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment already adopted on page 2, it is proposed to insert:

But no officer is to be paid from these nor subsequent appropriations, as on the retired list, after the disability for which he was placed there has ceased; whereupon, under his existing commission, he shall resume duty on the active list when the next vacancy occurs in his grade: Provided, That his recovery be verified by a board's examination, and also that he be found to have no other disability.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that here is a very violent change of existing law. After a naval officer gets upon the retired list by the various processes through which naval officers are retired, he stays there so long as he lives, and can not get back upon the active list except by a special act of Congress.

While the point the Senator presents is worthy of consideration, whether some of these retired officers ought to be there, whether they may not have recovered from their disabilities, whether they might not under proper conditions be restored to the active list, yet it is a very radical and, as I have said, a very violent change of existing law, and I wish the Senator would withhold his amendment until it can be taken up as a separate measure.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will indulge me just a moment to make a brief statement about this matter. The amendment, in my judgment, is one of very great merit and I hope it will not be disposed of upon a mere question of parliamentary law, as the great question of the free coinage of silver was disposed of a moment ago. I have had occasion to talk with some of these retired naval officers, and if the statements which have been made to me are true—and I have no doubt that many of them are true—they show a singular condition in our naval affairs at this time.

I was talking but a day or two ago with an officer who was retired as lieutenant-commander, if that is the title, in consequence of exhaustion produced by disease before he had fully recovered from the disease, and he is now entirely recovered and as strong as he ever was. He is a strong, robust man, and yet, in consequence of that retirement through the action of a retiring board, he is unable to get back upon the active list, although he is a vigorous and competent man evidently from his appearance and from his apparent education and experience.

Now, what should be the policy of the Government in reference to this class of officers? I assume that it is the true policy of the Government, if it is to be honestly administered, to keep these men in active service as long as they are competent to discharge the duties which are imposed upon them by virtue of their official positions, and when a man has been retired by a retiring board in consequence of some temporary accident or temporary sickness and recovers his health, or recovers from that accident, it should not be the policy of Congress or the executive department to keep that man upon the retired list.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to say that an officer can not be retired for temporary sickness, for an acute sickness. He can only be retired for a permanent physical disability, a disability adjudged to be permanent by the naval surgeons. To be sure, he may recover; but there are not many such cases as the Senator describes, if there are any.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I observe wherever there is a desire to do a thing you can always find a way to do it. There is no doubt about that. The proposed amendment provides that an officer who has been retired by the action of a retiring board, whoever he may be—I know nothing about these officers—shall be entitled to resume his duties upon the active list when the next vacancy occurs in his grade after he has been reexamined and passed muster before the retiring board, and only when they pass upon the fact and find that he is physically and mentally fit and competent to resume his duties.

Now, let me make the statement about this matter a little more complete. These men are met by a certain class of officers called juniors, as I am informed, young men who have come into the naval service since their retirement, and in consequence of their retirement from active duty by the retiring board the juniors have been promoted in their places. That class of men are fighting and antagonizing the reinstatement of the retired officers, so as to prevent them from resuming their places in the naval service of the Government of the United States. That influence is to be felt here. I was warned of that when I introduced the proposed amendment. I knew it would be antagonized. I knew this junior influence, as it is called, would make its appearance in this Chamber and antagonize the amendment upon a point of order or in some other form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator that his time has expired.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to finish my statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me make an additional statement of information that has come to my attention within the last few days in reference to this matter, and which I think the country ought to know; at least I want the people out in the interior of the country to understand it. Many of these junior officers, as they are called, who are forcing their superior officers out of the Navy, have accepted leaves of absence and are to-day drawing pay from the Government and holding their positions in the naval service of the country, and are at the same time in the employment of great corporations in the country and receiving pay superior to their pay as naval officers. They have obtained leaves of absence from headquarters, wherever that may be, for an indefinite period of time for the express purpose of going into the employment of private corporations and receiving salaries from them, drawing the full pay of a naval officer from the Government of the United States and drawing the full pay of an employee of a private corporation at the same time, and these men, to hold their positions, are keeping retired officers who are competent to reenter the active service out of the naval service.

Mr. President, this is wrong. I do not care who practices it, it is wrong. It is not only wrong, but it is absolute and downright dishonesty in any Department that will permit it with a full knowledge of its ramifications and its existence. This is all I desire to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me this is very general legislation and of very sweeping character to put in an amendment without more discussion, affecting a whole class of officers. I make the point of order that the amendment is out of order, that it is new legislation, and that it changes existing law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert after the amendment adopted, to follow line 23, page 2:

But no officer is to be paid from these nor subsequent appropriations, as on the retired list, after the disability for which he was placed there has ceased; whereupon, under his existing commission, he shall resume duty on the active list when the next vacancy occurs in his grade: Provided, That his recovery be verified by a board's examination, and also that he be found to have no other disability.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish to give a notice. The hour is late, and I have been requested by several Senators to insist upon the five-minute rule. I shall be obliged to hereafter object to any extension of time.

Mr. HILL. On page 38 I offer an amendment which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert on page 38, line 10, after the word "physics":

And one of English studies, history, and law, after thirty years' service.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The SECRETARY. Insert in line 10, after the word "physics," page 38:

And one of English studies, history, and law, after thirty years' service.

So as to read:

Pay of professors and others, Naval Academy: For one professor of mathematics, one of chemistry, and one of physics, and one of English studies, history, and law, after thirty years' service, at $2,500 each.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. HILL. It simply raises $300 the salary of the professor in English studies, history, and law, after thirty years' service. It is a very proper and just amendment, in my judgment, and I have investigated the question.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has sent to the desk other amendments, which will be stated in order.

Mr. HILL. The other amendments are simply to correct the number; that is all.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, strike out "six" and insert "five"; so as to read "five professors."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 12, before the words "of English studies," strike out "two" and insert "one"; so as to read:

For one professor of mathematics, one of chemistry, and one of physics, and one of English studies, history, and law after thirty years' service, at $2,500; five professors, namely, one of French and Spanish, one of English studies, history, and law, two of French, and one of drawing, at $2,300 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. At the end of the bill I think is a proper place for the amendment which I now offer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert as an additional section:

SEC. — That in order to provide for the safety of passengers on excursion steamers, and for the safety of yachtsmen and oarsmen taking part in regattas, amateur or professional, that may hereafter be held on navigable waters, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered in his discretion to detail revenue cutters to enforce such rules and regulations as may be adopted to insure the safety of passengers on said excursion steamers and the oarsmen and yachtsmen taking part in such regattas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move the amendment reported by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN], which I submitted a day or two ago, and I also move it in behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It comes in after the words "arming and equipping Naval Militia," in line 22.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the word "militia," in line 22, page 8, down to and including line 2, page 9, and insert:

For arms, accouterments, signal outfits, boats and their equipments, the printing of the necessary books of instruction for the Naval Militia of the various States, and for one clerk, at $1,200 per annum, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, $50,000.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator to strike out the provision for a clerk, and then I will not object to the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Senators will notice that the appropriation is now $50,000. There is no change in that. The clause is only changed in the language, and gives the authority to the Secretary of the Navy which he desires. I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, two letters from Acting Secretary McAdoo, one dated March 30, 1896, and the other April 10, 1896, with reference to the clerk.

The letters are as follows:

MARCH 30, 1896.

SIR: The Department begs leave to call attention to the item on page 8, line 14, of H. R. 7542, which has been reported to the Senate. As originally proposed by the Department, the paragraph was to read:

"Arming and equipping Naval Militia: For arms, accouterments, signal outfits, pulling boats and their equipments, the printing of the necessary books of instruction for the Naval Militia of the various States, and for one clerk at $1,200 per annum, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, $50,000."

The necessity for the wording of the appropriation as above is most pressing. The sum of money is that asked for by the Department.

Under the law only such boats, ships, their apparel and their equipments can be loaned as "are not suitable or required for general service." As a matter of fact, a boat which is not suitable for general service is really not fit to be issued to the Naval Militia. The value of the Naval Militia as a body depends upon utilizing them in work along shore and in the auxiliaries in time of war. They can only become familiar with the coast by service in pulling boats. It is an absolute necessity that they should become familiar with the signal code and signal methods used in both the Army and Navy. As the paragraph now stands in H. R. 7542, the available appropriation is so limited in its scope as to prevent the Department from getting the full value from the Naval Militia in return for all that the Government does for them.

The value of property in possession of the Naval Militia, loaned by the General Government, is now so large, and the correspondence with the States is so great, that a clerk is now an absolute necessity in this office to keep the records straight. The duties of the naval officer attached to this office require his absence in inspecting and cooperating with the Naval Militia organizations during a considerable portion of his time, and it is essential for the efficiency of the administration of the business of the Department with the Naval Militia that a clerk be set aside for the specific purpose.

Very respectfully,

WM. MCADOO, Assistant Secretary.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 10, 1896.

SIR: The Department has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the committee's communication of the 9th instant, inclosing a copy of an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. McMILLAN to the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, and requesting its views in regard to said amendment.

In reply I have to inform you that the proposed amendment fully accords with the views of the Department in regard to the matter of providing for the Naval Militia, and experience has demonstrated the fact that the services of a clerk are necessary to the proper administration by the Department of its duties in connection with the Naval Militia.

In this connection the attention of the committee is invited to the Annual Report of the Operations of the Naval Militia for the year 1895, pages 6 and 7, marked copy inclosed herewith.

Very respectfully,

W. MCADOO, Acting Secretary.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish the Senators who are upon the Appropriations Committee would consent to allow the provision for an additional clerk to go in. I think it ought to go in, because a special clerk for this work is desirable. If the business is assigned to some clerk who now has other duties it will not be done as well and as wisely as by a special clerk appointed for this purpose.

Mr. HALE. I do not think we ought to create an additional clerk. I move to strike out that part of the amendment which refers to an additional clerk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to amend the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I move to strike out, on page 2, lines 8 and 9, the words "one thousand" and insert "five hundred."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 8 and 9, strike out "one thousand" and insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enlist as many additional men as in his discretion he may deem necessary, not to exceed 500.

Mr. LODGE. That, I understand, is to cut down the seamen, which we have been told by the Senator in charge of the bill is the most important and essential provision the Secretary of the Navy has asked.

Mr. GORMAN. My reason for doing so is because we have by the votes of the Senate this afternoon increased the number of marines four or five hundred, and as the marines practically perform the same duties as the seamen, I move to reduce the number to 500, so as to make the total increase of the Navy 1,000. I trust even the Senator from New Hampshire will agree to this amendment.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. GORMAN. We might as well have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MILLS. My colleague [Mr. CHILTON] is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I do not know how either Senator would vote.

Mr. PALMER (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], with whom I have a general pair, did not vote. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CALL. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. I do not know how he would vote on this question.

Mr. BURROWS (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MARTIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I notice the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE] has not voted. I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. PASCO. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] that he exchange pairs with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER], so that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] will stand paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. That will be satisfactory to both Senators.

Mr. BURROWS. Very well; if that transfer is made my vote will stand, and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] is at liberty to vote.

Mr. PALMER. I vote "yea."

Mr. MARTIN. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Allen,	Butler,	Martin,	Pugh,
Bacon,	Daniel,	Mills,	Roach,
Baker,	George,	Palmer,	Vest,
Bate,	Gorman,	Pasco,	Vilas,
Berry,	Hill,	Peffer,	Walthall.

Cullom,	Irby,	Quay,	Wetmore,
Davis,	Jones, Ark.	Sewell,	Wolcott.
Elkins,	Jones, Nev.	Sherman,

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to reserve the amendments on page 22 for separate votes in the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to reserve the amendment on page 2, submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. PASCO. I was not in the Senate Chamber when the amendment on page 33 was voted on, and I ask for a separate vote on the amendment in the Senate. It is in reference to an experimental tank.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Florida will let that go, it can be fixed in conference.

Mr. PASCO. I would rather have it fixed on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. If it is fixed wrong here we shall be bound by it.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to reserve the right to offer the amendment heretofore offered by me, on page 2, with reference to retired naval officers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, other than those reserved, will be concurred in. They are concurred in. The question now is on concurring in the amendments on page 22, reserved by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire the attention of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to the amendments on page 22. The first amendment is an appropriation of $8,000 to pave certain streets in Annapolis on Graveyard Creek, and the second directs the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy to inquire into the expediency of purchasing certain land adjoining the Naval Academy grounds. I am not certain that the United States ought not to pave those streets in Annapolis, and I am not sure that some provision as to the land, the expediency of acquiring which the Board of Visitors are to ascertain, ought not to be made by the Senate. But I should like to have some explanation of the Senator from Maryland.

The Naval Academy at Annapolis has been maintained at great expense to the United States. There has recently been connected with the Naval Academy grounds by the purchase of an intervening piece of ground the Naval Hospital grounds, covering 100 acres, more or less. I have been warmly in favor of these improvements as to the Naval Academy. I was earnestly in favor of acquiring the land that connected the Naval Hospital grounds, with the Naval Academy grounds. I am proud of the Naval Academy. I am not in favor of removing it to any other point in the United States. I should oppose its removal if it were ever attempted. During a short period in the war it was removed to Rhode Island, but it has been relocated at Annapolis; it is a credit to the nation, and I am opposed to removing it.

The Senator from Maryland also knows that I have been in favor of liberal appropriations for the Academy, but here is a proposition to pave certain streets in Annapolis which I infer are outside of the Naval Academy grounds. Here is also a direction to the Board of Visitors to report as to the expediency of acquiring a certain tract of land that is outside the present precincts of the Naval Academy. I hold in reserve the question, whatever may be the recommendation of the Board of Visitors, whether or not the Government ought to go outside of the present inclosure of the Naval Academy and buy this tract of land in the heart of the city of Annapolis, and I withhold my opinion upon that subject because I do not think Annapolis has done enough for the Naval Academy. Annapolis is not only the seat of the Naval Academy, but it is the capital of the State of Maryland, and it is not a capital for which the State of Maryland has done enough. It is not a capital for which its own citizens have done enough. The streets are all unpaved, and there are not sufficient streets for the capital of any State. There is also no hotel in Annapolis that is suitable either, I may say, for the accommodation of the citizens of the State of Maryland who go there when the legislature is in session or for the accommodation of visitors from all over the United States who go there to visit the Naval Academy. Here is a city not sufficiently paved, a city without a suitable hotel, and year after year we are called upon to make additional expenditures of the public money to benefit the city of Annapolis by increasing and beautifying the grounds and the buildings of the Naval Academy.

Now, at this hour, when the Senator from Maryland has proclaimed to us that of all the hours since the Republic was established we should worship at the shrine of economy, we are called upon to pave the streets of Annapolis and to buy a lot of ground outside of the walls of the Naval Academy and add it to the grounds of the Naval Academy, in order that we may beautify the city of Annapolis, which has never done enough for her own welfare, which has never had proper attention given to it by the great and prosperous and proud State of Maryland.

I shall not vote against concurring in these two amendments, although it is a singular proposition that we should pave the streets of Annapolis outside the walls of the Naval Academy. I shall not vote against the inquiry as to whether we need this piece of land, but I do say in all sincerity to the Senator from Maryland that hard as times are, short as we are of money in nation and in State, short as we are to remain of money in State and in nation until the Republican party is firmly seated in power both in the United States and in the State of Maryland, we ought not to make these appropriations unless there are some reasons for it submitted by the Senator from Maryland which have not been adduced. If the Senator can give good reasons for these clauses I shall vote for them. Otherwise I would prefer not to see them in the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, of course the Senate will understand that the Senator from New Hampshire has raised the question merely for the purpose of giving me a lecture.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not the Senator.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand and appreciate it thoroughly. It has given him an opportunity to call attention to a very small matter and to make a very big speech. The appropriation contained in this item, six or seven thousand dollars, whatever it may be, for paying a street adjoining the Naval Academy at Annapolis, grows out of a contract between the Secretary of the Navy and the city of Annapolis, by which that grand old city, a city established before the Revolution, around which cluster so many memories, in its poverty generously donated to the United States a part of the land embraced in this street and which is included in the Naval Academy. The Government of the United States, in consideration of this gift, contracted to pave the street and to make it a public highway leading from the Naval Academy proper to the Government property outside, known as the hospital. It is, therefore, the Government's property under a contract made without my knowledge, but it was a very generous affair on the part of the city of Annapolis.

As to the second proposition, to authorize the Board of Visitors to ascertain whether a certain piece of ground in front of the present Naval Academy should be acquired, I will state that it is the recommendation of the Department. It happens, as is the case with many harbors on the coast, that there have been some accretions in front of the Naval Academy, supposed to interfere somewhat with health, and the space is utilized by small fishing boats. The Government desires to acquire it so that the yard can be beautified and utilized to some extent. It is merely an inquiry.

I think the Senator from New Hampshire is aware of the fact that citizens of that town, though poor as compared with the great cities of the North, have been indeed generous to this Government. The first Capitol that you had in Washington was constructed by the money of the citizens of Maryland and of Virginia; and it has never been reimbursed, notwithstanding the wealth of this great Government. The modesty of the people of Annapolis and of Maryland is proverbial. We are not here to ask large appropriations on any account. While I have no doubt that the Senator from New Hampshire is in favor of maintaining the Naval Academy at Annapolis, I will state that the Academy has had no appropriations compared with West Point. It has been sadly neglected, and instead of complaining of a small appropriation of this sort, if the Academy is to be maintained anywhere in the country larger appropriations should be made, and it should be improved in every respect.

The Senator from New Hampshire twits me with representing a State that is now under Republican rule. It is so temporarily, Mr. President, by an accident; and I wish to state to the Senator that I can understand perfectly his vote for an increase of the Marine Corps, a part of which is located at Annapolis, for a large number of that force, I think, will be required to keep the Republican party in Maryland in order in the near future.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair). The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole on page 22, which have been reserved. The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. QUAY. I desire on behalf of my colleague [Mr. CAMERON] to offer an amendment, to come in on page 38, after line 6. It is an amendment which carries no appropriation, and on which I trust the Senator from Maine will not make a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The SECRETARY. On page 38, after line 6, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to audit and adjust the claim of the William Cramp & Sons Ship and Engine Building Company, of Philadelphia, Pa., against the Government of the United States for damages and losses sustained by the said company in the execution of the contract to construct and deliver the hull, engines, and machinery required for the United States battle ship Indiana, and for placing the armor, turrets, and other ordnance work on said battle ship; the said damages and losses being caused by the delays of the Government and changes of plans of the Government in the construction of the hull, engines, machinery, and placing of the armor and armament of the said battle ship Indiana, and to report to Congress at its next session what amount may be due to the said company.

Mr. HALE. The amendment is subject to a point of order, but instead of making a point of order I offer as a substitute for it a general provision. There is not only this claim, but four or five others which stand with it, and if this amendment is offered and goes on the others will insist on being treated in the same way. By direction of the committee I have prepared a general clause, which I move as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. I presume there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to examine claims against the Government which may be presented to him by contractors for the building of the hulls or machinery of naval vessels under contracts made for the same since January 1, 1891, where it is alleged that such contractors have been subjected to loss and damage through delays in the work under said contracts which were not the fault of said contractors but were the fault of the Government, and to report at the next session of Congress the result of said investigation, and whether said claims are, in his opinion, subjects for the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims or for the action of Congress upon the same.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection to the substitute.

Mr. HAWLEY. I make no objection to the substitute except that I would change the phraseology in one place. It says changes which are not the fault of the contractors, but the fault of the Government. I would suggest the words "due to the action of the Government." The Government may have been right.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that change. Let it read, "due to the action of the Government."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be modified as indicated by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that less than an hour ago a point of order was made upon a similar amendment offered by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and it was ruled out. I refer to the claim of Mr. Hurst.

Mr. HALE. I did not make the point of order. I voted for the claim. But these are very different from that one. I do not think these have as much merit. I was in favor of that claim and voted for it. I did not make any point of order on it. In this case we are simply giving the discretion or authority to the Secretary of the Navy to report on these claims, that they may come in afterwards to Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. So that they may be sent to the Court of Claims for examination?

Mr. HALE. It is in the alternative, either to the Court of Claims or to Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. I simply want to ask the Senator from Maine why a point of order is made upon similar claims and claims that are admitted to be equally, if not more meritorious—

Mr. HALE. Of course I can not tell why another Senator makes a point of order. I did not make it.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator hear me through? And why at the same time should the committee refuse to make a point of order upon these claims?

Mr. HALE. I think this is a better way to dispose of all of these matters than simply to strike out one of them on a point of order. I think it is better to let them all be brought into one hopper.

Mr. ALLEN. This is general legislation upon an appropriation bill and vulnerable to Rule XVI. It has not received the sanction of any committee, either. It is equally objectionable on that ground.

Mr. HALE. The Senator can make the point of order against the amendment if he chooses.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator from Nebraska want to make the point of order?

Mr. ALLEN. I will not make the point of order. If I can not defeat a man without making a point of order on him I will not defeat him at all. That is a good deal like a man going into court and making a special appearance and dodging and undertaking to avoid litigation. I simply wish to emphasize the fact that the bill has been loaded down—and if it does not smell, it will before a great while—by amendment after amendment by favoritism. I do not, however, charge the committee with anything of that kind. I credit the committee with higher motives. But the bill reeks with favoritism and with jobbery from top to bottom and in the center, from cuticle to core and from core to cuticle. Whenever a meritorious claim has been presented, such as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] presented here, some Senator who is seeking to have some advantage on the bill rises gravely and calls the attention of the Presiding Officer to the fact that it is in violation of Rule XVI, and announces in sepulchral tones that he makes the point of order. But whenever a proposed amendment comes from some other source that has some interest to subserve, the point of order is deftly avoided. Neither the committee nor any member of the committee makes it. No Senator who seems to be protecting the bill undertakes to make it. The bill is permitted to be loaded down by favorite amendments.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. My understanding is that the substitute proposed by the Senator from Maine comes from the committee.

Mr. HALE. The substitute was drawn at the suggestion and by direction of the committee—

Mr. QUAY. Yes.

Mr. HALE. To be submitted provided these claims were offered. We wanted to bring them to a head.

Mr. QUAY. So the substitute of the Senator from Maine is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. ALLEN. It has never been passed upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that the point of order has been raised either against the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] or the substitute proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HALE. No; that is my understanding.

Mr. ALLEN. I am simply protesting against the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair understands.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not raise any point of order. I announced that I would not raise the point of order. I think it is absolutely cowardly to raise the point of order. It is the part of cowardice. A man never raises a point of order unless he is afraid to meet the merits of an amendment or a bill. It is a species of crawfishing so as to get away from something that is meritorious. No really brave man ever raised a point of order upon a meritorious measure. No generous lawyer or litigant ever came into court and said, "The process has not been properly served upon me, and therefore I appear here for the purpose of saying I do not appear." It is a species of pettifoggery that I do not propose myself to indulge in. I want to emphasize the fact that this point of order is continually used at times to pare out obnoxious amendments and at other times it is not made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I reserved an amendment on page 2, but for reasons which are sufficient for me, while I am very greatly opposed to the amendment, I will not insist upon a separate vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment then will be concurred in without objection.

Mr. ALLEN. I reserved an amendment on page 2, which I send to the desk, and ask that it be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment adopted on page 2, after line 23, it is proposed to insert:

But no officer is to be paid from these nor subsequent appropriations, as on the retired list, after the disability for which he was placed there has ceased; whereupon, under his existing commission, he shall resume duty on the active list when the next vacancy occurs in his grade: Provided, That his recovery be verified by a board's examination and also that he be found to have no other disability.

Mr. CHANDLER. That amendment may have been reserved, but it was only reserved by the Senator from Nebraska himself. It was ruled out on a point of order.

Mr. ALLEN. How is that, Mr. President?

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the Senator's amendment was ruled out of order when moved as in Committee of the Whole on a point of order.

Mr. ALLEN. But I have the right to offer it here.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly; but not as a reserved amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from New Hampshire makes the point of order on it, I will admit the point of order is well taken.

Mr. CHANDLER. It does require a good deal of courage to make a point of order after the Senator's disquisition here upon that subject. He said it is cowardly to make a point of order. I respectfully differ with the Senator. The rules are made to be observed upon the suggestion of any Senator—

Mr. ALLEN. And are constantly violated.

Mr. CHANDLER. And when any Senator in this body appeals to the rules, and asks that they may be observed, it is his privilege to do so, and it is not cowardly and ought not to be the subject of comment at any time or under any circumstances. I resent the idea that any Senator should be criticised when he appeals for the observance of the rules of this body and refuses unanimous consent to have them dispensed with. Therefore, having the fear of the Senator's censure somewhat, but not overwhelmingly, in mind, I make the point of order on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the clerks at the desk that the point of order was made against this amendment when offered as in Committee of the Whole, and that that point of order was sustained.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the present occupant of the chair feel bound by the ruling of his predecessor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair does not, but the present occupant of the chair desires to say that the clerks at the desk inform him that the point of order was made against the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as in Committee of the Whole and was sustained. The Senator from Nebraska now renews the amendment in the Senate, and the Senator from New Hampshire renews the point of order made against it as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives there was a provision on page 33 for a model tank for the use of the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department. I ask that the paragraph on page 33 covering this matter may be read. By an amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations it was stricken out, and I wish the matter to be voted upon again in the Senate. After it shall have been read, I wish to present a few reasons why I think the clause which the Secretary will read should be retained in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out the following clause, beginning with line 3, on page 33:

For making plans, examining and preparing the ground, and other preliminary work toward the construction of a model tank, with all buildings and appliances, to be built upon the grounds of the old Observatory, Washington, D. C., under the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department, which shall conduct therein the work of investigating and determining the most suitable and desirable shapes and forms to be adopted for United States naval vessels, $7,500: Provided, That upon the authorization of the Secretary of the Navy experiments may be made at this establishment for private shipbuilders, who shall defray the cost of material and of labor of per diem employees for such experiments: And provided further, That the results of such private experiments shall be regarded as confidential and shall not be divulged without the consent of the shipbuilder for whom they may be made.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator that he had better move to amend the amendment by striking out that it shall be built upon the grounds of the old Observatory and inserting "at the Washington Navy-Yard." If an amendment of that character can be adopted, I should have no objection to the clause remaining in the bill. It is designed to appropriate the old Naval Observatory for a specific purpose; and I suggest that the Senator move, or, if he does not, I will move to strike out of the amendment the words providing that it shall be built at the old Naval Observatory and insert "at the navy-yard at Washington."

Mr. PASCO. Of course, Mr. President, it is proper that the text should be perfected before the motion to strike out is made. I make no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, as I do not undertake to determine the best location for the tank, but if the amendment be adopted the question of location can be settled in conference. I make no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida accepts the modification of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. PASCO. I have no authority to accept the amendment, but I do not object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the motion of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PASCO. The bill came here containing the paragraph which stands on page 33, which has been read. It was stricken out in Committee of the Whole. I desire to restore this paragraph from line 3 to line 19. The Senator from Maryland, before that motion is put, moves to amend in lines 5 and 6. That amendment is in order, and I will give way that it may be voted upon.

Mr. CALL. I should like to understand what the matter pending is. Let the Secretary state what is the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33 it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee, in line 6, by striking out the words "old Observatory" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "navy-yard at"; so as to read:

To be built upon the grounds of the navy-yard at Washington, D. C.

Mr. CALL. What is to be built?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the entire amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend so as to make the clause read:

For making plans, examining and preparing the ground and other preliminary work toward the construction of a model tank, with all buildings and appliances, to be built upon the grounds of the navy-yard at Washington, D. C., under the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department, which shall conduct therein the work of investigating and determining the most suitable and desirable shapes and forms to be adopted for United States naval vessels, $7,500: Provided, That upon the authorization of the Secretary of the Navy experiments may be made at this establishment for private shipbuilders, who shall defray the cost of material and of labor of per diem employees for such experiments: And provided further, That the results of such private experiments shall be regarded as confidential and shall not be divulged without the consent of the shipbuilder for whom they may be made.

Mr. CALL. Is it proposed to strike that out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is first upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. CALL. To strike that clause out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment is to strike out all of those lines which have been read by the Secretary. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment to the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. PASCO. An amendment to the original text of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment to the original text of the bill to locate the tank at the navy-yard instead of at the old Observatory. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. PASCO. No, Mr. President; the question recurs on the motion offered by the committee, to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the entire clause.

Mr. HALE. The amendment which has been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole should be nonconcurring in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HALE. To strike out the entire clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To strike out the entire clause.

Mr. HALE. There is no necessity for reading it again.

Mr. PASCO. If the amendment is to be rejected I shall have nothing further to say, but if it is to be insisted upon I wish to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few minutes.

Mr. HALE. I suggest, as an amendment has been made in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], that the Senate disagree to the amendment striking out the clause, which will leave it in the bill as amended on motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. PASCO. That will be satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves—

Mr. HALE. I do not need to move. The question is simply upon disagreeing to the amendment to strike out the clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to strike out the clause as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. PASCO. The motion of the committee is to strike out; and the question is whether or not the paragraph containing the provision for the model tank shall be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs leave to repeat that the question before the Senate is as to concurring in the committee amendment to strike out.

Mr. HALE. If we disagree to the amendment that leaves the clause in the bill as it is now amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senate shall disagree, the language will remain in the bill; otherwise it will be stricken out.

Mr. CALL. I should like the Senator to give us some reason for striking out the clause.

Mr. HALE. Nobody is asking to have it stricken out.

Mr. PASCO. We propose to vote down the motion to strike out.

Mr. HALE. I suggest that the Senate disagree to the amendment.

Mr. CALL. That would keep the provision for the tank in the bill?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. CALL. I should like to hear some reason why we should keep the tank in. I do not understand it, Mr. President, and I do not know where this idea comes from, or why it is necessary to build a tank to exhibit a little model of a ship. It seems to me that this is a very ill-advised idea. What possible use can there be for building a great tank to exhibit the models of ships when navy-yards all around the country have the ships themselves and models. There is something to be exhibited in the navy-yards, and there is nothing of any value to be exhibited in such a tank.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote.

Mr. PASCO. I will read the concluding sentence of a very interesting statement which I have from the chief of the Bureau, giving the advantages to result from the construction of this tank. I will ask that the whole statement be inserted in the RECORD, but I will only read the concluding paragraph. It is as follows:

Many advantages are realized from the results of these experiments. The most suitable form for a certain speed may be determined and the proper adjustment of power to form arranged. On the other hand, a ship having a given form, the most suitable speed can be selected at which it can be most economically propelled. The form and position of the waves created by the passage of a ship through the water at any speed may be determined. The settling or subsidence of the ship while running may be measured, this being an important feature in light-draft or low free-board vessels. The speed at which models may be run being relatively great, the performance of ships at higher speeds than have been realized may be predicted, and the possibilities of further advancement, so far as form is concerned, determined. Much power is frequently wasted in driving unsuitable forms at a high rate of speed, and waste of power involves both heavier machinery and boilers and increased coal consumption over what would be necessary with the proper form.

Mr. President, this tank has been recommended twice by the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and has been recommended by the Secretary of the Navy. If the experiments are carried on with its aid it will enable the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and those working with him to calculate with far greater accuracy the speed and performance of the large war vessels which we are now preparing to construct, and to make changes in the models when the experiments indicate that the speed and power of the vessels can be increased. I hope that the committee amendment striking the item out of the bill will not be concurred in.

I now ask leave that the paper from which I have read may be inserted in the RECORD in full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The paper referred to is as follows:

EXPERIMENTAL TANKS.

Experiments to determine the resistance of ships in advance of construction by towing models of the proposed ships were commenced by the late Dr. William Froude in 1872 in a tank built by him at Torquay. This tank was 280 feet long, 36 feet wide, and 10 feet deep, and in it experiments were carried on for the Admiralty, and in connection with the towing experiments with the Greyhound certain laws and deductions were established beyond question. Since the death of Dr. Froude in 1879 the work has been carried on by his son, Mr. R. E. Froude, and many useful and valuable results have been obtained, the designs of many proposed ships having been altered after model trials, notably in the case of the Polyphemus and the Medway class of gunboats, the deductions being afterwards verified by the performance of the vessels. In 1882 a tank of about the same dimensions and with practically identical appliances was constructed by Denny Bros., of Dunbarton, in which many thousands of experiments have been conducted with both engineering and commercial success, the tank having enabled them, as a case in point, to successfully construct a high-speed vessel for the Belgian Government under conditions so rigid that under ordinary circumstances surety of fulfilling them would have been impossible.

Mr. William Denny, one of the most progressive and well-informed Scotch shipbuilders, in a letter written in 1887 relative to the importance of the assistance that an experimental tank may render to the naval designer, expresses himself as follows:

"The truth is that of all the problems about a steamship the only one at the present moment incapable of being solved by a priori methods in extreme cases is that of the speed and power. No ability and no training will enable even the most skillful naval architect to overcome the want of an experimental tank in coping with these questions. My partners are so thoroughly convinced of the value of the tank that every one of them regards the large amount of money sunk in it in the form of a capital, and the large amount still to be sunk in it, as one of our best investments, and have met without grudging the annual outlay required for its administration."

The establishment of an experimental tank would not only benefit the naval service, but would greatly promote the shipbuilding interests of the country at large, by furnishing reliable information as to the future performance of new types of commercial vessels that would aid American shipbuilders to compete on more equal terms with foreign yards, in which similar information is already available.

The British Admiralty considered the results obtained so valuable that in 1886 a new tank was constructed at Haslar, near Portsmouth, and the apparatus at Torquay was removed to that place and installed there, with many improvements and additions, under the charge of Mr. R. E. Froude. The new tank is 400 feet long, 30 feet wide, and 9 feet deep, and commodious offices are attached with a view of entering extensively upon the work of experimental investigation. In 1889 an apparatus was constructed by the Italian Government at Spezia which is practically a duplicate of the British plant at Haslar, except that the tank is 500 feet long and 22 feet wide.

The latest apparatus constructed is that installed by the Russian Government at St. Petersburg in 1892. To duplicate such a plant, including cost of all apparatus and the necessary buildings, but exclusive of ground, would cost \$85,000. The primary object is to obtain the actual resistance of the model at a speed corresponding to the proposed speed of the full-sized ship. The speed at which the model is to be towed is ascertained by Froude's "Law of comparison," which is "for similar forms, corresponding speeds are as the square root of the length and resistance at corresponding speeds is as the cube of the length." As an illustration, supposing it is desired to ascertain the effective horsepower necessary to propel a certain proposed ship at a speed of 20 knots an hour. If a model is constructed one-twenty-fifth the size of the ship, then the speed at which it should be towed will be $\sqrt[3]{\frac{20}{25}} = 4$ knots an hour. Supposing the resistance at this speed is found to be 10 pounds, then the resistance of the ship will be $10 \times 25^3 = 156,250$ pounds. To ascertain the effective horsepower required it is only necessary to divide the expression for the work due to this resistance, given in foot pounds by 33,000; thus, $20 \times 156,250 = 3,125,000$ foot pounds per minute, and $\frac{3,125,000}{33,000} = 9,493$ effective horsepower required.

This result, after being corrected for density of water, surface friction of ship's skin, friction of engines, and efficiency of propellers, gives the actual indicated horsepower necessary to develop the required speed in the proposed ship. The experiments may develop the fact that the intended lines produce an abnormally high resistance, or are in some other way unsuitable, in which case the model is easily altered or a new one made, and the ship saved from probable failure.

In conducting the experiments absolute nicety of observation and measurement are required. The model is carefully ballasted to the exact draft and trim to correspond with the proposed displacement. These factors are observed by inserting needles at intervals around the proposed water line projecting horizontally, and the model is adjusted so that all the needles just break the water. In this condition the weight of the model plus the ballast should agree with the calculated displacement. In towing, the change of trim is carefully observed and automatically registered by the machine, and exact observation of the currents, caused by drafts of air and by the movement of the model, are made, and the general deductions corrected therefor. The models are made of paraffine wax, a material which seems well adapted for the purpose, in that it does not absorb water to change its weight, is easy to finish and make changes in it if necessary, and when the experiments with a given ship are finished, the material is remelted and used for others. They are cast in a clay mold made to cross sections of the proposed lines, allowing about a quarter of an inch all around for finishing. They are cored to allow a finished thickness of about 1 inch. The core is formed of a wooden framework covered with cloth and coated with a solution of clay to make it impervious to the melted paraffine, and is filled with water to prevent it being floated on the liquid wax, which is cast at a temperature of about 160°. After cooling, the model is placed in a specially devised machine, by which the lines of the half-breadth plan of the proposed ship are automatically copied on both sides of the model at their respective heights above the keel.

The model is rigidly held in a frame capable of vertical adjustment, and after being carefully set to the proper height for the line to be cut the attendant simply passes a tracer around the line on the drawing, which is placed on an attached drawing board. The cutting is accomplished by two rotary cutters, which are run at a high rate of speed and connected by a pantograph gear with the tracing arm. In this way the successive lines are cut, and the model is then taken from the machine, the material between the lines is removed and the model faired and smoothed by hand. It is then fitted with suitable interior strengthening and carefully weighed and ballasted, and is then ready to be placed in the dynamometric towing machine. This machine is placed on a truck which moves freely on rails located on the top of the side walls of the tank, the under side of the machine being about 18 inches above the water.

The model is so connected that while rigidly held against lateral deviation it is free to oscillate vertically and horizontally. The resistance is received on the short arm of a bell-crank lever and automatically traced to an enlarged scale on a sheet of cross-section paper wrapped on the surface of a cylinder. The same cylinder also records the time and distance run. The time pen records half seconds, and the distance pen records intervals of 10 feet, both being actuated by electric contacts. There are also cylinders at each end of the model for recording the change of trim by means of rods free to move vertically, their lower ends resting on the model. A secondary speed-recording register is also provided as a check, and a carriage is mounted in the rear of that containing the model dynamometric machine, fitted with another machine on similar principles, for testing the efficiency of model screw propellers, and also their efficiency in different positions relative to the hull of the ship. The truck is attached to an endless wire rope, moving over drums at each end of the tank, to which motion is given by a "Tower spherical engine," having a specially devised governor, capable of very delicate adjustment to any desired speed, from 50 to 1,000 feet per minute. The models are tested at varying speeds of small interval between certain fixed limits, and also at varying drafts of water and conditions of trim. The results, after being corrected, are plotted and curves drawn, giving in advance full data of just what the completed ship will do in all conditions with smooth water.

Many advantages are realized from the results of these experiments. The most suitable form for a certain speed may be determined and the proper adjustment of power to form arranged. On the other hand, a ship having a given form, the most suitable speed can be selected at which it can be most economically propelled. The form and position of the waves created by the passage of a ship through the water at any speed may be determined. The settling or subsidence of the ship while running may be measured, this being an important feature in light-draft or low-free-board vessels. The speed at which models may be run being relatively great, the performance of ships at higher speeds than have been realized may be predicted and the possibilities of further advancement, so far as form is concerned, determined. Much power is frequently wasted in driving unsuitable forms at a high rate of speed, and waste of power involves both heavier machinery and boilers and increased coal consumption over what would be necessary with the proper form. Displacement is often sacrificed to attain a certain speed when the same speed might have been realized with largely increased carrying capacity. Many other minor advantages might be specified. The time necessary to prepare a model from a given set of lines and make a complete record of resistances at varying speeds has been found to be about two days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was nonconcurrent in.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, I hope the bill may be passed. Mr. KYLE. I offer an amendment which was reserved in Committee of the Whole, at the end of line 13, on page 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 13, on page 7, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and required to pay, immediately, to the patentee the $25,000 appropriated in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1895, said act providing "for the exclusive rights to and for ordnance appliances now in use on naval vessels, and protected and covered by patent No. 533171, said patent being embraced in a contract dated January 28, 1893, and signed by the Secretary of the Navy and the patentee."

Mr. HALE. This is not a reserved amendment.

Mr. KYLE. I wish to state that this is an amendment heretofore offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and I do think it was misunderstood by the Senate at that time. It was ruled out under Rule XVI. Clause 4 of that rule is as follows:

No amendment the object of which is to provide for a private claim shall be received to any general appropriation bill unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

"The provisions of an existing law." The amendment states upon its face explicitly that this appropriation was provided for by the act of March 2, 1895. It is further stated, I believe, upon the face of the amendment that the patent embraces a contract made by the Secretary of the Navy January 28, 1893. Therefore the appropriation of $25,000 under this amendment is nothing more nor less than the carrying out of the contract to which I have just referred. It seems to me that the point of order does not lie against the amendment as being a private claim.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we discussed this amendment while we were acting as in Committee of the Whole. The existing law is that the claim is to be paid at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, and this amendment proposes to make him pay it without discretion. The point of order was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who is not here now, and in his absence I make the point of order again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts makes the point of order against the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HALE. Now, I ask that the bill be put on its passage.

Mr. GORMAN. I gave notice two or three days since, during the discussion of this bill, that before its conclusion I should offer an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of indebtedness in denominations of 50s, 100s, and 1,000s, bearing 3 per cent interest, stating that I believed that the appropriations made it absolutely necessary for Congress to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue that class of certificates, which would probably prevent the issuing of any more bonds to pay current expenses. I fully intended to offer the amendment; but after the agreement which was made yesterday, that debate should be limited to five minutes on the part of each Senator after 2 o'clock to-day, it would be impossible under that limitation to properly discuss the proposition; and, therefore, I shall reserve it until the fortifications appropriations bill is considered by the Senate, when I expect to present it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment. If there be no further amendments the question is upon the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.

Mr. HILL. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to pass a little bill to donate condemned cannon to a village in my State. There is to be a celebration at the place next week; where the cannon are desired, and to be of any avail the bill should be passed at once. It is House bill No. 3544, and I think will take but a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, which will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 3544) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish not more than four pieces of condemned cannon to the village of New Rochelle, N. Y.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PEPPER. I do not object, provided the bill does not displace the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF THE RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to give notice that I shall ask the Senate immediately after the conclusion of the routine business on Monday morning to proceed to the consideration of what is known as the river and harbor bill.

Mr. QUAY. I should be glad to have Senate bill No. 2522, in relation to the Alaska Transportation and Trading Company, taken up and passed, if there be no objection. It has been heretofore read at length.

Mr. DUBOIS. I think the bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. We have had a similar bill before the committee. It is quite an important matter, and members of the committee have asked me—

Mr. QUAY. I withdraw the request.

Mr. VILAS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 4, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 2, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HENDERSON. I call for the regular order, and move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. PAYNE in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8110) to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to move an amendment, if it be in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe there are three amendments now pending.

Mr. SPALDING. At any rate, I would like to get this amendment before the Chair. I wish to move, as an amendment to the substitute now pending, to strike out clause 9 of the first paragraph of the pending section, in these words:

Or suspended and not resumed for thirty days and until a petition is filed, while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SPALDING] to the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, strike out, in lines 45, 46, and 47, the words "or suspended and not resumed for thirty days and until a petition is filed, while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over."

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, it is not an unusual thing for men engaged in business pursuits to have an aggregate of $500 of past-due paper. The filing of a petition to put such a person into insolvency, if he was not in fact insolvent, would tend to bring him into disrepute and to ruin his credit. It seems to me that in the hands of a creditor disposed to be oppressive such provision might do great injury not only to the debtor but to other creditors, because under such circumstances a single creditor could file a petition in bankruptcy, provided there were not more than twelve creditors. For this reason I believe that the provision which my amendment proposes to strike out weakens the bill, which in many essential particulars is calculated to operate beneficially alike to creditor and debtor. I trust my amendment will be adopted. Without occupying further time, I am willing to submit it to the vote of the House.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SPALDING, it was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think, Mr. Chairman, we had better have the debate limited on this paragraph. As there are other amendments which gentlemen desire to offer, why should we not take a vote now on the pending amendments?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I should like to occupy about five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last evening the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, had entertained the Committee of the Whole, as he always does, not only in a logical, practical way, but with his usual eloquence. He appealed to the patriotism of the House. He seems to find some sentiment in a bankruptcy bill. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is no more sentiment in a bankruptcy bill than there is in an undertaker's bill. This question addresses itself to the legal judgment of the House.

I call the attention of members to the fact that although we have been discussing this bill all this week, scarcely a paragraph concerning it has appeared in the newspapers of the day. The country is not demanding a bankruptcy bill. Members, if they will refer to their own experience, will be unable to say that the people in their districts are writing letters or petitioning for the passage of such a bill as this. Whatever demand exists for a bankruptcy bill to-day is confined to the voluntary features of the measure.

Among the acts for which, under this bill, a man may be put into bankruptcy is the making of an assignment under the laws of his State. Now, let me briefly refer to the history of that provision. Such a provision was in the bankruptcy law of 1867. After several years of experience with that provision, Congress, in 1874, struck it out of the law. It was found unpopular and ill fitted to the wants of the country. Yet after the trial we had of such a provision under the law of 1867—a trial which induced Congress to amend the law and strike out that provision—we are now told that it is wise to readopt it.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the features of the old bankruptcy law of 1867, which became so unpopular in the country because they harassed the poor debtor, were the features defining what are known as acts of bankruptcy; in other words, the provisions for involuntary bankruptcy. Yet with the light of our experience under the last bankruptcy law and with the country not demanding any such law with involuntary features, some gentlemen here seem willing to inflict upon the country the same evils with which it was afflicted under the former law. I beg members to pause before they vote against the amendment I have offered and to recall the experience of the country under the old law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I see that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] has made a profound study of this bill, and I should like to put to him a question suggested to me by a conversation I have had with another member of the House, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY].

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I yield for the question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose that one man should borrow of another $10,000 for the ostensible purpose of entering into a legitimate business with the money, not expressly so stating, but that being the understanding. Then suppose that the borrower should lose that money by gambling with cards. Could he under such circumstances file a petition in voluntary bankruptcy and secure his discharge under this bill, if it were to become a law?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I understand that anybody can file a petition in voluntary bankruptcy.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Ought such a man to be allowed to receive his discharge?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. As to whether he would get his discharge or not, that is another thing; but the gentleman's question was whether such a man could file a petition. I understand that under this bill anybody can file a petition, no matter what may be his indebtedness or how it may have arisen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I should like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed five minutes more. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I have been informed that under the provisions of the former bankrupt law it would have been impossible for such a man to secure his discharge in bankruptcy; that is to say, if it could be established as a fact that he had lost his money in gambling.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not say that he could be discharged under this bill. I understood that the question of the gentleman was whether anything in the bill would exclude him from applying. Whether he could be discharged is another question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will permit me, I will call his attention to the fact that in section 13 of this bill there are five explicit acts mentioned, the commission of any one of which by the bankrupt is a ground for denying him a discharge. Now, if the mention of one thing is to be taken as the exclusion of all other things, then the only ground for refusing to allow such a man a discharge would be proof of one of the things embraced in this section. And the loss of his property through gambling not being specified as one of the grounds on which a discharge is to be refused, he would still be able to secure a discharge even though the borrowed money had been lost in gambling with cards.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, that may be an argument against the bill, and I am glad that the gentleman finds additional reasons for objecting to its passage.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me a moment now, since he has an extension of time?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes.

Mr. RAY. Under the provisions of the bill I do not think such a man as that mentioned by the gentleman from Wisconsin could possibly obtain a discharge. But, however that may be, if it should be made a ground of refusal for granting a discharge, it is easy to insert it in the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, we are discussing the provisions now that apply to the discharge of the bankrupt. We are considering the amendment which proposes to strike from the bill the first paragraph of section 2, which, if adopted, strikes out the nine acts of bankruptcy; and I undertake to say that if you are to pass a bill at all, a simple bill that permits a man to go into bankruptcy is all that you should undertake to pass. You ought not at this time, when the country is already disturbed very much over public questions, to throw a new element of disturbance into the commerce and trade of the country, and in my judgment it would be a very great and a very serious mistake not only for this Congress, but a great mistake for the party that is behind this Congress and responsible for its actions, to undertake to put a bankrupt law, especially such a bankrupt law as this, on the country now. Such a law is not popular at any time. Who wants engraved on his tombstone, when he has ended his labors here and elsewhere, that he is the father of a bankrupt law as a monument? It never was and never will be a popular measure, and you can not make it so in this country. You can not humbug the people of this country with a measure of this character any more; they have had experience. You can no more make such a proposition suit the people of this country than you can make a suit of clothes for a man 5 feet high to fit me. The country has grown too large for such a thing; it is not adjusted to such a provision; it is too diversified in all of its interests. There are 45 States in the Union now passing laws each conflicting with each other; and when all of these things are considered it is evident that this country is not in a condition to adopt a general law upon this subject by which a man shall be forced into bankruptcy against his will. You are simply putting on the statute books something that will come back to plague us in the future, a proposition that will stay the era of prosperity which the country so much demands, and which it should have, and which we all hope will soon make its appearance.

It is a great and a grave mistake to pass such a bill. No man ought to vote for such a bill until he has carefully studied the history of the country under the operation of the old bankrupt laws; and no man who will do that will ever give a vote, after impartial consideration, for such a measure as this. Any man who will give it a fair and impartial consideration will at least hesitate before voting for any bill, especially one that embraces eight or nine acts of bankruptcy, whereby a man can be forced against his will into the bankrupt court, many of which provisions were stricken down by Congress in the old bill, many of which were changed and altered, as it was found necessary to change and alter them, because of the demand of the people, who were disgusted with their operation.

It is, Mr. Chairman, the old story. It comes up at every Congress to plague us. Notwithstanding the fact that there are various other matters of greater importance that ought to receive the attention of the House, matters which the whole country is demanding as loudly as it can, measures that ought to be considered and passed by Congress, measures, for instance, that will prevent the coming of the hordes of people that are pouring into this country from other lands, people that we do not want, and yet, notwithstanding these demands, here in the expiring hours of this session of Congress you are wrestling with a bankruptcy bill, trying to establish in this country a system that the people do not want, and one that if you do pass you will be forced to repeal within a very short time after its enactment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened with some surprise to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] who has just taken his seat. I am surprised that a Representative of so great a State as Pennsylvania, a State so vitally interested in this question of bankruptcy, voluntary and involuntary, should tell this committee that there is no public interest in that State and in this country on this question.

Now, I can say in behalf of my own State—in behalf of the great State of New York—that the citizens of that State, the business men of that State, are vitally interested in the measure now pending before this committee; and that the feeling in our State, so far as I have been able to sound it, is in favor of the enactment of just such a bill as that now under consideration.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us that the country is too large, too diversified in its interests, to have a uniform bankrupt law. I suppose that by and by we shall be told that it is too large to have any uniform legislation. If there be any force in that argument, then the Congress of the United States should be abolished, and all legislation should be referred to the legislatures of the several States.

I believe, sir, that the fathers of the Federal Constitution knew what they were about. I believe that when they gave us power to enact a general law on the subject of bankruptcy, they looked away ahead into the future of this country, and knew that the time must come, as it has come in the past, as it comes more imperatively to us to-day, when the enactment of a general bankrupt law would be a matter of actual public necessity.

Now, I have read the report of the Committee on the Judiciary upon this bill. I have read the bill with great care, have given many hours to its examination, have consulted many lawyers and many business men as to its provisions, and have examined it crucially in connection with the former general bankrupt act of 1867. I believe that there never has been a general bankrupt law framed with greater wisdom and more justice in its scope and plan. I congratulate the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary for this work which he has now presented to our consideration. In fact, I believe that it can not be justly criticised. I believe that it should be passed unanimously by this committee. The feeling in New York is this: If you propose to give us only a voluntary bankrupt law, give us none. If we can not have a law which provides both for voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, we wish no legislation whatsoever. That is the feeling of our lawyers; that is the feeling of our business men in every special avocation. The State of New York, gentlemen, is somewhat interested in this legislation. I call your attention to Schedule A, which shows that the greatest number of failures occurred in the State of New York during the whole period from 1879 to 1895. I will call your attention briefly to these figures. In New York the liabilities from 1879 to 1895 were $643,910,238. The total failures were 21,938, and the failures in 1895 were 1,940 as compared to 1,304 in 1879. That demonstrates, gentlemen, that in our State we have a practical interest in this proposed legislation, and I call the attention of the committee also to the fact that for the first three months of the year 1896 there have been 229 more failures than in the preceding period last year, and that the aggregate of liabilities amounted to $4,594,000 additional; that is, as compared with the same period in the year 1895.

Now, I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] that business is in the main paralyzed throughout the United States; but if you enact a simple voluntary bankruptcy act you will not restore confidence. Confidence restored to the debtor alone will not benefit the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. All the business interests of the country are made up of the interests of the creditor on the one hand and of the debtor on the other. A measure for the benefit of the debtor alone will not benefit the country. It must also be passed with some regard to the interests of the creditor. And, as is well pointed out in the very able report which accompanies this bill, a man is sometimes a creditor, or always a creditor, and at the same time a debtor, the twofold relation, the reciprocal relation, being sustained by every business man, because while he is a debtor to some parties he is also a creditor with debts due him from other parties.

Now, what should be the object of this legislation? It should be such legislation as would restore confidence to the business men of the country. It should be fair and just, and not unduly strict to the honest debtor. On the other hand, on behalf of the creditor, it should punish fraud and perjury and attempts to defeat the ends of justice. The gentleman complains of the acts which constitute involuntary bankruptcy, complains of the provisions of this section by which a man can be forced into bankruptcy. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, I have examined each and every one of these provisions with great care, and it seems to me that if any err in any way they are too lenient. Can it be wrong to punish a man for fraud? If a man conceals his property or transfers his property, or does any act whatsoever with the purpose and view of defrauding his creditor, is it hard to put him into bankruptcy? Is it not common fairness and justice to the business men of this country?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] says that the people take no interest in it. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that it is not a matter of sentiment, but it is a matter of business and of common honesty; and I call the attention of the members of the committee to a few extracts from the letters of business men which I will now read. Before reading the extracts from the letters of business men I shall read the expert opinion of one of the leaders of our bar, a man most familiar with the practical workings and operations of the bankruptcy act of 1867. He says:

NEW YORK, April 30, 1896.

Hon. FRANKLIN BARTLETT.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with care the admirable report of the House Judiciary Committee on the subject of a uniform law of bankruptcy accompanying House bill 8110, and am thoroughly in favor of the provisions of the bill. A uniform system of bankruptcy seems to me most important, and I find but few suggestions which I can offer in reference to the bill presented—

I had asked the distinguished member of the bar to pick out some flaw. With his special knowledge and experience, I wanted him to place his hand upon some vulnerable point, and, Mr. Chairman, the result of his examination was that he could find nothing to criticize in this most admirable bill—

No bankruptcy act ought to be passed which does not provide for involuntary as well as voluntary bankruptcy. The latter without the former seems to me an anomalous condition of affairs. Both debtors and creditors should be protected by legislation, and it seems to me that this bill does this with great care.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. Now let me give you this question, and make the point as clear as you can. I am not going to take your time except to make the question plain. Suppose a country merchant gives his paper, payable in thirty days, and John Smith indorses that paper.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Yes.

Mr. COX. And at the maturity of the paper he fails to meet it. Now, what position does the indorser occupy in regard to this bill? Is he a bankrupt, too?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. That is all regulated by the provisions of the bill. Anyone who becomes a surety or guarantor for a debt remains still liable although the debtor may be discharged. Mr. Cox endeavored to propound another question.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I decline to yield further, with great respect to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee. I must decline to yield, because he is only endeavoring to discover some problem which will interrupt the thread of my discourse. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], Mr. Chairman, said that the bankruptcy bill would not be popular. Well, a bankruptcy bill will never be popular—that is, any bill that provides for men paying their debts—with a certain class in the community; but I claim that this bill with its provisions is for the benefit of the debtor in allowing those business men who are hampered with debt to secure discharges and resume business; and it will be popular with a great class of debtors now burdened and with business men at large throughout the country, because it will bring about a renewal of credit and an extension of business.

With a general bankruptcy law men will not be afraid, as they are to-day, of embarking in business relations with certain parties in other States. We all know, Mr. Chairman, that the unfortunate differences in the system of bankruptcy laws in the various States operate to unsettle business relations. The only way to secure relief is to pass the bill now under consideration, and there is a strong voice—I may say to gentlemen a general sentiment—throughout the State of New York in favor of the passage of this very bill. I call your attention to one or two letters:

Our business experience of forty years leads us to believe that the best interests of the country demand a uniform bankruptcy law, one which shall supersede or be a substitute for the conflicting laws of various States. Such a law should be both "voluntary" and "involuntary." Proceedings in bankruptcy cases should be in United States instead of State courts. "Preferences" should be absolutely prohibited. Honest debtors should be discharged, and the assets divided among bona fide creditors without delay and at the minimum of cost. Dishonest debtors should be refused a discharge, and fraudulent ones severely punished.

This letter is but a sample of many which I have received. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it states the case conclusively in terse and forcible language, which is better than most argument.

Mr. STROWD of North Carolina. What business is the party engaged in who writes that letter?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. They are manufacturers of liquid paint, asbestos roofing, asbestos sheathing, asbestos cements, asbestos coverings, and several other branches of the same business. But it is a very large and well-known firm in New York.

Mr. MILNES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. And I may say that these letters come to me from firms not only in business in my own State of New York, but engaged in business in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and many other States. One firm calls my attention to the fact that the merchants of all the large cities throughout the Union are in favor of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, ever since I have had a seat in this House I have tried to be consistent in my opposition to all movements toward securing a bankruptcy law. I do not believe that there is any demand upon the part of the country for such an enactment; and I believe it would be most unwise for the Republican party at this time to enact that kind of legislation. I do not wonder at the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT], a leader of his party upon that side of the House, trying to place the Republican party in the disadvantageous position of being sponsors for this bill.

I have, Mr. Chairman, attempted to know something of the history of the three bankruptcy laws that we have had and their effect upon the party responsible for their enactment. In April, 1800, the Federalist party, then intrenched in power, supposed to be invincible, enacted a bankruptcy law. In the campaign that followed three charges were made against them. Their responsibility for the sedition law, for the alien law, and for the bankruptcy law; and under the assaults that were made that party ceased to exist as a powerful factor in the Government of the United States.

In 1841 the Whig party, which had just come into power strong and apparently invincible, with a majority such as never had been known before, enacted a bankruptcy law. They saw their error very soon, and the same deliberative body and the same Executive that had enacted and approved the law repealed it. But the party was tainted by that legislation and lost power. The House of Representatives that enacted the last bankrupt law had 49 Democrats and 143 Republicans in it, yet it was but a little while until that majority was well-nigh reversed and the Democracy had control of this House; and I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that no one factor was more important in turning over the control of Congress to the Democratic party than the responsibility that attached to our side for that bankruptcy enactment of 1867. In every instance the party that has assumed responsibility for such legislation has gone to the wall. The reprobation of the people has been upon it, and I do not wonder that the leader of the Democracy [Mr. BARTLETT of New York] now seeks to encourage the Republican party in this great mistake. But the gentleman has another motive, which he, as well as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], who addressed the committee yesterday, has disclosed. The committee reporting this bill has told us, and its advocates on this floor up to 3 o'clock on yesterday had uniformly insisted, that the underlying reason for this legislation was to give a boon to men who had been unfortunate in business, so that men who had gone down under the weight of misfortune and who were burdened with debt could find relief under the provisions of this enactment. It was all done, they said, in the interest of the indigent, unfortunate debtor. In their report the committee say:

It seems clear to the committee that a bankruptcy law is needed to relieve the country of the hopeless debts now resting upon active men—

That is, men who have been unfortunate, men who have been unskillful, men to whom disaster has come, honest men who are thus burdened, cramped, and trammelled are the people to be benefited, and this beneficent enactment is designed to give such men another chance in the race of life, so that they may regain the plane of solvent manhood.

[Here the hammer fell.]

On motion of Mr. WATSON of Ohio, the time of Mr. HEPBURN was extended for ten minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is the ground on which the committee put this bill in their report, and that is the ground upon which it has been generally advocated upon this floor, but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] yesterday and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] this morning have told us another story. The demand for this bill, they tell us, is for the purpose of securing another method for the collection of debts. They want another means to secure the creditors of the country. Not satisfied with the collection laws of the States, not satisfied with the access to the courts which they have had all along and now have, the creditors of the country insist that something more shall be done whereby they shall be enabled to secure their debts.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that any legislation of this kind is necessary. Everywhere in all of the forty-five States and in the Territories there are ample provisions of law for the collection of debts. Every debt that now exists has been contracted in view of the existing facilities for collection. No creditor has been deceived. When he made his investment or allowed another to become his debtor he knew what the facilities and possibilities were with regard to collection. But not content with that knowledge, not content with the facilities that they now have for the collection of debts, the creditors come here, by their Representatives, demanding that they shall have other means, that they shall have other ways, by which to secure their pound of flesh.

Are we doing any harm to the creditor when we refuse to give him that? The courts are open. The collection laws of the States are in full force. There is no proposition to limit their scope in any way or to embarrass their operation. The creditor has now every means that he had when he extended credit to his debtor. Why should he have other means? Why does he come here demanding this additional means for collection of his debts? It is unfair and unjust, and the man who urges it is not, in my belief, friendly to the masses of this country. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] tells us that if this measure is enacted into law there will roll over this country an unprecedented wave of prosperity, that if the debtor class is put absolutely into the power of the creditor class then the creditor class will consent that their money, which they tell us is now withdrawn from the Western region, will flow out, and we shall all bask in the sunlight of a new prosperity. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the men who loan money from the East to the West will not be affected by this bankrupt law. Their loans are already secured upon the real estate of the West. They are secured by mortgages upon the property of the West. Those mortgages will be as complete then as they are now, and I do not think that any new conditions of prosperity will come to us because of this enactment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have some objections to this particular bill. I called the attention of my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON] on yesterday to the incongruity presented, in my opinion, by the fifth and the second acts of bankruptcy as here defined. I thought then, and I still think, that while trying to escape from the second act of bankruptcy as defined in this bill the debtor must fall into the fifth. If this committee will give me its attention for a moment I will try to establish this point. The second act of bankruptcy, as set forth in the bill, is in part:

Failed for thirty days, until a petition is filed, while insolvent, to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law—

Here is an attachment against a debtor's property. If he allows that attachment to run for the period described, it is an act of bankruptcy. In order to relieve himself from this he must release that property. How is he to do it? Only by payment or by giving security. Yet the fifth "act of bankruptcy" declares that either of those is an act of bankruptcy. Therefore, if the debtor tries to escape from the second he must necessarily force himself into the fifth. When I asked my colleague if there was not some incongruity between these two provisions, his answer, as I recollect it, was, "Yes; it is intended that both shall rip him up the back." And both do. Either does. In escaping from the one he necessarily gets into the other.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him, not to correct his improvement upon my language at all, but to call his attention to section 60.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will try to quote my colleague exactly.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, that is not material. Give your fancy the fullest play.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is no need of displays of fancy condemning this measure.

Mr. HENDERSON. That seems to be your mood this morning. Now, I ask the gentleman to read section 60 in connection with clause 5, section 2. Section 60 provides that—

A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, he has procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself in favor of any person, or made a transfer of any of his property with intent to (1) defeat the operation of this act.

The word "defeat," as used in this bill, has coupled with it the intention to defraud. As I said yesterday, if the debtor violates either of the provisions he is liable to be thrown into bankruptcy; but the gentleman can not hinge the two provisions together in the manner he is now attempting.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. But I call the attention of my friend from Iowa to the second clause of the paragraph of section 60, to which he has just referred. It is in these words:

Or (2) enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is another matter; and it is not presented even by the gentleman from Iowa. My restless friend from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD], who is always hunting for some objection to this bill, can not find any this time.

Mr. HEPBURN. The word "defeat" means much more under the definition given in this bill than the gentleman has suggested. It does not mean simply "defraud," as he has suggested. The language is:

Defeat shall include defraud or delay—

Mr. HENDERSON. Delay with attempt to defraud.

Mr. HEPBURN. "Defeat shall include defraud or delay, evade, hinder, and impede."

Mr. HENDERSON. "With intent to defraud." The gentleman must not fail to put that in.

Mr. HEPBURN. My friend has made no answer to this criticism. None can be made. It was not intended by this bill, in my judgment, that there should be any escape for the man who has allowed an execution to run against him. This fifth clause most cunningly closes every possible door. If he should escape the second clause, he finds himself enmeshed in all the conditions of the fifth.

Mr. MORSE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I prefer not to yield for a question now; I have only a little time. Here is the answer which my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON] made to me yesterday:

I think he would be ripped up in both, and ought to be.

I said "up the back." I want to withdraw that phrase, so that the ripping may be general—all over his anatomy. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, this act is a fraud upon its face; it is a fraud in its title.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may have time to conclude his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORSE. As the gentleman now has unlimited time, will he yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will.

Mr. MORSE. I understood the gentleman to say that the same conditions exist now in regard to the collection of debts and mortgages that existed when the loans were made in the Western country by Eastern investors. Now, does not my friend know that the Populists when in control in Kansas passed stay laws which prevent the foreclosure of a mortgage or the beginning of proceedings for its collection for a year and a half after it becomes due? If the gentleman from Iowa does not know the fact, I happen to know it to my sorrow.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is some Populist here perhaps who can attend to the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question relating to the criticism he is making on this bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand the gentleman to criticize the language "hinder or impede with intent to defraud." Now, I ask him whether that is not the language used in the codes of all the code States in regard to acts which are analogous to acts of bankruptcy?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have no doubt about that. I was not criticizing it in any other sense than this: My colleague had defined the word "defeat" to mean defraud. I simply wanted to show—and that was my whole object in referring to the language of the bill—that according to this definition defeat meant much more than defraud.

Mr. HENDERSON. That does not apply to the question you raise.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it does.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The language of the bill is, "delay, hinder, and impede with intent to defraud." Now, is it not a fact that, according to the construction of the courts, an act committed with the purpose of hindering or delaying the collection of a just debt is a fraudulent act?

Mr. HEPBURN. This is a bill which purports to establish a "uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies."

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see how "uniform" it is. It exempts from the operation of the law, and from the necessity of distribution to the creditors, all that property that is exempt to the debtor under the laws of the various States. How can you, then, have a uniform system of bankruptcy if you base it on exemption law that exist in such great diversity in the statutes of the various States?

Why, a gentleman the other day stated that in the State of Pennsylvania there were no exemption laws; that the coat that a man might lay off from his back while engaged in his daily labor might be seized by the officers on an execution. I do not know whether that is true or not. I simply refer to the statement made. In the State in which I live, on the contrary, there was an adjudication where a bankrupt was permitted to retain his homestead valued at $93,000. Is that uniformity? Does that secure a uniform system of bankruptcy, where in one State a man may be stripped of everything under the operation of this law, and in another where he may have almost unlimited wealth, if it is confined to his homestead, for that is secured to him?

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption to make a correction there?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. MAHON. In the State of Pennsylvania there is an exemption law which allows the debtor to retain $300 worth of property, unless he waives the right. It is true that they generally give him about a thousand, but that is the law.

Mr. HEPBURN. That does not change the argument that I make. It shows the impossibility of the enactment of a law framed in this manner, based on the State statutes, differing as they do widely from each other. It shows the utter impossibility of meeting the requirements of the Constitution and the pretended purpose of the bill in its title, "a uniform system of bankruptcy."

But, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the bill because of the sources of its demand. If there is a demand for it, it comes from the associations of wholesale merchants in the United States, who want to have another means of securing control over their trade. How will it operate? I undertake to say—

Mr. RAY. Before the gentleman leaves that point, having made that statement, to wit, that there is no demand for it, I desire to call his attention just there to this—

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not yield to the gentleman from New York for a speech. He has occupied hours of the time of the committee in the discussion of this matter. If he has a question to ask, I will be very glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. RAY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have occupied but very little of the time of the committee.

Mr. HEPBURN. Ask your question.

Mr. RAY. If you will permit me; you have been courteously accorded all the time you want—

Mr. HEPBURN. Not by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HENDERSON. By every member of the committee.

Mr. RAY. The "gentleman from New York" is a member of the committee, and no objection was made to the extension of time asked by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman ask his question, if he desires to do so? If he has no question to ask, I decline to be interrupted further.

Mr. RAY. I did not desire to call attention to this document [referring to pamphlet in his hand] without permission of the gentleman—

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I must ask to be protected from the gentleman from New York. I have yielded to the gentleman for a question only, if he has one to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to the floor and declines to be interrupted. The gentleman from New York will be in order.

Mr. RAY. I ask the gentleman from Iowa—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. The "gentleman from Iowa" will yield to the gentleman from New York for a question only.

Mr. RAY. I want to make this statement—

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not yield to the gentleman for a statement.

Mr. RAY. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very well; ask it.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman, in connection with his statement that there is no demand for this bill—

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not say that.

Mr. RAY. Well, in connection with his statement as to the sources of the demand—I believe that was his statement—allow me to call his attention and the attention of the committee, not by a speech, but simply to a document which I hold in my hand and which is on file, showing, as I think, that his statement is inaccurate?

Mr. HEPBURN. What is it?

Mr. RAY. Well, if I answer that question it will be to state the very thing to which the gentleman has been objecting.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me see it.

Mr. RAY. I would not name it without the consent of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. COX. Is that a speech of the gentleman from New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. The "gentleman from New York" had nothing to do with it.

Mr. HEPBURN (reading)—

Addresses, memorials, indorsements, petitions, and resolutions demanding the enactment of the Torrey bankrupt bill, by the Associated Wholesale Grocers, St. Louis; Columbus (Ga.) Board of Trade; Chamber of Commerce of New York; Omaha (Nebr.) Board of Trade—

And so on. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is just what I said. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. Read it all.

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). That is what I said. Every one of these fellows who wants a new hold, a new grip upon his customers, is clamoring for it of course, and the gentleman from New York, their ready servitor, is anxious to give them all they want.

Mr. RAY. Will you allow—

Mr. HEPBURN. I will not allow further interruption.

Mr. RAY. I would not misrepresent were I in your place.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not desire to misrepresent. I simply read from the document that the gentleman gave me.

Mr. RAY. Why not read the entire title of it?

Mr. HEPBURN. You might as well insist on my reading one of your speeches. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. It would do you good if you would.

Mr. HEPBURN. It might help me, but I have some consideration for other gentlemen here. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that a very large percentage of the business men in the West are, under the definitions given in this bill, bankrupts. They can not meet the requirements of this bill in their effort to avoid bankruptcy under it. And yet they are able to conduct their business. They are not usually engaged extensively in business, but it is the small merchants, the merchants whose property perhaps would not pay their debts, who have to postpone from time to time the payment of their paper. Technically they are bankrupts, technically they are insolvent; and yet they are able to conduct their business, to keep their heads above water, and to make a support for their families. A man so situated, dealing with the creditor who would use this bill, is compelled to submit to whatever exaction in the way of increased profits to that wholesale merchant that the wholesale merchant elects to put upon him. He has no way of escaping it. If he proposes to change the house with which he deals, conscious that he is in the power of this man, he has to go on dealing in the same line, submitting to the same exactions, paying the same exorbitant rates, and in turn imposing them upon his customers.

Mr. BREWSTER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. For a question, yes.

Mr. BREWSTER. Do you think the passage of this bill, or the failure to pass this bill, will have any effect on the relation of the retailers to the wholesaler? When the retailer is in the grip of the wholesaler, will the failure to pass this bill make the thing any better?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it will, because under the collection laws of the State, with the time that is given, with which the creditor is familiar and which he expected, the debtor can have an opportunity to turn himself, to do something. He could have an opportunity for payment if nothing else. Yet under this bill if he were to take that time or were to pay one of his creditors he would become a bankrupt. Does not that place him in a worse position? It seems to me so.

Mr. BREWSTER. Is it not for the benefit of the wholesaler to keep the man going? Is he liable to shut a man up so long as he is solvent?

Mr. TAWNEY. That depends upon the character of the wholesaler.

Mr. HEPBURN. I accept the answer of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. Mr. Chairman, I should like to say—

Mr. COX. Will my friend yield to me for one question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. COX. That is all I want. I want to understand your construction of this idea. A country merchant gives his paper, payable in ninety days, to the wholesale merchant, and somebody goes his security upon that paper as indorser. He fails to meet it. What becomes of the indorser? Is he a bankrupt, too?

Mr. HEPBURN. It seems to me that he is equally liable.

Mr. TAWNEY. He is an original maker.

Mr. HEPBURN. He is practically an original maker. I do not see why the failure to pay, if the other conditions are present in the case, would not be an act of bankruptcy.

Mr. HENDERSON. The committee has stricken that clause out of the bill, so there is no use in wasting any time about it. In the committee this morning the ninth clause was entirely stricken from the bill.

Mr. COX. Then, as I understand, the indorser or security is not subject to the provisions of the bill?

Mr. HENDERSON. The ninth clause, with reference to commercial paper, has been stricken out of the bill. That was done in the committee this morning.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The indorser on commercial paper is not liable until after the principal has failed to pay, anyhow.

Mr. COX. Suppose he is a joint maker.

Mr. CONNOLLY. If he is a principal, that is a different thing, but not as an indorser.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I have just received a memorandum showing that it is the smaller dealer who suffers from bankruptcy laws. In Indiana, out of 14,000 bankrupts under the old law, the assets of 12,000 were less than $5,000 each, showing that it is the class of men of whom I have been speaking who are the victims under a bankruptcy law. I was going to ask some gentleman from the West who is in favor of this bill to show who else in the West is in favor of it.

There are a few gentlemen who favor the voluntary bankruptcy feature; there are a very few wholesale dealers that favor the involuntary features of it. I undertake to say that of all the Representatives from the State of Iowa upon this floor not one communication has come to them asking, on the part of their constituents, for the enactment of this law. I have received but a solitary communication on the subject, and that from a gentleman living outside of my State, and he opposing this bill. Not one letter have I had, not one comment in the newspapers have I seen, advocating this bill. I do not believe it is a want of the country. I do not believe that it is right in itself. I do not believe that the bill conforms to the requirements of the Constitution as to its uniformity; and I do believe that it will be most harmful in its effect upon the party majority of this House. We will be held responsible for it, and some of our friends on the other side, who perhaps now are urging us to make this mistake, will be among those orators who this fall will declaim against us and charge us with responsibility, point to the distress of the country, and say that instead of bringing about relief we have passed this unfair, injudicious, one-sided legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time may be extended to the limit of fifteen minutes at this time. It is not worth while to begin with five minutes' time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks that he may have fifteen minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I assert, in the first place, Mr. Chairman, that much the most essential thing to the welfare of the business interests of the country of America to-day is the reestablishment of credit. It is necessary that we shall reestablish the credit of the National Government, and it is necessary that we shall reestablish the credit of all component factors in the National Government, and prominent and conspicuous among those factors are the individual creditors, the business men of the United States. I deny that there can be good credit in one section of the Union and bad credit in the other section. I deny that the business men of the West can flourish when the business men of the East fail to flourish. And I deny that any proper argument can be based here by introducing into this subject the question of the West against the East.

The money of the East is being handled by the genius and enterprise of the West; and the credit of the one is the interest of the other, and the success of the one is a necessary incident to the success of the other. So that I think the gentleman who in this debate attempts to make it appear that a system that makes a sound business man in the West can by any possibility better the man in the East to a greater degree than is conferred upon a man in the West is not correct in his judgment. How shall we establish business credit? I want to say right here, in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], that as I had something to do in ten or twelve States of the Union with the campaign of 1892; as I had, too, not to so large an extent, with that of 1890, and to a much larger extent of the campaign of 1894, when the Republican party in the one case went out of power in the legislative branch of the Government and in the other came back into power; and I never heard and never read one word of discussion on the subject of a bankruptcy bill. I have tried to recall all the charges of the Democratic party in 1890 and in 1892, and I never heard that thing mentioned until I heard it here this morning. Now, I do not say that it never happened, for I did not hear all that was said.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman is speaking now of a period twelve or fourteen years after the repeal of the act.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then you are talking of the bankruptcy act of 1867. I never heard that mentioned as a matter of politics. I never heard any condemnation of it. It is said that that act was repealed after a while. It was repealed in due time. It was not the purpose of the legislation of the country, never has been, that there shall be a permanent system of bankruptcy. It is not necessary. Periods, cycles of business depression, sweep over the country. I might say, if I wanted to, though I am indisposed to go into that subject, that these cycles are generally an incident to the introduction into power of the Democratic party in this country; and it has been said by one of the wisest financiers of this country that it was necessary, indispensably necessary, to the success of the business of the country that, following every Democratic Administration, there should be a system of bankruptcy. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. The gentleman certainly knows that these cycles swept over the country in 1866, another in 1877, and another in 1884. Will the gentleman explain if these happened after Democratic ascendancy?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no such thing. In 1866, going back to that, as it is the first fixed on by the gentleman, unfortunately for his recollection of history we emerged from the greater depression of 1857, when the property of this country went down 80 per cent in value all through the West. We emerged from that to enter a war. At the end of that war we had not reestablished our credit, and the transition from irredeemable paper money and the battle that we had to fight with the Democratic party to restore specie payments did bring upon us the trouble of 1877. What was the trouble of 1875-1877? Does the gentleman know? It was the existence of that upas tree, bad credit, in this country. In 1874 the Democratic party carried State after State in favor of practical repudiation of the obligations of the Government, and undertook to demand that the bonds of the Government should be paid in greenbacks and that the greenbacks should not be redeemed; and until we turned aside and fought the Democratic party to its death for the time being, we could not have any credit in this country. That was the trouble, and that was all the trouble there was; and when the time had come, and victory had perched upon the banner of the Republican party, and a Republican Administration came into power in 1877, and the resumption act was passed in the teeth of the opposition of the Democratic party, and the 1st day of January, 1879, came, and, under a Republican Administration, every dollar of our promises to pay came up to the level of every dollar in gold—then it was that prosperity came as the victory of honest money and the overthrow of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Republican side.] But, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to make any such speech as this—

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman permit another suggestion?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I wish to say to the gentleman that all of those depressions are recorded by the Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, in his Report on the Industrial Depression of 1886, and he says that they all extended to the seven leading nations of the world.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants to take his politics from Carroll D. Wright I bid him God-speed, but I do not want him to bother me with them. [Laughter.] I will take some political ideas from a Democrat, I will take a great many from a Republican; but from a Mugwump, God forbid! [Laughter and applause.] A man who has to trim his politics, to pare his common sense, and to engineer his figures so that he can retain office under Administration after Administration shall not be a professor in the political school which I attend. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, how shall we restore public confidence? There are several ways. I did not intend thus to trench upon the proprieties of this occasion by any political or partisan references. I simply wanted to come to this particular bill. The first step, in my opinion, to the restoration of public confidence is to restore to the column of active workers the greatest possible number of competent business men of the country. Go along the pathway where the wrecks are deposited and gather up the competent men and give them another chance. I speak for the business men of my section of Ohio, and I say that not one, not ten, not one hundred, but more than one hundred such men have appealed to me to support this bill. They are the men who, during the progress of this cyclone of financial disaster, have fallen by the wayside and—

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman ought not to have broken into that sentence, which was going to be a very pretty one, but I yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. We all recognize its merit. This class of men that the gentleman speaks of would be affected as they desire to be affected by the part of this bill, or by one of the bills, providing for voluntary bankruptcy alone, would they not?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I admit that. That is probably so. But, Mr. Chairman, there has got to be something more than the restoration to activity of those men who have fallen, and that point I am coming to. They are the men who, without fault of their own, many of them young, active, and prosperous at one time; have suddenly found themselves engulfed and hopelessly insolvent. Their property is gone under the State laws, and yet there stands against them the burden of their indebtedness. Shall those men be restored to activity? I trust that they may. In my section of the country there are business men without a stain upon their character, with no reasonable ground to say that they were inefficient or ineffective, who have encountered the storms of adversity and trouble and have been temporarily drifted to the shore. I want to see those men allowed to emerge from under this load of adversity and disaster, for which they were not responsible. I want them set free to join again the great army of activity, the great army of productive industry in this country. Now, how are men of this class to again stand upon their feet, even by the operation of this bill? There must be a restoration of credit throughout the country. And just here I want to answer one argument that has been made against this bill. It has appeared as though somebody here had got the impression that in this bill there was a new engine by which the creditor could become more exacting, more unreasonable, more oppressive than he is now. Mr. Chairman, if I were to-day to criticize the common procedure of the business men of my country from Boston to Omaha, I would say that, so far from there being any purpose or any action on their part as a class to crush the business men who are their debtors, to crush the dealers, to crush the retailers, to crush the debtor class generally, they have for years been too indulgent.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That is so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Of course it has been to their interest at times to be so; but how often—I appeal now to the lawyers here who know something about the collection business of the country—how often in the last twenty years have the business men of the great cities, the wholesale men, the manufacturers, been found coming to the relief of debtors in trouble, by extension of time, by renewal of credit, placing them upon their feet and pushing them forward as well as it was possible to do? In many cases they have compromised by the reduction of debts.

Mr. MARSH. I hope the gentleman will not forget to tell us how the involuntary features of this bill will restore credit to the people of this country.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not say everything at one time. I propose to occupy only a very few minutes.

How often, I ask, have creditors come forward in this way and done the best they could for their debtors? How often have they taken partial payments and extended the time for the balance? In this way the wholesale merchant, the Eastern manufacturer, or the Western manufacturer—for the East is not doing so large a percentage of the manufacturing as it did some years ago—has in this way sustained and built up the credit of many a man who was likely to fall by the wayside.

Now, let us see about the involuntary feature of this bill. I am not going to urge that so strongly as I do the other. But there seems to be a consensus of the wise opinion in this House on this subject. And right here I wish to say that I am going to take the details of this bill largely from the hands of this committee without criticism. I have looked into the bill just enough to know that there are no hardships in its provisions as compared with former laws on this subject. I have looked into it enough to know that there seems to have been a very wise conservatism in the drafting of the bill; and as to all the minor and unimportant details I would rather trust the committee than trust myself in the hurry of the progress of the measure through this House.

Now, then, how does the involuntary feature of this bill go to sustain credit? Credit can not be built up all on one side. You can not build up the credit of the retailer without some protection to the interests of the wholesale dealer. You can not protect the debtor without giving the creditor some protection. Now, when anybody shows me in this bill any provision creating an act of bankruptcy which is not already so recognized upon the statute books of every intelligent State of this Union, then I will argue with him upon that subject.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAY. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended for five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask that the gentleman be allowed so much time as he may need to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended until he concludes his remarks?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I shall not occupy more than ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have created no new act of bankruptcy. There is proposed here no new liability. A man whose paper has gone to protest in the bank where he has made it payable is an insolvent debtor in the eyes of the business men of the country of all grades and sizes. He is insolvent. The act of insolvency is the failure to pay, and it is not worth while to talk about terms or expressions. There is the fact. This bill undertakes to say that the debtor shall not fail to pay for the purpose of fraud. By the language of the statute of Ohio—borrowed from the code of New York, loaned again to the State of Indiana, and then transferred to Kansas and Iowa—it is provided that it shall be an act of bankruptcy if any person makes any movement with his property, hides it or hides himself or allows judgment against himself “with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors.” That is the language in common use throughout all the code States of the Union. Now, what says this bill. In defining the word “defeat,” it says:

Defeat shall include defraud, or delay, evade, hinder, and impede—

With what purpose? I understood the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to say that mere delay would be treated as an act of bankruptcy. That is not the meaning of this expression, and it would not have been so construed if the committee had seen fit to leave out of the statute the qualifying clause which follows; but they have put it in. Any one of these acts or all of them, in order to be acts of bankruptcy under this provision, must have been done “with intent to defraud.” Now, if we are standing here to create legislation for the protection of men who acquire the property or money of others and then conspire to defraud them out of it, the criticism of the gentleman from Iowa lies against this bill, not otherwise.

I do not care to occupy further time except to say this: These two great classes—debtors and creditors—must be brought into just and equal relations with each other.

Mr. MARSH. I hope the gentleman will answer the question I put to him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not be responsible for the gentleman's understanding. I have been arguing for quite a length of time that you can not build up the credit of the debtor class without putting protection into the hands of the creditor class. You can not make a law that will permit the debtor to do as he pleases with the property acquired from the creditor without giving to the creditor a chance to get at least a fair dividend out of the property of the debtor.

Mr. MARSH. We had very good credit in this country from 1879 to 1893—

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can tell the gentleman how we had it—

Mr. MARSH. And we had no involuntary system of bankruptcy.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We had an involuntary system of bankruptcy just back of that time; and one of the very last acts done under it of which I have knowledge was to relieve one of the heaviest debtor classes in my section of the State of Ohio by a bill filed, I think, as late as 1878. I do not remember the date of the repeal of the former bankruptcy law.

Mr. MARSH. It was repealed during the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well. We cleared the decks; we restored confidence; we brought into the activities of business life thousands and tens of thousands of men who had been stranded before that.

Now, I do not want to talk politics with my distinguished friend from Illinois.

Mr. MARSH. Oh, you never will have to do that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know what aided to bring prosperity in 1879. It was the triumph of the Republican party on the 1st of January of that year over the combined forces of Democracy and the Repudiationists.

Mr. MARSH. And the mistake my friend is making now is that he is attributing it to the bankrupt law of 1867.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; not at all; I am not attributing it to that. But when my friend from Illinois points out an era of prosperity and calls attention to it, I have only undertaken to show from whence it resulted, and incidentally to say that we had just passed from under the operation of that law.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will my colleague, my distinguished and able colleague, allow me a question? [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, now, after that of course I can not refuse my colleague, and will yield to him all day for questions if he desires it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I wish to ask my colleague this: Was the case to which you have just referred, and in which you played, as I am sure you did, such an important part as an attorney, a case of voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, it was both.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Which side preponderated?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The original petition was a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, but a cross petition for involuntary bankruptcy was afterwards filed as an outgrowth of the case.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. No one is objecting to a voluntary provision.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I have been trying to make it appear that you have got to make a bill so that both sides will be satisfied with it.

Now let us see what my friend's proposition is.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I have none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A gentleman from my Congressional district, we will say, not his, for his district is a high-character district financially, but a gentleman from my Congressional district goes to New York, buys a great stock of goods or merchandise on credit, and at once it is discovered that he has done it fraudulently, that he has made false representations. A great number of creditors are interested in the case. The true policy of every law enacted by every State legislature in the Union where there is any credit or any provision for the collection of debts is that when a man is in failing circumstances his assets shall be divided between all of his creditors pro rata, and that they shall not be given to the man who can or may possibly, by collusion with the debtor, become a preferred creditor. There has been more loss of commercial and personal credit by the application of the preference system to the settlement of the estates of debtors than from almost all other causes combined.

Mr. MAHON. Systematic stealing.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; systematic stealing.

Now, my friend having got possession of the property and having made away with it according to his own will, without any process by which he can be made to go into the bankrupt court, or the property being in his possession, and having reached the exact time when he is ready for the operation, he goes into voluntary bankruptcy and selects his own assignee. He tells the creditors in New York and Philadelphia and Omaha, Chicago, and Cincinnati, "I have my friend," as my friend said last night—"I have my friend to administer on the assets of my estate; but he will not ask me about anything I have disposed of heretofore. The fact that my wife is a preferred creditor, the fact that my son is a preferred creditor, that my brothers-in-law are preferred creditors, will not be inquired into, because he is my friend." And so the swindle is perfected; and instead of giving the creditor power to come forward and say, "You are placing the property beyond our reach; we will seize it, and then call all the creditors in and divide it," that is what actually occurs. It is not a fancy picture.

But, Mr. Chairman, such a proceeding is not in consonance with what is or what ought to be the law of this country. We have even decided in our courts that the title to property disposed of under such circumstances does not pass if the attempt is made by the seller to transfer it at the place where the fraudulent purchaser lives. The title is in the man who is defrauded of his right.

Now, in view of these facts, is it a wrong against public honesty to give to the creditor an opportunity to press the debtor? For the whole involuntary provision of the bill is based on the first consideration, which is that a wrong, or fraud, or an actual attempt at wrong or to commit a fraud, has been conceived by the debtor and he is trying to carry the wrong or the fraud into effect.

So in my judgment the passage of a wise and conservative bankrupt law (and I believe this to be one) will restore to the field of activity thousands of men who are unable now to participate in business affairs. It will add to the growth and greatness of the country, and will restore to all sections a degree of confidence in the conduct of business men and the protection of their interests that could not otherwise exist under the conflicting decisions and legislation of the several independent States of the Union. These States bordering upon each other have attempted to bring their legislation into consistency the one with the other, and they have always failed. Attachment laws in one State are defective in another State. Rights which grow up in one State are valueless in another State. To illustrate, we have undertaken to enforce in Ohio a law that prohibits a man who sells goods to the laborer upon a railroad from going outside of the State to attach the credits of a debtor in another State. And so we have had conflicting legislation and court decisions upon both sides of the Ohio River.

Here, for the purpose of uniformity, which is a great desideratum, is the proposition of a law which shall operate with uniformity from Calais to Galveston and from New York to San Francisco, so that the restored credit of the country shall operate uniformly from the West to the East. It is a very proper time to have this bankruptcy bill go into effect, just at the time when we are hoping and praying and believing that better days have come or are coming, when the star of hope begins to shine again in the horizon and seems to be traveling upward to span the heavens. Why should not we do the act that to my mind would be the greatest boon and benefit to the entire business interests of my whole and glorious country? [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] who has just taken his seat made a most earnest and eloquent speech in favor of every feature of the bill, both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. He then with great emphasis asks, how shall we restore prosperity and confidence? I say to him, not by a bankruptcy law, not by gold-standard laws, not by McKinley high-tariff laws. It is to such measures as those that the country owes to-day the thralldom under which it is passing. Did any gentleman on this floor, when he was in his canvass last year, tell his constituents that if elected to Congress he would vote to pass an involuntary bankruptcy law? If anybody in that vast Republican majority from the great and growing West made any such promise to his constituents, let him rise and proclaim it. [After a pause.] None! Then none should vote for it. It is a proposition to give one more element of power to the unscrupulous, overpowered creditor class of the East, additional power of oppression, and yet the gentleman who has just taken his seat said that is the way to bring prosperity!

Mr. Chairman, every time that the moneyed classes have asked for an additional power, the reason given is that they want to add to the prosperity of those who labor and produce; that it is not for themselves, but for the poor laboring people that they ask the legislation. That was the cry two years ago, when the wealth of the country demanded and got the unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act—a piece of legislation which has brought disaster and distress upon the producers of our country. The bankers and money-changers promised that the repeal bill would restore confidence, that it would restore prosperity; but from that moment, notwithstanding the great industry, the great power, the great endurance, and the great inventive genius of the American people—elements which would make any country great under proper laws—notwithstanding all that, we have gone deeper and deeper and deeper into the depths of despondency and misfortune.

Who, Mr. Chairman, are the debtor class that are sought by this legislation to be placed under the creditor class of the East? The debtor class of this country are those men who have brought us all the prosperity and all the progress that has made this country the pride and admiration of the world. They have built up the West, they have transformed those barren plains into prosperous communities, and they have built up great and prosperous, progressive, and populous States.

Now, after having placed the country upon the gold standard, after having made it almost impossible for the people to pay their debts, after having at least made delays in paying them inevitable, you say to the creditor class, "We now place in your hands the power to go into any Federal court, which extends its hands over thousands of miles of territory, not only over one State but over two States and sometimes over three States, and sends its marshals a thousand miles to seize upon the property of an industrious, thriving citizen." I am opposed to the bill and shall vote against it. I am opposed to any bill which enables a creditor to oppress his debtor.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON] is recognized.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I should like to offer to section 2, and to have it read from the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON] is recognized.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, during the debate on this bill yesterday my colleague [Mr. NORTHWAY] made this interruption:

Mr. NORTHWAY. Right there, if the gentleman from Iowa will permit me, in response to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON], let me say that in the State of Ohio as soon as an assignment is made the creditors can get together and take the property out of the hands of the assignee and put it in the hand of one of their own number, or a person of their own selection, for distribution.

A little later than that my other colleague [Mr. GROSVENOR] made this observation, substantially as Mr. NORTHWAY had:

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit me, I would like to say that under the law of Ohio, which the gentleman from Iowa compliments, the first proposition that follows the assignment is the selection, usually, of some friend of the debtor, perhaps his wife or some near relative, to administer the estate.

But with these additional words:

But the creditors come together, and by a vote of the majority take the property out of the hands of the assignee and place it in possession of a trustee for distribution.

To that I replied:

Then that must be the case only in your district.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; that is the law of the State.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I have never known it done.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That makes no difference. That is the law of Ohio.

Later on, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] had the floor, my colleague [Mr. GROSVENOR] interrupted him for a question, as follows:

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and under that leave I want to print in the RECORD section 6338 of the revised statutes of Ohio, providing the means for the removal of any trustee previously appointed in the case of an insolvent and the appointment of another by a board of commissioners, who hold an election for that purpose. That statute has been in force in one form or another in the State of Ohio for more than twenty years.

I wish now to call the attention of the House, and especially of my two distinguished colleagues, to the fact that section 6338 of the revised statutes of Ohio in that form has long since been repealed, and that there is no provision and has not been for years in the revised statutes of Ohio authorizing, permitting, or justifying any such proceeding on the part of the creditors of an assignor as they referred to. On the contrary, these gentlemen have entirely misconceived and misquoted the statute of my State. I now read the law which is in force.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When was it passed?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I will tell you in a moment. I read as much of the law now in force as will be necessary to give the House a correct understanding of what the law now is, unless it has been repealed within the last year. It is as follows:

SEC. 6338. Whenever any creditor or creditors of the assignor shall file a complaint, alleging that the assignee or assignees named in the deed of assignment, or the trustee or trustees appointed by the court under the provisions of the next two preceding sections—

Now comes the part which has been put in since the act was in force which my colleagues have referred to—

are not suitable persons to administer the trust, or that their administration thereof will not be for the best interests of the creditors of the assignor, and such assignor—

Now, two facts must be made to appear in the petition, viz, that the administration of the estate will not be for the interests of the creditors, and that the administration of the estate by the assignee will not be for the interests of the assignee, assignor, or the creditors. The section which General GROSVENOR had incorporated in the RECORD, and which appears in the RECORD this morning as the law of Ohio, has not been the law of Ohio for years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these steps must have been taken at the request of 50 per cent at least in value of the creditors of the assignor before they can remove the person selected by him as his assignee. That shows what the legislature of Ohio thought upon a subject similar to the one we are discussing now. If a man owes $10,000, at least $5,000 must be represented by the creditors before the assignee can be changed; but under the provisions of clause 9 of this bill you propose that one creditor, with only a five-hundred-dollar claim, may throw a party into bankruptcy.

Mr. RAY. Be fair; not where there is only a single creditor.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Where there are twelve. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to this bill, but I am in favor of these amendments that we have been talking about, and will vote for them. If they are voted down, then I wish to vote in favor of the passage of the bill as reported by the committee, with the hope that later on we may get one or two amendments which I regard as exceedingly important to this bill. I believe with my distinguished colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and my personal friend, that a bankruptcy bill is a great necessity to the commercial interests of the United States. I believe it is the duty of this Congress to pass such a bill. I believe the Republican party, I believe that the people of this country, irrespective of party, expect us to pass such a bill. But I want it to be a wise bill. I want it to be a just bill. I do not want it to be a bill with tyranny blazing on every page of it, and giving the power to one single creditor, who simply has a debt of $500, to throw a man, regardless of the interests and wishes of the rest of his creditors, into bankruptcy.

Mr. Chairman, I shall ask leave to incorporate in my remarks section 6338 of the revised statutes of Ohio as now in force.

There was no objection.

The statute is as follows:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, That section 6338, as amended April 23, 1891 (O. L., volume 88, page 351), be amended so as to read as follows:

"Whenever any creditor or creditors of the assignor shall file a complaint alleging that the assignee or assignees named in the deed of assignment, or the trustee or trustees appointed by the court under the provisions of the next two preceding sections, are not suitable persons to administer the trust, or that their administration thereof will not be for the best interests of the creditors of the assignor and such assignor, the court shall thereupon issue a citation to such assignee or assignees or trustee or trustees and to the assignor, if resident within the State, to appear before such court at a time to be named therein. And if, on the hearing of such complaint, it be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court that such complaint is true, and a petition is filed with the court signed by creditors of the assignor, who own not less than $1,000 of debts against the assignor, and the validity of such debts is shown by the schedule of debts on file in the court, or otherwise established to the satisfaction of the court, praying for permission to elect a trustee or trustees, the court shall, by its order, fix a time for such election and cause notices to be sent by mail or otherwise to each of the creditors of the assignor, specifying a time when the creditors shall meet at the court room for the election of a trustee or trustees; and at the time named in such order, if creditors representing 50 per cent or more of the debts of the assignor are present or represented by attorney, they proceed to the election of a trustee or trustees, a majority in value of all the debts so represented at such meeting being necessary to a choice; and the proceedings of the meeting showing what creditors were present as aforesaid, and the amount of debts held by them, respectively, and who cast their several votes, shall be made out and signed by the president and secretary of the meeting and filed with the court; and if the court approves the choice, and if the trustee or trustees so elected appear within ten days thereafter and give bond, the court shall appoint him or them as such trustee or trustees, and remove the preceding assignee or trustee; Provided, That the summary determination of the court as to who are creditors and the amount of their claims in this section provided shall have no effect as to the validity of such claims, except for the purposes of such election."

SEC. 2. That said section 6338 be and the same is hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage. Passed February 7, 1894.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman will permit me a moment to occupy the floor in regard to this controversy that my colleague has imposed upon me.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will yield.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the dispute under consideration was this: My colleague was inveighing against the arbitrary power of a court to appoint an assignee in bankruptcy, and was pointing to the benign influences under which a failing debtor could make his own appointment. I was pointing out the statute of the State of Ohio, in keeping with the statutes of other States, did not allow that thing to be done and provided for the removal of an assignee. Now, then, that is a provision of a section of the code which, I confess very frankly, I had not heard had been modified. But the modification does not change the principle of the law.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. But, General, that is where you are mistaken.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not change the law in principle, and my friend has been careful not to state the year when that law was passed.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I think that law was passed in 1894.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not kept the run of the statutes that have been passed a little over a year ago. But the law in principle has not been changed, the principle being that the court upon a vote of the creditors will revise the appointment that was made before. That is what I claimed to be the law, and it turns out that this is the same law I cited, except that the court must find affirmatively that the action of the creditors is right. That is the only difference. "If it appear not to be for the interest of the estate," says the amendatory statute. That is a very broad and sweeping affirmation of the proposition that I made, and which my colleague himself, being more familiar with the statute than I was, asserted as strongly at the time as I did.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. One word, Mr. Chairman. Under the section of the statute as read by my distinguished colleague nothing was necessary but a petition of the creditors representing $1,000 and a vote of 50 per cent of the creditors to remove the assignee, and that was the gist of my colleague's argument yesterday. Under the statute as it exists to-day, and as it has existed for more than two years (it was passed in February, 1894), the creditors must not only vote, but they must prove to the satisfaction of the court the existence of two facts which are omitted from the section which my colleague read, and the omission of which changes the entire meaning of the section.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I told the gentleman last night where the statute was.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. You did not. I found it, but you did not tell me where it was.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I told you there was such a statute in existence. I discovered my error last evening, and told you of this amendatory statute.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Well, if the gentleman told me there was such a statute in existence, and if he knew it at the time he made his speech, why did he not send for the correct statute and have it incorporated in the RECORD?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have confessed that I did not know it at the time; but you did not know anything about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak upon this amendment, because it goes to the essence of the bill. A bankruptcy law with the involuntary feature left out is like the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out, because the interests of the honest and righteous creditors of any debtor are the same as the interests of the debtor himself.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think it is true that the tragedy is left out of the case when you leave out the involuntary feature. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman is simply following out a comparison upon all fours. I propose to come to the practical case. We want to protect the honest man who is struggling with his debts, who owes more than he can pay, and who has so told his creditors, so that they, as a whole, say to him: "Go on; do what you can. We believe that your energy, your earnestness, your business ability are worth more to us than the few dollars that you have in cash, or the few acres that you have in land, or the few dollars' worth of stock in your store." That, Mr. Chairman, is the case. Now, that debtor has among his hundred creditors one man who is a fool, or another man who is a shark, or another man who is timid, and one of those exceptional creditors comes to him and says: "Give me a preference." Or he does more. He attaches the debtor's goods. He brings suit. He says: "This will be pressed unless you settle with me first."

This is the case to be met. Is it any answer to say that the debtor under a voluntary bankruptcy bill can defeat such a creditor and can say to him, "I will go into bankruptcy if you force this upon me"? Bankruptcy is what the debtor most fears. It is death to his business. It is death to his good will. It is death to his good name. It is the one thing he wants to avoid. It is the thing he is struggling against with all his might. You do not protect that man by saying to him that he shall have the choice between death by attachment or death by bankruptcy. If you want to protect him, you must give him the right to say, "I can't," not "I won't." You must give him the right to say to that creditor that if he does this his other creditors will immediately throw him into bankruptcy, and that no benefit will come from any attachment or from any attempted preference.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the condition of business all over the Union is much that case. Business is going on by the good will and by the help of the good, the kind, and the sensible creditors. They, as well as the debtor, ask that the single creditor who is sharp, who is keen, who is timid, or who is a fool, shall not be able to defeat the other creditors and to break up the business by insisting upon a fraudulent preference.

Mr. Chairman, no bill which is to protect the debtor can be successful if it does not contain a feature by which the creditor also can protect himself against preferences by insolvents. We may not approve all of the particular provisions of this bill; I do not say that they are all necessary; but some law that will give protection to the honest, straightforward business men of the country, both debtors and creditors (for they have the same interests), is demanded by the people of this country. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DINGLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 7200) for the relief of A. T. Hensley;
A bill (H. R. 145) for the relief of J. J. Lints; and
A bill (H. R. 1191) to provide for the disposal of public reservations in vacated town sites or additions to town sites in the Territory of Oklahoma.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 7395) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to reconvey to the former owners a certain tract of land in Valverde County, Tex.; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1288) for the relief of John Stull;
A bill (S. 1860) for the relief of John M. Guyton, late postmaster at Blacksburg, S. C.;
A bill (S. 65) for the relief of J. E. Gillingwaters;
A bill (S. 1367) for the relief of the heirs of Jacob R. Davis; and
A bill (S. 2997) to provide for the fulfillment of the stipulations of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain signed at Washington on the 8th day of February, 1896.

TREATY STIPULATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. HITT. Before the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole, I ask consent that we take up for immediate consideration by the House the last bill embraced in the message just received from the Senate, as it is a matter of urgent importance, and the immediate passage of the bill is desired by the Secretary of State, by whom it was drafted. It has received the approval of both the members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] whether this bill is going to involve any debate.

Mr. HITT. We are all agreed upon it. Every member of the committee in the House has examined the matter. It was sent by the Secretary to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Iowa referred to me when he spoke of "the gentleman from Kentucky," I simply wish to say that I do not know that it will be necessary to have any debate upon this bill. There will be none unless its passage is objected to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DINGLEY). The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2997) to provide for the fulfillment of the stipulations of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain signed at Washington on the 8th day of February, 1896.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, with the approval of the President of the United States, in fulfilling the stipulations of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain signed at Washington on the 8th day of February, 1896. And the commission constituted by said treaty, when sitting at San Francisco, shall have power to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses by application to the circuit court of the United States for the ninth circuit, which said court is empowered and directed to make all orders and issue all processes necessary and appropriate to that end.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was read three times, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I rose a few moments ago, while the bill just passed was pending, to make a parliamentary inquiry. I wished to inquire whether, as the bill made an appropriation, it should not under our rules receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That point would have been good if the House had not given unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill in the House.

Mr. HITT. That was the request I made.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I did not hear it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee of the Whole will resume its session.

BANKRUPTCY.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] has two minutes remaining.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, the objection that I have to this and to all other bankruptcy laws is this: They proceed upon the assumption, as has been well said—or at any rate the leading idea of the advocates of them is—that a bankruptcy law is the best possible agency by which frauds may be suppressed; whereas the experience of the past, not only in America but in England, proves beyond question that the bankrupt system itself is the greatest possible agency of fraud. More frauds have been perpetrated in proceedings under bankrupt laws than anywhere else in connection with business. Now, sir, I do not rely merely upon my own weak, flickering intellectual lamp to establish that proposition. I will read for the benefit of this committee the opinion of Lord Eldon. It is reported in Kent's Commentaries, Volume II, page 393. That writer says:

With respect to the infirmities of the English bankrupt system, which has been the growth of upward of two centuries and has been constantly upon the review of Parliament and matured by the talents and experience of a succession of distinguished men in chancery, we may refer to the observations of Lord Eldon. When he succeeded to the great seal in 1801 he took the earliest opportunity to express his strong indignation at the frauds committed under cover of this system. He remarked that the abuse of the bankrupt laws was a disgrace to the country, and that it would be better at once to repeal all the statutes than to suffer them to be applied to such purposes. There was no mercy to the estate. Nothing was less thought of than the object of the commissions. As they were frequently conducted in the country they were little more than stock in trade for the commissioners, the assignees, and the solicitors.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit that the effect of the passage of this bill, containing, as it does, eight separate, distinct causes of involuntary bankruptcy, will be to transfer the greater portion of the insolvency business of this country from the State courts, from the neighborhood of the parties interested, to the Federal courts. It will not only do that, but it will involve a great amount of expense necessarily incident to such proceedings, by reason of the appointment of the vast number of agencies necessary to operate a system of bankrupt law. It will take probably three assignees or three trustees, as I believe they are called under this act (though never hitherto called such), in every county in these United States.

Mr. Chairman, let me proceed with the idea which I find sustained by Chancellor Kent, that the first great disadvantage necessarily connected with the operation of a bankruptcy system is the large number of agencies required to operate it. Why, sir, if we estimate the number of all the counties of the United States, and multiply that number by three, I should not be surprised if we should find a larger body of men who are to be engaged in the administration of this bill than were engaged on the Federal side in the battle of Bull Run. In the first place, this bill creates a perfect army of agents, every one of whom is to be fed out of the estates of the parties who are engaged in the litigation. Let us see how oppressively the bill would operate. Suppose a man has a dozen debts, each one of which we will suppose is a debt secured by mortgage or a judgment lien. No bankruptcy law that we can pass can affect such liens. They must be enforced by the sale of the property, and the debts paid, not by any agencies selected by the mortgagor or, in case of involuntary bankruptcy, by the mortgagee, but by the assignee or trustee appointed by the Federal court. Every particle of the property must be sold, if there is an outside creditor to institute the proceeding, and the cost must come out of the estate. Who, then, is the loser? Surely the creditor does not gain anything. So far as the costs are concerned, they go to this new swarm of officials that this bankruptcy bill will necessarily create.

But, Mr. Chairman, the most oppressive feature of this bill to my mind is this: The bill specifies eight causes of involuntary bankruptcy. As the bill now stands, the ninth provision having been stricken out, the unfortunate debtor—a mere child of misfortune—may have a petition in bankruptcy filed against him, alleging any one of the eight separate causes in this bill, and that petition is returned to a Federal court, and unless the party against whom the petition is filed answers the petition within fifteen days he is adjudged a bankrupt. Now, in many parts of the country the Federal court in which the petition is filed is remote from the home of the unfortunate debtor. Before the debtor against whom the petition is filed can escape the effects of being forced into bankruptcy he must appear and answer, and at the expiration of fifteen days all the perfidy and dishonor of involuntary bankruptcy are fixed upon him. Under this bill the judge may pass on the questions named by his answer, and in this way all the dishonor of involuntary bankruptcy is forced upon him without a jury trial. There are many other objectionable features of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes longer.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to object.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to limit the debate on this paragraph of section 2 and all amendments to it to twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I would most sincerely like to support this bill. My respect and esteem for the membership of the committee that brought in the bill, my esteem of their wisdom and patriotism, creates in me a desire to support it. But I do not see how it is possible for me to give my support to the bill in its present shape. As I have stated once before during the debate upon the bill, my duty is first of all to the people I have the honor to represent, not one of whom, by petition or letter, has asked me to support or vote for any sort of a bankrupt law.

I am willing to concede, Mr. Chairman, that although the condition that has prevailed in this country since the repeal of the bankrupt law enacted in 1867 has been one of the greatest growth and greatest expansion of both our commercial and industrial interests that the history of the United States has ever witnessed or any other country can show, so that it would seem we had been getting along very well under the operation of the statutes of the various States for the collection of debts—I am willing, however, to concede that the volume of indebtedness has been growing during these years of progress and prosperity, and the time may have come when the enactment of a general law by which the indebtedness of the country can be settled up and thousands of men who are to-day laboring and struggling under a load of indebtedness impossible to remove may be restored to the country and to its business interests. But in order to reach that end, no matter how desirable it may be, I contend that it can not be necessary to include in the involuntary features of the bankrupt law any provision that excludes from consideration acts of actual—not constructive—fraud.

No man ought to be forced into bankruptcy for an act in itself entirely honest. Now, if you will strike out of the second section of the bill—and I sincerely trust in the interest of what is so earnestly demanded here that the gentlemen supporting the bill on the floor of the House will do so—the second subdivision, the fifth subdivision, and the eighth subdivision, the ninth having been already stricken out, then you will leave in the bill, it seems to me, everything that can be demanded in the interest of the creditor as against the debtor anywhere in the land if you want to proceed along the lines of honesty, justice, and fairness. You leave in the first subdivision—that is to say:

Concealed himself, departed, or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors, and shall not have returned within at least forty-eight hours before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, and before the rights of creditors shall have been impaired or interfered with.

That remains in. You leave in also the third subdivision, in the following words:

Made a transfer of his property with intent to defeat his creditors, etc.

You leave in also the fourth:

Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts.

You also leave in the seventh:

Secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors, etc.

Now, I ask, in the name of all that is just and right between the creditor and the debtor, what else ought to be demanded? What else ought the creditor to ask for in order to assist him in the collection of his just debts? Certainly if the bill is to become an equitable adjustment of the law as between the creditor and the debtor, the amendment I have suggested ought to be adopted. If the subdivisions of section 2 which I have mentioned are struck out, I feel justified in saying that the bill will receive a number of votes, my own included, which must otherwise be recorded against it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the incomparable simile of the mysterious Junius reads:

Private credit is wealth; public honor is security. The feather that adorns the royal bird supports his flight. Strip him of his plumage and you fix him to the earth.

This simile is applicable to the subject we are now considering. It contains a large truth, forcibly and beautifully expressed.

It is amazing and somewhat surprising that so many gentlemen, in discussing the question now pending, seem to have in view the idea that the exclusive scheme of a bankruptcy bill is for the benefit of the poor debtor. My insistence is that the scheme of a uniform bankruptcy law should be the protection of the creditor class. Protect the creditor, and you therefore necessarily extend the credit of the country, and directly and indirectly, too, you protect the debtor.

Why, it is amusing, I do not say that it is demagogical, on the part of members who insist that a bankruptcy scheme should look for the protection simply of the debtor class, but the best judicial minds in this country, I think, are agreed that a bankrupt law that does not contain an involuntary feature would be unconstitutional, would not be carrying out the provision of our Constitution in regard to the enactment of a bankruptcy bill. Therefore, while I have not the time nor the opportunity to discuss this matter fully, if gentlemen on this floor will only think for a moment they will come to the necessary conclusion that any bankruptcy scheme must necessarily have for its objective point the protection of the credit of the country rather than the debtor. The creditor has no interest in crushing the debtor; his selfish interest is rather to nurse and protect the debtor, save a customer, and get his whole debt rather than a portion. His selfish interest suggests the maintenance of the honest debtor as an active factor in our commercial energies.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] had the floor this morning, I tried unavailingly to get before that gentleman and the House a document (Senate Document 48) showing that his statement that there is no general demand for a bankruptcy bill was inaccurate and a mistaken statement. I shall not print the document, but I call the attention of gentlemen to it. We have not seen fit to embody it in our report, but only to call attention to it. It is a document of 245 pages, containing the names and the short petitions of thousands upon thousands of business men of all classes and organizations of business men of all classes from all parts of this Union, every State and every part of every State, asking for the enactment into law of the original Torrey bill; and this bill is much more for the benefit of the debtor class than that bill ever purported to be. This shows a general demand for a bankrupt bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. May I ask the gentleman the date of these petitions?

Mr. RAY. Do not interrupt.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. When were they filed?

Mr. HENDERSON. The same date as those you read in your speech the other day.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That was in 1893.

Mr. HENDERSON. In 1892 and 1893; along there.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] started in to read a statement of the contents of this document. He read just two lines, and then stopped and threw it down, thereby representing to the members of this House that it was a document emanating from the wholesale grocers of St. Louis. Now, I know that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] intends ordinarily to be fair and candid. He is a man of great ability; he is a man of integrity; but when he gets stirred in debate, when he is undertaking to defeat a measure, as he was undertaking to do to-day, he sometimes forgets to be fair and candid. I insert, under the general leave to print, the entire description of the contents of this document in the RECORD, as follows:

“IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

January 19, 1892.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

See Bird's-Eye Index, page 181; Contents, page 3, and Index, page 205.

Mr. PERKINS presented the following:

“Addresses, memorials, indorsements, petitions, and resolutions advocating the enactment of the Torrey bankrupt bill of the Associated Wholesale Grocers of St. Louis; Columbus (Ga.) Board of Trade; Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York; Omaha (Nebr.) Board of Trade; Richmond (Va.) Chamber of Commerce; Missouri Bar Association; Board of Trade of Portland, Oreg.; National Wholesale Druggists' Association; Sundance (Wyo.) Board of Trade; Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Louisiana, at New Orleans; National Paint, Oil, and Varnish Association; Photographers' Association of America; first Western States Commercial Congress held at Kansas City; Contractors and Builders' Board of Trade of St. Paul; Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, held at Denver; Los Angeles (Cal.) Board of Trade; clippings from the press concerning national bankruptcy legislation; tables showing how commercial failures in the United States and bankruptcies in England are affected by legislation upon that subject; report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives; summary of the House of Representatives bill No. 2900 and Senate bill No. 1694 (the Torrey bill); list of the commercial, industrial, and professional bodies which have indorsed that measure, and the officers and committeemen of the National Bankruptcy Organization.”

I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that here are many individuals, many associations from his own State and one or more from his own district, demanding the enactment of that measure into law. They are as follows:

IOWA.

Blue Grass League of Southwestern Iowa, Creston.
Board of Trade of Burlington.
Business Men's Association, Davenport.
Business Men's Association, Keokuk.
Citizens of Algona (petition).
Citizens of Council Bluffs (petition).
Citizens of Davenport (petition).
Citizens of Dubuque (two petitions).
Citizens of Keokuk (petition).
Citizens of Monticello (petition).
Citizens of Sioux City (petition).
Iowa Bankers' Association, Dubuque.
State Business Men's Association, Des Moines.
State Business Men's Association, Marshalltown.
William L. Allen, Davenport.
John Blaul, Burlington.
John H. Branch, Marengo.
Arthur S. Burnell, Marshalltown.
Jonas M. Cleland, Sioux City.
Philip M. Crapo, Burlington.
James B. Harsh, Creston.
Frank Le Bron, Keokuk.
Daniel B. Nash, Davenport.
Lucius Wells, Council Bluffs.

And I want to say further, that this emanates not only from grocers, from dealers generally, but it comes from the commercial, the industrial, the professional bodies of men all over this country.

Now, the gentleman made another charge to which I desire to call attention. I think he only did it in the heat of debate. He said that I was the active agent or the willing tool of these associations of grocers or wholesale houses. He ought not to have made that charge. If he knew the history of this legislation, if he knew the history of my relations to this bankruptcy bill, he would know that upon the floor of this House and in the Judiciary Committee in the Fifty-second Congress and in the Fifty-third Congress I opposed to the best of my ability what was known as the Torrey bill. The chairman of this committee knows, all the members of the Judiciary Committee know, that in the Judiciary Committee in this Congress I fought this bill, with its harsh measures, as I considered them; that I insisted upon striking out many of them. They were stricken out. I insisted upon qualifying almost every one of the involuntary features remaining in the bill, and they were qualified. I have labored in the same line as has the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to a considerable degree, and he ought not to have made the charge he made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAY. I should like two or three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAY. I want to call the attention of the House to another argument that he suggested here and the fallacy of it. He went back a hundred years, and said that a bankruptcy bill was passed, and that after that the party which passed it was driven from power. Then he came down along the years and used that same argument.

Why, gentlemen of the committee, that is simply an appeal to your fears, trying to convey to the Republicans of this House the impression that should we enact this bill into law the people would turn upon us this fall and defeat us in the Presidential election. Now, that is not argument. That is not an appeal to your common sense or to your intelligence. After we had enacted the protective-tariff law in 1890 we were defeated at the polls. We had financial and industrial ruin and desolation, I believe, as the consequence, but when we came into power a year hence we shall have power to do what we think is right and just and proper, and place a law upon the statute books that will serve the interests of this people; and we shall have the courage and patriotism to return to the law of those days without fear and without asking favor. But I shall expect the gentleman from Iowa to rise in his place and say, "No, gentlemen; it will not do. In 1890 we passed a law changing the tariff, and were beaten at the polls thereafter. If we pass another, we will be again hurled from power." I simply call attention to this for the purpose of showing that the gentleman appeals to passion, to fear, and to prejudice, and not to the candid judgment of the members of this committee and House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, this is purely a matter of business, with no element of partisan bias entering into it. It appears to be conceded that there ought to be a uniform national bankrupt law. There has been no dispute of that proposition during the whole course of this debate. The whole issue, so far as the discussion has gone, is as to whether this proposed uniform bankrupt law shall be purely voluntary in its features, as provided by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, or whether it shall be both voluntary and involuntary, within the limits of the eight conditions proposed in this bill. This, then, is the sole practical question before us.

It seems to me the sole inquiry ought to be, what will be the public interest in this matter? It is not simply, what is the interest of debtors? it is not simply, what is the interest of creditors? but it is, what is the interest of both debtors and creditors, who compose the whole people of this country—for there is not a citizen of this country that is not at some time or other a debtor or a creditor, and usually both. We have no exclusively debtor class and no exclusively creditor class in this country. Therefore, the question is one as to the public interest; that and nothing more.

Now, is it for the public interest, in enacting a uniform bankrupt law, which the framers of the Constitution intended Congress should do, that this law should simply put it into the hands of a debtor alone to determine the distribution of an insolvent estate?—for it really comes down to that practically. The objection that has been urged here to the involuntary feature—that is, to the feature which allows the creditors under some circumstances to initiate these proceedings—is that the debtor will be severely dealt with and will suffer. Now, if this be true; if the introduction of an involuntary feature in a proposed national bankrupt law will, as a matter of fact, bring new and additional hardships upon the debtors of this country—if that be true, then it ought not to be incorporated in this bill, and no national bankrupt act should be passed. But is that true?

All the objections that have been raised to the involuntary features of this bill, it seems to me, have omitted to take note of the fact that there are existing laws in every State of this Union under which the creditor may proceed against the debtor more harshly than is provided in any of the provisions of this act; and it seems to me that right there lies what will prove to be the alleviating provision of this bill as respects the interests of the debtor. Here is a debtor, now, in any State of this Union, liable to be proceeded against by any single creditor he may have, and to have his property attached, with the knowledge on the part of the creditor that if he first gets in his attachment he will be first served; that acting as an ever-present inducement upon the individual creditors to fall upon the debtor at an earlier moment than they ever would fall upon him if they knew that that estate must in the last event be distributed proportionately among the creditors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. DINGLEY. Five minutes will answer my purpose.

Mr. BAILEY (continuing). Five minutes further, as the gentleman says that will answer his purpose.

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have observed not only in my own State, but in other States of the Union, that whenever a debtor is brought under any circumstances of suspicion, from any cause whatever, oftentimes without foundation, some creditor, knowing that if he attaches the property of such creditor first he will come in ahead and obtain his whole debt, instantly pounces upon his debtor, which he would not think of doing if he knew that under a general bankrupt law to proceed with a suit and attach the debtor's property would give him no advantage.

In my judgment the debtors of this country are suffering as they never would otherwise suffer because of the fact that selfish creditors have the knowledge that he that comes in first and attaches will obtain all his debt, so that we find a constant tendency to attach the property of creditors and drag them down; whereas if the creditors knew that they could obtain no advantage by such proceedings, but that, under a uniform bankruptcy law, if the debtor became insolvent and the estate was settled in bankruptcy each creditor would get only his appropriate share, the effect would be that all would keep their hands off, and the honest debtor would go along and finally would be able to lift his head above the troubles that had surrounded him.

And, Mr. Chairman, in this condition lies one of the difficulties in the way of the restoration of credit in this country. We must bear in mind that 90 per cent of the business of this country is done on credit. It is confidence, credit, that sets the wheels of business in motion, and a law which will restore credit and confidence will go far to set the wheels of industry in motion; is one which will establish the fact that every debtor and every creditor may proceed with a knowledge on the part of all that if the worse comes to the worst the assets of the debtor will be distributed proportionately.

Hence I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that, in my judgment, in insisting upon a merely voluntary system of bankruptcy, as some of you do—no doubt with the honest conviction that it is for the interest of the debtors of the country—you are making a great mistake. You are doing the debtor harm instead of good, and when it shall be recognized throughout this whole broad country that creditors must all be served proportionately, and that no one can obtain an advantage by pressing upon the debtor, then there will be not only improved credit and confidence, but greater prosperity everywhere. I have no more doubt of this fact than that I stand here. Hence I deprecate any attempt to introduce into this discussion class considerations. They have no place here. We have no such distinct classes as debtors and creditors in this country; and it is for the interest of every section of the country, North or South, East or West, to inspire that confidence which will come from a restoration of credit when it is believed and known that everywhere throughout this country every honest debtor may go forward with his business and every creditor may feel that the debtor will simply do for him what he does for every other creditor. Hence I hope, in the interest of the debtor, in the interest of the creditor, in the public interest everywhere, that the motion which has been made to strike out the involuntary provision in this bill will not prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this paragraph and the amendments is exhausted under the order of the committee. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] to the amendment of his colleague [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I would like consent to withhold that amendment so that I may offer it at the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr.

MAHON asks consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment and the amendment to the amendment be read.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask to substitute for the amendment I offered yesterday the one which I send to the desk. It is precisely what I offered yesterday except that two words are transposed in this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] desires to modify his amendment. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, as modified.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair evidently misunderstood me. I did not wish to withdraw my amendment. I asked consent to withhold it so that I could offer it at the end of the section.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, we can consider only one of those propositions at a time. The first is the withdrawal of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] states that he did not desire to withdraw his amendment. The question, then, is on that amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of section 2 the following:

"Provided, If said involuntary petition be dismissed by the court, or withdrawn by the petitioner or petitioners with leave of the court, the respondent or respondents to said petition shall be allowed by the court all reasonable expenses and counsel fees incurred by respondent or respondents in defending against said petition, and the petitioner or petitioners shall pay all expenses and counsel fees as allowed by the courts as well as the costs of said proceedings: And provided further, That within five days from the time an involuntary petition is filed in court the petitioner or petitioners shall file a bond in the same court where the petition has been presented, with at least two good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the said court, in such sum as the court may direct, conditioned for the payment to the respondent or respondents, their heirs, administrators, executors, or assigns, of all expenses, costs, and counsel fees allowed by the court. No action shall be taken on the petition until after a bond has been filed and approved by the court."

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by inserting the word "damages" between the word "expenses" and the word "costs."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Is this proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] an amendment or a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. If the substitute were adopted, would that take away the opportunity to vote upon the amendment itself?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON].

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as amended.

The question being taken, the Chairman declared that the yeas seemed to have it.

On a division there were—ayes 88, yeas 49.

So the amendment was adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment offered by me and the amendment to my amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas be reported before the vote is taken.

The amendment of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE was read, as follows: Strike out all of paragraph "a," section 2, beginning with "section 2," on page 5, and ending with line 47, page 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Before this amendment is read I ask that the portion of the bill which my amendment proposes to strike out be also read.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Your amendment simply strikes out the provisions for involuntary bankruptcy?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Then what is the use of reading it? I object.

The amendment of Mr. BRODERICK was read, as follows:

Strike out, beginning with and including the first line of section 2 and down to and including the word "over," in line 47, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. ACTS OF BANKRUPTCY.—Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist while insolvent (1) in his having fraudulently contracted the debt or debts of creditors who seek to avail themselves of the provisions of this act; (2) sold or transferred his property, or some part thereof, with intent to defeat his creditors; or (3) concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile, with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors, and shall not have returned before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy."

Mr. DINGLEY. That will allow a portion of the creditors to bring suit and get preferences.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I should like to put a question to the author of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I ask unanimous consent to have an answer to one question.

Several members objected.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAILEY. My understanding is that the friends of the bill are entitled to perfect this section, if it can be perfected, and that therefore the vote should first be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] to the text of the bill, and then, even if that amendment should be adopted, the motion of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] would still be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] was offered as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAILEY. But the motion to strike out and insert, I take it, would take precedence of a motion merely to strike out, because the motion to strike out and insert is designed to perfect the text of the bill. I have no special interest in the matter one way or the other, but that seems to me the orderly method of proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] to that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question being taken, there were on a division (called for by Mr. BRODERICK)—ayes 73, yeas 92.

Mr. BRODERICK. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 21 voting in favor thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] will act as tellers.

Mr. TUCKER. I desire to state that I am paired generally with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DRAPER]. If not paired, I should have voted in the affirmative on this amendment.

Mr. BRODERICK. I withdraw the call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The call for tellers being withdrawn, the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] is rejected. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] to strike out the paragraph.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected; there being—ayes 72, yeas 102.

Mr. TRACEY. Is a further amendment to the pending section in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. TRACEY. I move to amend by striking out the second, fifth, and eighth subdivisions of the first paragraph of section 2.

Mr. HENDERSON. I demand that each of these three different propositions be voted on separately.

Mr. TRACEY. Then I will move in the first place to strike out the second subdivision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] moves to strike out the second subdivision of the first paragraph of the pending section. The language proposed to be struck out will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) Failed for thirty days and until a petition is filed while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold within such time under such process, then until three days before the time fixed for such sale.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. TRACEY, it was rejected; there being—ayes 77, yeas 82.

Mr. TRACEY. I move to amend by striking out the fifth subdivision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the language which the gentleman from Missouri proposes to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

(5) Made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference, and has not regained the ownership of such property or released same from such levy before the rights of creditors shall have been altered, changed, or impaired by reason of such transfer, taking, or levy, and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected; there being—ayes 19, yeas 96.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move to amend by striking out the fourth subdivision.

The CHAIRMAN. The language which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] proposes to strike out will be read.

The Clerk read as follows.

(4) Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRACEY. I now renew my motion to strike out the eighth subdivision.

The CHAIRMAN. The words which the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] proposes to strike out will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(8) Suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 71, noes 80.

Mr. TRACEY. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 29 voting in favor thereof; and Mr. TRACEY and Mr. HENDERSON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 78, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as paragraph 9:

"(9) Made while insolvent a contract personally or by agent for the purchase or sale of a commodity with intent not to receive or deliver the same, but merely to receive or pay a difference between the contract and the market price thereof at a time subsequent to the making of such contract."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

b A petition may be filed against a person who has committed an act of bankruptcy within four months after the commission of such act. Such time shall not expire until four months after (1) the date of the recording or registering of the transfer or assignment when the act consists in having made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors or for the purpose of giving a preference as hereinbefore provided, or an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, if by law such recording or registering is required or permitted, or, if it is not, from the date when the beneficiary takes notorious, exclusive, or continuous possession of the property, unless the petitioning creditors have received actual notice of such transfer or assignment; or (2) the date of the return of legal process when the act consists in having secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors, as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph, merely to say that it has been represented throughout this debate that the pending bill is a vast improvement on the bill which was defeated in the House during the last Congress.

I desire to say to the House and desire to put into the RECORD that there is absolutely no change in that vital part of the bill that specifies the acts of bankruptcy—or at least that there is none except unimportant verbal changes—with the single simple exception that this bill omits the amendment which I offered a moment ago, and which has just been rejected by the committee. Every act which constituted an act of bankruptcy under the bill we defeated last year constitutes an act of bankruptcy under this bill, save and except only the act of dealing in futures.

I submit to the judgment of the Judiciary Committee and the judgment of this House that the only theory upon which you can proceed to take from an insolvent debtor his estate is that his estate properly belongs to the creditors. And, if that theory be well founded and the commission of any act will entitle the bankrupt creditors to take possession of his estate and administer it, the fact that he is gambling with it would seem to be a proper ground for such action. I proposed to amend the act in good faith, not merely as a species of antioption legislation, but in consonance and in harmony with the spirit and principles of the bill, which is that an insolvent debtor is not entitled to administer his estate. If that theory is well founded it must follow, as naturally as night follows the day, that whenever he undertakes to gamble with it he forfeits his right to control it.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ABBOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, at the end of line 64, add:

"Provided, That the person against whom a petition is filed shall have a right of action in any court of competent jurisdiction, Federal or State, to recover the actual damages by him sustained by reason of the filing of such petition, if the same be wrongfully filed; and if the person or persons filing such petition acted maliciously and without probable cause, the person against whom the petition is filed shall have a right of action for vindictive or exemplary damages as well as for actual damages."

Mr. ABBOTT. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that there are no provisions in the bill whereby an honest debtor can be protected from an exacting creditor.

We all know, especially those who are lawyers and have had any connection with the practice of the courts in this country in this respect, that a debtor, when a writ of attachment has been levied on his property, if the writ of attachment is wrongfully sued out, is entitled to the actual damages by him sustained. If the writ is sued out maliciously and without probable cause, he is entitled to exemplary or punitive damages as a punishment to the creditor who seeks to oppress him. That is a principle that is recognized by all of the State courts and the laws of the various States in the Union.

Now, why should there be a distinction between involuntary bankruptcy and an attachment proceeding under the laws of the State? Suppose the case of an honest debtor who is embarrassed by an obligation that he can not immediately meet. The crops of the country may have failed to some extent; calamities may have come upon the community where he is doing business; he may be honest, and may make an honest effort to meet his obligations and pay his debts to the wholesale merchant, but circumstances beyond his control prevent him from meeting his obligations at the time they mature.

Now, if that man be honest—and it is a question of fact that can always be established by his neighbors and friends whether he is honest and whether he is dealing honestly and fairly or not—if an exacting creditor comes upon him under these circumstances and places him in the bankruptcy court, what relief has he under this bill? None whatever. You can take what he possesses and destroy the opportunities that he might have had if these unlawful and improper proceedings had not been begun against him. Therefore I say that the debtor ought to have the same rights which he would have in case an attachment had been sued out maliciously or without probable cause. Those are terms which the courts of every State have heretofore defined. There can be no mistake as to the wrongful or malicious suing out of an attachment without probable cause. In these cases I say that the debtor ought to be protected, and I will say furthermore that it will add very much, in my judgment, to the strength of this bill, so far as it relates to the involuntary clause, if you adopt this amendment. Creditors are not likely to go into the courts wrongfully and maliciously and place a man into bankruptcy if these creditors know that their debtor has a remedy against them for their wrongful acts; they will be cautious about placing debtors in the bankruptcy court. Therefore it will add strength to the bill in so far as the involuntary clause is concerned.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, these are all the remarks I desire to make on the subject.

The amendment of Mr. ABBOTT was rejected.

Mr. MAHON. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] made a statement here which he held up to the committee as a sort of bogey man to frighten the Republicans not to vote for this bill. He went back into politics to the day of the Federalists, to 1841, and 1867, stating that the party which favored and passed a bankruptcy bill met with defeat at the following election or shortly afterwards. Now, the act of 1867 was passed by a Republican House and Senate—

Mr. TAWNEY. And its repeal was advocated by a Republican President.

Mr. MAHON. In 1868 the Republican party elected Gen. Ulysses S. Grant President of this country after the act of 1867 was passed. In 1872 that act was still on the statute books, and Grant was again elected. In 1876 we elected Hayes President of this country, and the law was repealed in 1878. In 1880 we elected Garfield. Then Providence, having something against the American people, permitted the election of Cleveland in 1884. We elected Harrison in 1888. Cleveland was elected again in 1892—

Mr. BROMWELL. And McKinley in 1896. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. And just as sure as the sun sets this evening we shall elect a Republican President in 1896. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Several MEMBERS. Name him!

Mr. MAHON. QUAY. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I move to strike out "QUAY" and insert "McKinley." [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the act of 1867 did not frighten the Republicans of this country nor the people who were attached to that political faith, but after the law had been in force for years and years they continued to elect Republican Presidents and Republican Congresses.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I move to strike out the word "QUAY" and insert the word "McKinley."

Mr. MAHON. If you do you will be defeated. You had better withdraw your amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] was undoubtedly sleeping while I made the remark to which he has attempted to reply. I said to him and to the committee that the House of Representatives which enacted the bankruptcy law of 1867 contained 49 Democrats and 143 Republicans. I said that it was but a few years until that majority was reversed, and that the Democracy were in charge of this House, and trying, so far as they could, at least, to prevent beneficial legislation.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HEPBURN. That statement is true; and the gentleman has not gainsaid it.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that law was in force eleven years, in which period the Republican party was in power in this country.

Mr. HEPBURN. Were they in power? A Democrat from Indiana was elected Speaker of the House, and a Democrat from Pennsylvania was also elected Speaker of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next clause.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this in order that I may submit a few remarks upon the pending bill as expressive of my views in relation thereto. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the discussion on this subject for the last three or four days, as I always do on these occasions, that I may obtain knowledge and gain information. Distinguished lawyers upon one side have advocated the passage of the bill with the involuntary feature in it, and distinguished lawyers upon the other side have advocated the passage of a voluntary bankrupt bill, and I have been listening attentively, for I love to hear wise men talk, until I have gotten considerably tangled up in the premises, and I hardly know what to do. [Laughter.] So I have concluded that in order to be upon the safe side, and to relieve the doubt, I shall throw my vote and influence against the passage of the whole bill; and in doing that I think I will be right. [Applause.] This is a measure from the Judiciary Committee, composed, of course, entirely of lawyers, and they are divided on it. It is an old saying that "when rogues fall out honest men get their dues." In saying that I do not mean any reflection upon the lawyers [laughter], for some of the best men that ever lived were lawyers, and some of the best living to-day are lawyers; hence no affront from me.

It seems to me that this bill, with the involuntary and voluntary features in it, or either with one or the other by itself, is alone intended to be in the interest of a certain class, and a very small class at that in comparison with the whole country—the great wholesale dealers and the money power of this country—and against the interest of the great masses of the people. I am reminded, sir, by the lawyers, from the way they have talked and changed front on this question, of a discussion I once heard, and an explanation was given of the question, "Why a lawyer was like a restless man upon a bed." Can you tell me why? It is said that it is "because he lies first on one side and then turns and lies on the other." [Laughter.] Now, those conflicting opinions have, as I said, turned me around mightily. And in this dilemma in which I find myself I shall be compelled to vote against the passage of either the voluntary or involuntary feature of the bill in order to finally extricate myself from the difficulty. I wholly indorse the remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY]; and I desire here to submit as a portion of my remarks a table which I have prepared, giving the years from 1857 down to 1895, which shows the number of failures in each year and the amount of the failures, amounting in all to $5,086,000,000, which will speak for itself, and shows very plainly that the cause of these failures must rest somewhere as a result of unfriendly legislation at the hands of the lawmakers.

THE REIGN OF BANKRUPTCY.

Year.	Number of failures.	Amount of failures.
1857	4,932	$291,000,000
1858	4,225	95,000,000

1894	13,895	172,000,000
1895	13,197	173,000,000
Total	265,774	5,086,000,000

This table shows a distressing state of affairs, and following it is the fact that the great common people are all bankrupt in a measure. And then again, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the passage of any bankruptcy bill, because I do not see the necessity for it at this time or the circumstances existing which calls for such enactment. Nobody has asked for it except the boards of trade, chambers of commerce, money kings, and such like. I think that the best way to judge of the future is by the past; and from an examination of past legislation we find that in 1800 a general bankruptcy bill was passed. How long did it live? In less than three years it was repealed, on account of its obnoxious features, on account of its vicious tendency and its outrageous effects upon the people of the country. In 1841 another bankrupt bill was passed, and in less than three years again, on account of the like vicious tendency and the same obnoxious features of that bill, it was repealed, because the people again moaned under its oppression and weight. Then again, in 1867, another bankrupt bill was passed. It lasted, I believe, a little longer than the others, about fifteen years, and then it was repealed, after it proved an engine of destruction and oppression.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I see no reason under the existing circumstances, with the uncertainty and difference of opinion among these distinguished gentlemen here who are lawyers and of whom there is a great majority in this Congress, as in many other Congresses, late and otherwise, and of whom there has been a great majority since we had a Congress in the United States, for the passage of such a bill. Just think of the condition of this country to-day, the greatest upon the face of the earth, and the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few and the continued efforts to further concentrate the same. The conviction must be riveted upon any intelligent man's mind that to-day, when he sits down and contemplates the present condition of our Government with its amazing class legislation and enormous grants of power, that a despotism of corporate wealth has subverted our free democratic institutions and we have a Government of the classes against the masses; and who are responsible for it?

I do not charge the Democratic party with being responsible for this condition; I do not charge the Republican party as being solely responsible for it; but I do say that the lawyers of this country are responsible for the present deplorable condition of this country, more particularly the lawyers who belong to the Republican party, because they have been instrumental mostly in fixing laws since the war, before there were many Democrats in Congress, especially from the South. But speaking of lawyers generally, they have controlled legislation for the last one hundred years, and I say they are entitled to all the credit that they can claim for putting the country in the condition in which it is found to-day; and I think the time has come when we should refuse to follow the lead of the lawyers entirely, as we have been doing, and go back to the people and to their interest, and try to do that which will inure to their benefit and try to do something in their interest. For these reasons and many others, which I have not time to enumerate in a five-minute speech, I am not in favor of the passage of any bankruptcy bill at present, but will vote against it; and I hope it will be overwhelmingly defeated. [Applause.] In conclusion, I desire to say that I do not mean to make war upon our lawyers in what I have said, but only to call attention to the fact that they are responsible for the most part for legislation, as they have for a long time controlled and are now controlling Congress, and to call upon them to come closer to the already impoverished yeomanry of the country who have put them in office. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWE. Mr. Chairman, I will occupy but a few moments of the valuable time of this committee in the discussion of this bill. Such a monstrosity in a business sense as attains in this country to-day is without a parallel in the commercial world outside of the United States. All civilized nations have enacted adequate laws for the protection of both creditors and debtors. In this country there are as many laws as there are States, each State being a law unto itself and each being antagonistic to the others.

We boast of our civilization; we boast of our internal resources and the grandeur and glory of the Republic, and yet we neglect to enact a law that will facilitate the general development of the country and the enlargement of its business. Our present and future commercial and industrial possibilities are dwarfed because of the lack of proper protection for the transaction of business. Thousands of honest men who have failed in business walk as slaves because, having failed, and that through no fault of their own, they find no relief from the bondage of debt because of the failure of Congress to enact a bankruptcy law for their relief. This condition should not be.

This bill provides for the expediting of a settlement of the estates of men who have become insolvent. It provides for the proper distribution of the effects of an estate in the interests of the creditors, and at the same time releases the debtor and allows him to start anew. It releases him from the darkness of Egyptian night and places him in the sunlight of hope. Mr. Chairman, there is a universal demand for a bankruptcy law, to be without which is to be wrong in theory, wrong in principle, and wrong in practice. The Constitution says: "Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States." The enactment of this bill would be in accordance with its direction; its provisions have been carefully weighed and considered by the Judiciary Committee. It is the product of wise and sagacious men, and has behind it the indorsement of the business men of the country. In fact, the business interests of the nation cry aloud for its enactment into law. Not one protest has come from any of the great business concerns of the country against it.

Mr. Chairman, it is our privilege under the Constitution to enact this law, and the business interests of the country demand that we perform our full duty. No single State can establish such a law, for each is a law unto itself. A State may enact a bankrupt law, but it will only apply to its own citizens, and here is the present difficulty. What is law in one State is of no effect in another, so that the solution of the matter is only to be found in a uniform national bankruptcy law. The provisions of this bill are as much in the interests of the debtor as of the creditor, and at the same time are a standing menace to those who would be dishonest and grow rich by fraud. The enactment of this law will cause business to be conducted on a safe and sound basis. It will cause business men to see to it that their capital is kept intact. They will scan their credits as well as their liabilities, keeping them within the bounds of safety. It will stimulate wise business sagacity and promote integrity, which are essential to successful business enterprise. With these requisites trade and commerce will move on from conquest to conquest. Mr. Chairman, I but voice the sentiments of the commercial and industrial interests of the country when I plead for the passage of this bill.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "act," in line 50, page 7, the following:
"Provided, however, That in no case can a petition be filed signed by less than three creditors with provable claims against the person who has committed an act of bankruptcy which amount in the aggregate, in excess of the value of securities held by them, if any, to $500 or over."

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Now, Mr. Chairman, that amendment is offered in the interest of those who wish to support this bill if it is possible to do so. This morning one amendment was carried which struck from the bill the ninth clause, providing that any man who had failed to pay a promissory note for thirty days could be forced into bankruptcy. There still remains in the bill another clause equally pernicious with that, and that is the clause that allows any one creditor to force into bankruptcy any man, whether the other eleven creditors may wish it or not.

Now, it has been said here in the arguments in favor of this bill that involuntary bankruptcy is in favor of all the creditors in order to prevent a preference. It is my experience as a lawyer, and I am sure it is the experience of every lawyer in this House, that the most pernicious preference that has ever been obtained by any creditor is that preference which is obtained by the "shyster" lawyer, who comes in when all the other creditors desire to arrange with the debtor and by holding out secures the whole of his claim with interest and fees for the lawyer himself.

Mr. NORTHWAY rose.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I do not care to be interrupted now. My colleague [Mr. RAY] admitted yesterday, when the question was asked him, that the way one shyster lawyer creditor could be gotten rid of would be by the other creditors paying off his claim, so that they might be free to arrange with the debtor. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is one of the most pernicious points in this bill, and if that is stricken out I am sure the bill will receive many votes of gentlemen who desire to vote for it if they are permitted to do so.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to a point in connection with that amendment. On page 51 the bill provides that "three or more creditors who have provable claims against any person which amount in the aggregate, in excess of the value of securities held by them, if any, to $500 or over" may file a petition. There the number is limited to three, and unless that part of the bill should be reached there will be a conflict between it and the gentleman's amendment if it is adopted.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It is there permitted to 3 creditors, unless there are 12, in which case if 11 of them desire to give the man an opportunity to get relief this 1 creditor, by holding out, can compel the other 11 to pay his claim in full. This amendment must come in at some place. We may not be able to insert it on page 51, because we may not have time to reach that part of the bill, and it is equally appropriate in this place, following the words "a petition may be filed against a person who has committed an act of bankruptcy within four months after the commission of such act."

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. What is the amount in the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Not less than $500; the same as on page 51.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Why not make it a thousand dollars?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. No; I wish to have it accord with the provision on page 51, to prevent greater conflict in the two provisions.

Mr. MILES. Do you mean $500 each or $500 in the aggregate?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Five hundred dollars each. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the most pernicious preference that is ever obtained in such cases is that which is obtained by the shyster lawyer, and this amendment will obviate that.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Suppose there are but three creditors and two stand out; can the other one force the man into bankruptcy?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. You can draw upon your imagination if you please, but I think you can hardly suppose that in actual business a man in this situation will have only three creditors—

Mr. NORTHWAY. Suppose there are twelve creditors and only two of them have claims amounting to $500?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. If a man should be forced into bankruptcy it will be easy to get three out of twelve creditors to act.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Are you not mistaken when you say that on page 51 the amount is limited to $500 each? Is it not $500 in the aggregate?

Mr. MILES. If the gentleman will make it $500 in the aggregate he will get some votes for his amendment that he would not otherwise get.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The suggestion is made to me by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that we put this amendment to a vote as it is, and if there is any conflict it can be arranged afterwards in conference.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is, if the gentleman's amendment prevails. Of course I have no authority to make any arrangement about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

On motion of Mr. MILES, by unanimous consent, the time of Mr. FAIRCHILD was extended five minutes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I have said all that it is necessary to say on this point. I am a good deal in the position of the lawyer who came into court to have his client excused from being punished for contempt for nonappearance. He said, "May it please the court, there are one hundred reasons why my client should not be punished for contempt of court. The first is that he is dead. The second is—" "Hold on," said the court; "that reason is sufficient. You need not give the other ninety-nine." [Laughter.] I think after we have heard the eloquent words of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in regard to the evil effects of securing preferences to one creditor over another—and we all agree about that—gentlemen here can readily recognize, especially lawyers who have had experience in this business, that the most pernicious of all preferences is that which is given to a shyster lawyer who seeks to gain a selfish advantage.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. The gentleman would better make his amendment read, "$500 in the aggregate."

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to provide that the claims shall be not less than $500 in the aggregate.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "act," line 50, page 7, the following:
"Provided, however, That in no case can a petition be filed signed by less than three creditors with provable claims against a person who has committed an act of bankruptcy, which amount in the aggregate, in excess of the value of securities held by them, if any, to $500 or over."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding to section 2, line 64, the following:
"That this bill shall apply to debts existing at the time of the passage of this act, but not to debts thereafter contracted."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ABBOTT, it was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to make a statement, to which I ask the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON]. In about twenty-two minutes from now, under the operation of the special order, this bill, with the amendments, must be reported to the House. I have examined the order, and, except for the understanding which I had with the gentleman from Iowa, it would not be possible to obtain a vote on the substitutes which it is desired to offer.

Mr. HENDERSON. That understanding is sacred.

Mr. BAILEY. I am perfectly sure of that. In view of that understanding, and in view of the further fact that no other amendment could be offered and discussed, I ask unanimous consent at this time to offer the substitute which I desire to offer, and the friends of another substitute shall offer that.

Mr. HENDERSON. Which substitute do you propose to offer—the one you had pending?

Mr. BAILEY. The one I had prepared.

Mr. HENDERSON. You want to offer that now?

Mr. BAILEY. And then my friend from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] desires to offer another substitute.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman from Kansas has surely had his "day in court."

Mr. BRODERICK. The rule provides that there may be two substitutes. The substitute I offered heretofore was simply a substitute for one section. I want to offer a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the gentleman propose to offer the Senate bill?

Mr. BRODERICK. The Senate bill with some amendments. I will send it to the desk.

Mr. HENDERSON. Wait a moment. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has the first right under the arrangement.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the gentleman from Kansas be permitted to offer his substitute.

Mr. HENDERSON. That you yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Kansas that he may offer his substitute.

Mr. BRODERICK. I offer the substitute which I send to the desk.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the substitute is offered in Committee of the Whole, is it the understanding that under the agreement between the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Texas the substitute may also be offered in the House? I understood the agreement was that the substitute might be offered after the committee rose and the bill had been reported.

Mr. BRODERICK. The rule provides that the substitute be reported to the House so that it shall be considered in the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then, by offering it in committee, the friends of the substitute do not waive the right to have it offered in the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. If it is offered in Committee of the Whole it will be reported to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can hardly undertake to say what will be done in the House. But as the Chair understands the special rule, the Committee of the Whole is to consider the bill under the five-minute rule until 4 o'clock, when the committee will rise and report the bill, with the amendments adopted, to the House. Of course it would be competent for the committee by unanimous consent to allow this substitute to be offered in the committee at the present time, but that would not control the action of the House.

Mr. BRODERICK. The rule provides that two substitutes may be offered.

Mr. HENDERSON. The rule does not provide that; but we agreed to that.

Mr. BRODERICK. That was agreed to, at any rate. The rule provides that the substitutes shall be disposed of in the House. Now, I simply want to have this substitute pending, and I understand there is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] asks unanimous consent to offer a substitute and have it pending at this time.

Mr. KERR. I object.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I shall make a pro forma amendment for the purpose of saying what I desire to say.

Mr. BRODERICK. I think we are entitled as a matter of right to have this substitute offered. It was assented to by the House, as I understand, that there might be two substitutes voted upon, and they are to be reported to the House. Now, the inference is that they may be introduced and pending here, so that when the Committee of the Whole shall rise they may be reported to the House and acted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined the special rule and also what was said in the House at the time of its adoption. It is the opinion of the Chair that without the subsequent agreement on the part of the House itself the bill would have been considered in the House and not in the Committee of the Whole. The whole proceeding contemplated seemed to be a proceeding in the House. Subsequently, by unanimous consent, as gentlemen will remember, an understanding was had that the bill be considered in Committee of the Whole. The special rule speaks of no substitute, but it does say that at 4 o'clock the bill shall be reported, with the amendments adopted, to the House. The subsequent agreement, made after the adoption of this rule, was that these two substitutes might be offered. The Chair construes that to mean offered in the House, not in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think that was assented to by unanimous consent; I believe it was so understood and agreed to by the entire House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think it would be bad faith if the substitute were not permitted to be offered in the House.

Mr. BAILEY. That is sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] offer a pro forma amendment?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I am confirmed in the opinion which I have expressed on more than one occasion in this House, that a voluntary system of bankruptcy is the only one which will ever be satisfactory in this country, and it ought to be a temporary measure of relief.

I do not believe it can be fairly charged against the friends of a voluntary system that we look only to the interest of debtors and overlook the interest of creditors. We know that in every State in the Union the State courts, as well as the United States courts, stand open to creditors for enforcement of their honest claims against their debtors. But we know also that there is nowhere in all of this broad land of ours a forum where an honest and unfortunate debtor can surrender his property and procure a discharge from his obligations. Recognizing, therefore, that the creditors now have their ample protection, and that the debtors are without any adequate relief, we have proposed a simple measure, leaving the right of the creditors absolutely undisturbed, but giving to the debtors a right which they do not now enjoy. We have safeguarded it to answer the only objection which has been made and which can be made against it. We have provided that no debtor can obtain his release unless he surrenders all of his property for the equal benefit of all his creditors.

Neither my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] nor my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] disputes that it is just, wise, and humane to emancipate an honest debtor; but my friend from Maine says that under the present law the creditor who first attaches absorbs the entire estate and leaves the other creditors without protection. Mr. Chairman, without stopping to insist that diligence is a virtue and that a watchful creditor deserves some advantage over one who sleeps upon his rights, I desire to make another answer to the suggestion of the gentleman. In our substitute it is provided that if any creditor attaches the property of a debtor, the debtor may file an assignment and vacate the attachment, thereby subjecting his property to a pro rata distribution among his creditors. Thus we secure what the gentleman from Maine declares to be the primary good of the pending bill—an equal distribution of the debtor's assets among his various creditors. We insure this result by appealing to the debtor's selfishness and resentment, which are the two most powerful motives that influence the conduct of men. It is certain that every insolvent will desire a discharge from his debts, and this can only be attained by vacating the attachment; it is also certain that the debtor will resent the conduct of an attaching creditor, and these two motives, operating in the same direction, are certain to produce the result at which we aim.

I fully subscribe to the doctrine that a debtor should not be permitted to pay some of his creditors with his property or money and to pay others with the certificate of a bankrupt court; but I do not subscribe to the doctrine that all debts are of equal obligation. All ought to be paid; but if all can not be paid, then it may frequently happen that some have higher claims upon the debtor's conscience than others, and in such cases it would be dishonorable not to pay these debts first. The fact that the debtor must treat all creditors alike in order to procure his discharge will be sufficient to induce him to do so, except in those rare cases where he is bound by some high sense of honor to give a preference. Legislators can not ignore the fact that there are debts in which an element of moral obligation enters which the honest man ought to and will respect, and which a wise law will permit him to respect. There is no man here who does not believe that rather than satisfy the greed of a rapacious creditor he should return to the widow the money which he borrowed of her, nor is there one who will deny that a debt contracted to a creditor who desired only to accommodate the debtor ought to be paid before a debt due to a man who dealt with the debtor solely for the profit of the transaction.

Sir, all preferences are not dishonest, nor are they necessarily unfair. Many of them proceed from the very highest attributes of human nature—a desire to redeem a moral as well as a financial obligation—and this assault upon all preferences bears the taint of a commercial spirit, which, if permitted to have its way in this country, will eliminate from American life the element of good-fellowship, the spirit of neighborly accommodation, and place all debts, however contracted, for whatever purpose contracted, or to whomsoever due, on precisely the same footing. It is bad morals to teach us that the poor widow has no higher claim on our justice than a rich and powerful creditor; and I am one of those who do not believe that bad morals can be good law. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it—and if I am mistaken I desire to be corrected—it is not the purpose of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to offer his substitute, but it is the purpose of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] to offer the bill S. 742, with certain amendments, as a substitute. Now, am I correct in that?

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the gentleman from New York that that matter is under consideration. I am inclined to believe that the proposition of my friend from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] is stronger than my own proposition, and if we reach that conclusion, why, we will try to unite on that. Otherwise, we shall offer both.

Mr. RAY. Then, of course, I am as yet uncertain as to how that will be; but however it may be, the objections to the one bill are equally as great to both. I desire to call the attention of those who favor a just, equitable, enforceable, and operative bankrupt law to the provisions of the proposed substitute and my objections. The proposed substitute reads as follows in section 1—

Mr. MARSH. Whose substitute?

Mr. RAY. I am reading from the substitute that is to be offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK]. The proposed substitute of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] reads precisely the same, so far as this section is concerned.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is the George bill?

Mr. RAY. It is the George bill:

That if any debtor owing $200 or more who is unable to pay his debts shall execute an assignment or cession of his property—

Mr. TAWNEY. The wording of the proposed amendment is: Insolvent and unable to pay his debts.

Mr. RAY (reading):

That if any debtor owing $200 or more who is unable to pay his debts shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in which he may reside, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property, valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the requirements of this act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for.

Now, what does this proposition do? In order for any debtor to obtain the benefit of the proposed substitute, if enacted into law, he must make an assignment valid, first, according to the law of the State in which he resides; second, it must be valid according to the law of any other State in which he has property; and third, it must be valid under the laws of the United States of America.

A MEMBER. That is all right.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman says it is all right. No lawyer would ever say that. Any lawyer knows, and the ordinary lay mind knows, that the assignment laws of the different States vary. They are not in harmony. Therefore, if you undertake to get the benefit of this law you would have to make an assignment valid under the laws of several different States. It might be two, three, or ten different States. Your assignment would conflict with itself. Then it would have to be valid under the law of the United States. It must be valid under two or more conflicting laws. There is not a lawyer in the United States of America who could draw up such an assignment and make it valid under the laws of two or more States and also under the laws of the United States.

Then the next section proceeds to declare that—

The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the property is situated.

Therefore, if a man has property in two or more States, the property in one State must be administered according to the law of that State—

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no provision of that kind in the Senate substitute.

Mr. RAY. If the debtor has any property in another State, then it must be administered in that State under the law of that State; so that you have the estate of the bankrupt being administered by the State courts of two or more States; and if you would apply for a discharge, then you must apply in the United States court.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman's argument might be applicable to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], but it is not applicable to the Senate substitute, because there is no provision of that kind in it.

Mr. RAY. It is applicable to the Senate substitute, because I have the Senate substitute before me at this moment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Read that part of it.

Mr. RAY. It requires that the property shall be administered in that way.

Mr. TAWNEY. In what part of it?

Mr. RAY. I have only five minutes, and my time is going.

Mr. TAWNEY. You can not find it in the Senate substitute.

Mr. RAY. There is no question about it. It reads in that way. Now, if you should undertake to proceed in that way, the estate of any ordinary debtor would be eaten up in litigation, first, in the various State courts; secondly, in the United States court. The alleged bankrupt would have to travel from one court to another. The creditors of the bankrupt would be traveling to the State courts, it might be, in two or three or more States, and also to the United States court. That condition would be especially applicable to debtors in the city of Chicago, the city of Cincinnati, the cities of New York and Boston, and other great cities. The proposed substitute has been declared unconstitutional by many great lawyers. There are other objections I can not refer to, but the same were set forth by me in my remarks closing general debate on this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, after having said as much as I have at different times during this debate, trying to say as little as possible consistent with my duty to the committee, I want to say briefly that the propositions which will be submitted under the arrangement that was made have practically been adjudicated in the committee. I do not want any of us, when we get into the House, to misunderstand the situation. With some trifling changes, we shall be facing again the battle which has been fought this morning, and the attempt will be made, by the introduction of a whole bill, to accomplish what failed of accomplishment when we voted down the Stone amendment and the Broderick amendment this morning.

Now, that is all I want to say about that. I think we have pretty clearly expressed the judgment of the committee as to how they feel in respect to this matter. We have yielded at several important points in the effort to get the real judgment of this committee in respect to a bankruptcy bill, and I want to thank the committee for the good spirit that has prevailed on both sides of this question and on both sides of this Chamber.

There has been no crimination; personal abuse has been avoided and the whole discussion for five days carried on in the domain where manhood should always be found, instead of being degraded to the low level of abuse. I want to express another thought, as I see I have the time. Of the committee that has reported this bill, 17 in number, 6 of them are from the West, 8 from the South, and only 3 from the East. It is not sectional; and, as has been developed in the debate, 4 only are against the bill with the voluntary and involuntary provisions we are about to report back to the House. Of the number opposed, 3 of them were from the South and 1 from the West. So you will see that there is no sectionalism at all in the element that brought the bill before this House committee, but it represents in its report every section of the country, and it has been my highest ambition to bring this bill far away from any sectional or partisan standpoint.

Mr. Chairman, the hour having arrived, under the order of the House the committee will rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour fixed under the order of the House having arrived, the committee will now rise and report the bill to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8110) to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and, under the order of the House, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and the bill as amended be passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HENDERSON. Let us dispose of the other amendments.

Mr. BRODERICK. If we can have the understanding that the two substitutes may be offered. I desire to offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that the amendments recommended by the committee have not been agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask that the amendments be agreed to first before we take up the substitute.

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. BRODERICK. That is agreeable.

The SPEAKER. The substitute can be read and be pending, and then the vote will be taken on the amendments first. The Clerk will report the substitute.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Kansas will permit me, I desire to say—

The SPEAKER. The amendments have not been agreed to in the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I thought that they were agreed to by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. That has not been done. But that course can be pursued, if there is no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments agreed to by the committee be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, they will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, one of those amendments, added on page 7, provided that not less than three creditors should sign a petition. There is on page 51 a clause "then one of such creditors" can sign. Now, I ask unanimous consent that the words "or if all of the creditors of such person are less than 12 in number, then one of such creditors" be stricken out, in order to conform it to the amendment which has been carried.

Mr. HENDERSON. What page is that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It is to change "one" to "three," in line 8.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is no objection to that. I think it ought to be done, in view of the other amendment agreed to in committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

There being no objection, the other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Kansas will permit, I desire a vote of the House on my substitute first, and I desire to vote for his substitute if mine should be voted down. I therefore desire to offer this substitute first and take a vote on it.

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding. A vote will be taken first on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand what the gentleman from Texas said, and I would like for him to repeat his statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas said that his substitute should be voted on first.

Mr. HENDERSON. You have not abandoned that?

Mr. BAILEY. No.

Mr. HENDERSON. All right.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will carry out the understanding.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. I desire to make a motion to recommit this bill. Will I have that opportunity after the third reading?

The SPEAKER. That will come up after the third reading.

Mr. HENDERSON. On the final passage of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the substitute.

Mr. DINGLEY. It has been printed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope that leave will be granted.

Mr. BAILEY. The bill has been printed, and I take it that if any gentleman is willing to vote for a voluntary bankruptcy bill he will be willing to vote for this.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The substitute offered by Mr. BAILEY is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8234) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any insolvent debtor, not a corporation, shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia in which he may reside, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the provisions of this act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 2. That such assignment shall convey, subject to all valid liens, all of the estate of the debtor, except such as is exempt by the law of his domicile from execution or seizure for his debts, and shall be for the equal benefit of all his creditors, except with the preferences hereinafter allowed. The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the property is situated, subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That such assignment may contain the following preferences, namely: Debts due to the United States, or to any State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, in which any of the property of the debtor is situated, and debts due to the servants or laborers of the debtor for labor performed or services rendered within six months next preceding the execution thereof.

SEC. 4. That said assignment or cession shall be duly filed or recorded in the manner and in the offices where mortgages and deeds in trust on said property are by law required to be filed or recorded, and the original or a copy thereof, accompanied by a list of the names and residences of all his creditors, and the amount due each, together with a schedule of his property, exempt and unexempt, and a statement of all liens or other incumbrances thereon, all of which shall be verified by the oath of the debtor to be correct, shall, within sixty days from the date of its execution, be filed in the court in which the petition of the debtor is hereinafter required to be filed.

SEC. 5. That any such debtor, within the period of four calendar months from the date of the execution of the assignment, may file his petition in the district court of the United States for the district or the division thereof in which he resides; or, if he be a resident of the District of Columbia, then in the supreme court of the said District; or, if he be a resident of a Territory, then in the district court of such Territory for the district or the division thereof in which he resides, alleging his insolvency and asking for a discharge from his debts. But the petition shall not be filed in any court unless the debtor has been a bona fide resident of said district or division at least six calendar months immediately preceding the making of the assignment, and the petitioner shall deposit with the clerk of the court upon filing his petition $20 for costs.

SEC. 6. That the creditors of the petitioner shall be made parties defendant, and the judge shall, upon the filing of the petition, or as soon thereafter as practicable, make an order declaring the petitioner a bankrupt, and fixing a time and place for the hearing thereof, which time shall be not less than ninety days nor more than six calendar months subsequent to the date of the order; and a copy of such order shall be duly served on each of the creditors named in the list of creditors in the manner following: The service of notice of said order shall be made by mailing a copy of the order to each creditor, directed to the post-office nearest to his residence or place of business or to the post-office at which he is accustomed to receive his letters. The notice shall be mailed within thirty days from the date of said order, by the clerk of the court, and the petitioner shall pay to the clerk for mailing the notice 25 cents for each notice. The said order shall also be published once a week for four consecutive weeks in one or more newspapers to be designated by the court, due regard being had to the general circulation of the same in that portion of the district in which the bankrupt and his creditors reside. The first publication shall be within thirty days from the date of said order, and if the publication of notice shall appear to be irregular the court may order a new publication for such time as the court may decide and appoint another day for the hearing. But publication in a newspaper shall be dispensed with unless it can be made for such cost as the court shall decide to be reasonable.

SEC. 7. That the creditors or any of them may appear and answer said petition on the day named in the order of publication; and if no answer be filed on that day the petitioner shall have a right to an order of discharge from his debts; or, if an answer is filed and upon the hearing it shall appear that the debtor did make an assignment as authorized by this act, and that the same contained a full and complete conveyance of all his unexempt property, and that within three months before the passage of this act no creditor of such debtor had been preferred in any manner except as authorized by this act, and during said time no other act was done or suffered to be done by such debtor respecting his business or estate to prevent pro rata distribution of his estate among his creditors or to give one creditor an advantage over another, or to defraud his creditors, and that no attachment has been levied upon the property of such debtor within three months before the passage of this bill, the court shall order and adjudge that such debtor be forever discharged from the payment of the debts mentioned and set forth in the list accompanying his petition; and such order and adjudication shall be a full, complete, and final discharge of such debtor from the payment of said debts: Provided, however, That if within sixty days after the levy of an attachment the debtor shall execute an assignment or cession of his property and file a petition for discharge as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment, and such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act: And provided further, That the discharge of a debtor from his debts shall not include any debt or obligation which shall have been created in consequence of his defalcation as a public officer, as an executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, or while acting in any other fiduciary capacity; nor any debt or obligation created by the obtaining of money or property under false pretenses. But this exclusion of said debts from the discharge shall take place only when said debts shall be ascertained in the decree of discharge and by the court directed to be so excluded. If the petitioner shall be discharged, property acquired by him, after the filing of the assignment or a copy thereof in the clerk's office of the court of bankruptcy, shall not be liable for his debts created before that time, nor shall any debt created by him after such filing be barred by such discharge.

SEC. 8. That any insolvent debtor who has no property besides what is exempt by law from execution and liability for his debts, may, without making any assignment as provided for in this act, file his petition in the court for the district or division thereof of which he has been a bona fide resident for six months immediately preceding the filing of his petition, alleging his insolvency and that he has no property except his exemptions, and asking for a discharge from his debts as herein provided for, accompanying the same with a list of his creditors; and thereupon the court shall take such proceedings as are provided for in this act for cases where there is an assignment, so far as the same may be applicable. In this case the filing of the petition shall have the operation provided for in the last clause of section 7 as to discharge from debts and the acquisition of property.

SEC. 9. That partners may jointly make an assignment as provided for in this act for separate and single debtors, but in such case the assignment shall contain a separate list and schedule of the partnership, and separate creditors and property; and the preferences allowed by this act shall be for partnership creditors out of the partnership property, and for separate creditors out of the separate assets of the partner giving the preference; and the separate and partnership debts shall be provided for in the assignment in the same way. The petition shall be filed in the district or the division thereof in which the partnership business was carried on up to a period of six calendar months prior to the assignment. If the business has not been so carried on within said period, then in the district or division thereof where all the partners reside, one of whom at least having resided there for six months prior to the assignment; and if they do not all reside in that district or division, then in the district or division in which a majority of them shall reside; or if a greater number do not reside in the same district or division, then in the district or division in which any one of them resides; but in all cases the residence required must be for six calendar months preceding the making of the assignment. If one or more of the partners be deceased, then the survivor or survivors may proceed as in this section provided, but in that case the legal representatives of the deceased shall have such notice as the court may direct.

SEC. 10. That if some of the partners are unwilling to join in such assignment and petition for discharge, then any of them may separately make an assignment of his separate property and file his petition as is hereinbefore provided for; and in the assignment shall include in general terms, with his separate property, his interest in the partnership property after the partnership debts are paid, and the names and residences of his other partners, specifying those in whose possession and control the assets of the partnership or any part of them may be, and such partners shall have such notice of filing the petition as the court may direct. He shall file with his assignment also a list of the partnership creditors and the amount due each, all of whom shall have notice as in other cases of proceedings under this act. The separate property assigned shall first be applied to the separate debts, and the remainder, if any, to the partnership debts.

SEC. 11. That the court, on the hearing of the petition, or as soon afterwards as practicable, shall ascertain whether the partnership property is sufficient to pay the partnership debts. If it be found sufficient, the court shall so adjudge and order the separate property of the debtor to be distributed among his separate creditors; and if found more than sufficient, the court may direct a sale, on such terms as the court may prescribe, of the debtor's interest in the said partnership, and order the distribution of the funds arising from such sale among his separate creditors. But in both these cases the court shall make no further order interfering with said partnership estate. If the partnership property be found insufficient to pay the partnership debts, the court shall make such orders as may be deemed equitable and just to convert said property into money and to wind up the affairs of said partnership and distribute the assets among the partnership creditors. The court shall direct said winding up to be done by one or more of the partners not petitioning for a discharge and designated by the court for that purpose, and shall hold said partner or partners so designated accountable to the court as a receiver, giving to him or them all the powers of collecting and distributing said partnership estate as is necessary therefor, and as might be properly vested in a receiver. But if the court shall deem all of said nonpetitioning partners for any cause unfit for designation for such purpose, or if all of them deemed by the court fit to discharge that duty shall refuse to accept it, then the court shall appoint a receiver with full powers to take charge of said partnership estate and wind it up. And the court shall, in case of insolvency of the partnership estate, make all necessary orders and decrees, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as may be consonant to the rules of equity, in reference to said estate, as in cases of a dissolution of said partnership and a distribution of the assets by decree of a court of equity.

SEC. 12. That the district courts of the United States in the several States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and the district courts of the several Territories are hereby made courts of bankruptcy, with full jurisdiction, both at common law and in equity, to carry out this act and to try and determine all suits and controversies necessary to a full execution thereof. The said courts, for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by this act, shall be considered as always open, and the judges of the several courts may exercise in chambers any jurisdiction conferred on the said courts by this act, and the said courts of bankruptcy shall have power to make all proper rules not inconsistent with this act for the exercise of the jurisdiction vested in them by this act.

SEC. 13. That the court shall have power to appoint a sufficient number of auditors to transact such business as may be committed to them under this act. The auditors shall have power to administer oaths, state accounts, and, under orders of the court, examine witnesses, and perform such other duties not of a judicial character as may be prescribed by the rules of the court. The fees of the auditor shall be fixed by the court, but in no case shall any fee exceed the sum fixed by the laws of the State in which he holds his office for similar services rendered by State officials.

SEC. 14. That all oaths required to be administered in any proceeding under this act may be taken before and certified by any officer of the State in which they are taken authorized by the laws thereof to administer oaths.

SEC. 15. That there shall be kept at each place at which said courts of bankruptcy may be held, by the clerk thereof, a docket, in which shall be entered the filing of each petition and schedule and list and other papers, and a short statement of every order or decree of the court and of the auditors in that case, and a copy of the decree of the court granting or refusing a discharge; and such entries on the docket, together with the papers filed, shall constitute the record in such case. The cost of such docket shall be paid for as other record books and dockets of the district courts are paid for. The fees of the clerk, when not otherwise specified in this act, shall be fixed by the court, but shall not exceed the sum of $5 for service in any case of bankruptcy.

SEC. 16. That this act shall not be construed to annul or suspend the laws of any State now in force or hereafter passed for the relief of insolvent debtors or the distribution of their estates, except so far as the same may be in conflict with the provisions hereof; and that all proceedings under the insolvent laws of any State actually commenced and pending at the date of the passage of this act may proceed to final determination in the State courts. And involuntary proceedings against a debtor under the insolvent laws of any State, which may be commenced after the passage of this act and before the filing of the petition of such debtor under this act to be declared a bankrupt, may also be prosecuted to final determination in the State courts, and the assets of the debtor shall be distributed by said State court. But where such insolvent proceedings shall be pending when this act is passed, or properly commenced afterwards, the debtor may, upon proper proceedings in the proper court of the United States, be discharged from his debts if he would be entitled to such discharge in case he had proceeded properly under this act before any such proceedings had been commenced against him. And the courts of bankruptcy shall make rules for the conduct of such proceedings whereby the insolvent shall proceed to secure a discharge if entitled to it.

SEC. 17. That this act shall continue in force two years and no longer, except as to all proceedings commenced under it within that time, and as to them shall continue in full force and effect until they are finally disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. BAILEY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 120.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Forty gentlemen have arisen in support of the demand for the yeas and nays; not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. On this question the yeas are 88, the noes are 120; and the substitute is rejected. The next question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk proceeded to read the substitute.

Mr. BRODERICK (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, it seems to be generally understood that this is the bill which has been examined and reported by the Senate committee, and I suggest—

Mr. HENDERSON. That must not be done. The Senate committee is not for this bill. I do not want that statement to go out.

Mr. BRODERICK. The bill was reported from that committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. Make your request, but make no argument.

Mr. BRODERICK. I simply wanted to say, Mr. Speaker, that this is the bill which was examined and reported by the Senate committee, with some amendments made here in the House, and as the bill is well understood by members generally, I am willing to waive the reading of it with the understanding that it shall be printed in full in the RECORD.

Mr. TAWNEY. In view of the fact that it is generally understood that this is a purely voluntary bankruptcy act, I suggest that the gentleman ask that sections 17 and 18, relating to involuntary bankruptcy, be read.

Mr. BRODERICK. Very well. They are the two last sections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that no request has yet been made to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill, except sections 17 and 18, and that the whole bill be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. RAY. I will not object to that, Mr. Speaker, provided I can make the simple statement that—

Mr. BRODERICK. I do not care whether the gentleman assents or not. If he wants to object, let him object. I make the request.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman listen?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. RAY. I will not object.

The SPEAKER (after a pause). The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will read sections 17 and 18 of the proposed substitute. The Clerk read the sections indicated, as embodied in the bill which is here printed in full.

That if any debtor owing $300 or more who is unable to pay his debts shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in which he may reside, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property, valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the requirements of this act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for. Said assignment or cession shall be duly filed or recorded in the manner and in the offices wherein mortgages and deeds in trust on said property are by law required to be filed or recorded; and the original or a copy thereof shall, within thirty days from the date of its execution, be filed in the office of the court in which the petition of the debtor is hereinafter required to be filed.

SEC. 2. That such assignment shall convey all of the estate of the debtor, except such as is exempt by the law of his domicile from execution and liability for his debts, and shall be for the equal benefit of all his creditors, subject to all valid liens, except with the preference hereinafter allowed. It shall contain a list of the names and residences of all his creditors, and a schedule of his property exempt and unexempt from execution or seizure for his debts, and the amount due to each creditor, and a statement of the liens or other incumbrances upon his property, all of which shall be verified by the oath of the debtor to be correct, as near as he can make them.

Said assignment shall also contain a provision conveying all his unexempt property, though not specified in said schedule, and shall provide for all his creditors, whether named in the list or not; and the omission of any property or creditor from said list or schedule, or any misstatement as to liens and incumbrances, shall have no effect against the debtor's rights under this act, unless the same be fraudulent; but a creditor whose name has not been returned to the court prior to the decree of discharge of the debtor shall not be bound by such discharge. The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the property is situated, subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That such assignment shall contain the following preferences, namely: Debts due to the United States, or to any State or Territory, and the District of Columbia, in which any of the property of the debtor is situated, and debts due to the servants or laborers of the debtor for labor performed or services rendered within one year. Also, if the debtor be the head of a family, he may prefer a debt which is a lien or incumbrance on his homestead; but no more than $1,000 shall be used for that purpose.

SEC. 4. That the fees to be allowed by said assignment to the trustee or trustees, or the person managing the estate, shall not exceed in any case the amount allowed by the laws of the State in which the debtor is domiciled to executors or administrators for the settling of the decedent's estate in their charge; and should any trustee or other person named in said assignment or by a competent court as manager of the said estate be removed or resign so that it shall be necessary to appoint another person in his stead, then the fees and allowances shall be divided between them, so that not more than the maximum allowable to one shall be allowed to all: Provided, That the fees, including the fees of the assignee, receiver, or trustee authorized by this act, and all other expenses necessarily incurred in the administration of the estate of the debtor and approved by the court, shall be first paid out of the proceeds of the property of said debtor.

SEC. 5. That any such debtor, within the period of thirty days from the date of the execution of the assignment, may file his petition in the district court of the United States for the district or the division thereof in which he resides; or if he be a resident of the District of Columbia, then in the supreme court of the said District; or if he be a resident of a Territory, then in the district court of such Territory of the district in which he resides, asking for a discharge from his debts; but the petition shall not be filed in any court unless the debtor has resided in said district or division at least six calendar months immediately preceding the making of the assignment. The petition shall state the debtor's inability to pay his debts and contain a prayer for a discharge from the debts of the petitioner and an averment that the list and schedule filed in the court are correct as therein amended, and shall be verified by the oath of the petitioner. It shall also contain a schedule and list of any other property or creditors which he may have since the making of the assignment discovered or remembered; and said petitioner may, from time to time, prior to his discharge, amend and correct said list and schedule of property and creditors, so that the same shall conform to the facts. And he shall deposit with his petition for costs such sum as the court may direct, not exceeding $20.

SEC. 6. That the creditors of the petitioner shall be made parties defendant, and the judge shall, on filing the petition, or as soon thereafter as practicable, make an order declaring the petitioner a bankrupt, and fixing a time and place for the hearing thereof, and directing notice to be given, which time shall not be less than ninety days nor more than six calendar months subsequent to the date of the order, and a copy of such order shall be duly served on each of the creditors named in the list of creditors or otherwise made known to the court, in the manner following: The service of notice of said order shall be made by mailing a copy of the order to each creditor, directed to the post-office nearest to his residence or place of business or to the post-office at which he is accustomed to receive his letters. The notice shall be mailed within thirty days from the date of the order by the clerk of the court, and the petitioner shall pay to the clerk for mailing the notice such reasonable sum as the court may allow, not exceeding 25 cents for each notice. The said order shall also be published once a week for four consecutive weeks in one or more newspapers to be designated by the court, due regard being had to the general circulation of the same in that portion of the district in which the bankrupt and his creditors reside. The first publication shall be within thirty days from the date of said order. If the publication of notice shall appear to be irregular the court may order a new publication for such time as the court may decide and appoint another day for the hearing. But publication in a newspaper shall be dispensed with unless it can be made for such cost as the court shall decide to be reasonable.

SEC. 7. That the creditors, or any of them, may appear and answer said petition on the day named in the order of publication, and if no answer be filed on that day the petitioner shall have a right to an order of discharge from his debts. The answer may contest the petitioner's right to a discharge on the following grounds, and no other:

First. That the debtor has intentionally concealed some of his property by omitting the same from his schedule or assignment, and has also intentionally failed to correct said omission as hereinbefore provided for, or has intentionally refused to give information which may aid and assist in recovering any property which ought to be subject to the payment of his debts.

Second. That he has, since the date of three calendar months prior to the passage of this act, conveyed or assigned or concealed his property, or some part of it, or given or suffered a lien or incumbrance thereon, which assignment, conveyance, concealment, lien, or incumbrance was contrived and devised with the actual intent and purpose to defraud his creditors, in which intent the debtor participated.

Third. That the debtor, being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, in addition to the foregoing grounds, shall be refused a discharge if, since said date, he, being at the time insolvent, has given any preference to creditors other than such as are allowed to be preferred in the assignment as provided in section 3 of this act, or since said date has, with intent to give such prohibited preference, created or suffered any lien on his property by attachment, judgment, or otherwise. Should a discharge be refused, the same proceedings shall be had in the administration and distribution of the bankrupt's estate as if he were discharged.

SEC. 8. That all preferences by any merchant, broker, banker, trader, manufacturer, or miner given or suffered after the passage of this act and within four months prior to the assignment by the petitioner, he being then insolvent, other than such preferences to creditors as are herein allowed, are hereby made illegal and void as against the creditors of any debtor who shall make an assignment and file his petition under the provisions of this act; and all the money or other property which may have been given or transferred in such prohibited preferences shall be and remain a part of the assets of the said petitioner and shall pass under the general clause conveying all the debtor's unexempt property by this act required to be inserted in said assignment; and all conveyances or transfers of property made at any time by any petitioner, which by the laws of the State or Territory in which the property is situated are illegal and void or voidable by creditors, or if the transfer be of money, then void or voidable by the law of the State or Territory in which the debtor resides, and all liens or other interest in said property which are prohibited by the laws of a State or Territory wherein it is situated shall be held for all the purposes of this act to be void or voidable by creditors and the property to have passed under said assignment; and it shall be distributed as other property conveyed in the same; and full recovery may be had of the said property so assigned or encumbered within the period allowed by the laws of the State or Territory in which it is situated, or if the property be money, then within the time allowed by the laws of the State or Territory where the receiver resides, and suits in behalf of the creditors for such recovery may be brought by the trustee or other manager of the assignment.

SEC. 9. That if on the hearing of the petition it shall appear that the assignment provided for in the first and second sections of this act has been duly made and filed and recorded as herein provided for, and no valid objection has been presented against a discharge, or, being presented, the same is not sustained by proof, then it shall be the duty of the court to grant to the petitioner a discharge from all his debts to the persons mentioned in his petition, or afterwards disclosed to the court, except the debts excluded by section 10 of this act. But said discharge shall not have the effect in any court to prevent a recovery, by proper proceedings against the property and the persons claiming and possessing the same, of any property which had been prior to the discharge fraudulently or illegally assigned or concealed or encumbered by such debtor, or omitted from his schedule, within such limitation as to time for bringing such suits as is fixed by the laws of the State in which the property is situated. The declaration of the petitioner as a bankrupt shall have the effect, in all courts in which proceedings may be had to subject such property to the payment of the bankrupt's debts, of dispensing with a judgment against the bankrupt as a prerequisite to such proceedings.

SEC. 10. That the discharge of the debtor from his debts shall not include any debt or obligation which shall have been created in consequence of his defalcation as a public officer, or as an executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, or while acting in any other fiduciary capacity; nor any debt or obligation to any surety of the debtor who has paid or may pay any such fiduciary debt or any part of it; nor any debt or obligation created by the obtaining of money or property under false pretenses. But this exclusion of said debts from the discharge shall take place only when said debts shall be ascertained in the decree of discharge and by the court directed to be so excluded. If the petitioner shall be discharged, property acquired by him after the filing of the assignment or a copy thereof in the clerk's office of the court of bankruptcy, shall not be liable for his debts created before that time, nor shall any debt created by him after such filing be barred by such discharge.

SEC. 11. That the district courts of the United States in the several States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and the district courts of the several Territories are hereby made courts of bankruptcy, with full jurisdiction, both at common law and in equity, to carry out this act and to try and determine all suits and controversies necessary to a full execution thereof; and said courts shall have also full power to cause said petitioner or bankrupt, his wife, or either of them, to be examined under oath touching any charge of concealment or illegal transfer of any property of said bankrupt and to issue a writ of ne exeat against the bankrupt to continue in force so long as it may be necessary to have such examination. The said courts, for the exercise of every jurisdiction conferred by this act, shall be considered as always open, and the judges of the said several courts may exercise in chambers any jurisdiction conferred on said courts by this act. But the said courts shall not interfere with, in any manner, the administration of the bankrupt's estate by the trustee or trustees or other manager mentioned in the assignment or appointed according to law unless it shall be made to appear to the said court that said trustee or trustees or manager is mismanaging the said estate or the said trustee or manager shall by petition ask the court for directions as to such management. The court shall also have full jurisdiction to enjoin or otherwise manage or control all suits or actions pending against the bankrupt at the time of filing his assignment in the clerk's office of the court of bankruptcy, as hereinbefore required, and to manage and control all suits or actions pending at that time in his favor, and to cause the same to be prosecuted or defended by the trustee or manager of said assignment, and to make all necessary orders and decrees to secure a proper distribution of the assets according to law.

SEC. 12. That partners may jointly make an assignment as provided for in this act for separate and single debtors, but in such case the assignment shall contain a separate list and schedule of the partnership, and separate creditors and property; and the preferences allowed by this act shall be for partnership creditors out of the partnership property, and for separate creditors out of the separate assets of the partner giving the preference; and the separate and partnership debts shall be provided for in the assignment in the same way. The petition shall be filed in the district or the division thereof in which the partnership business was carried on, up to a period of six calendar months prior to the assignment. If the business has not been so carried on within said period, then in the district or division thereof where all the partners reside, one of whom at least having resided there for six months prior to the assignment; and if they do not all reside in that district or division, then in the district or division in which a majority of them shall reside, or if a greater number do not reside in the same district or division, then in the district or division in which any one of them resides; but in all cases the residence required must be for six calendar months preceding the making of the assignment. If one or more of the partners be deceased, then the survivor or survivors may proceed as in this section provided, but in that case the legal representatives of the deceased shall have such notice as the court may direct.

SEC. 13. That if some of the partners are unwilling to join in such assignment and petition for discharge, then any of them may separately make an assignment of his separate property and file his petition as is hereinbefore provided for; and in the assignment shall include in general terms, with his separate property, his interest in the partnership property after the partnership debts are paid, and the names and residences of his other partners, specifying those in whose possession and control the assets of the partnership or any part of them may be, and such partners shall have such notice of filing the petition as the court may direct. He shall file with his assignment also a list of the partnership creditors and the amount due each, all of whom shall have notice as in other cases of proceedings under this act. The separate property assigned shall first be applied to the separate debts and the remainder, if any, to the partnership debts.

SEC. 14. That the court, on the hearing of the petition, or as soon afterwards as practicable, shall ascertain whether the partnership property is sufficient to pay the partnership debts. If it be found sufficient, the court shall so adjudge and order the separate property of the debtor to be distributed among his separate creditors; and if found more than sufficient, the court may direct a sale, on such terms as the court may prescribe, of the debtor's interest in the said partnership, and order the distribution of the funds arising from such sale among his separate creditors. But in both these cases the court shall make no further order interfering with said partnership estate. If the partnership property be found insufficient to pay the partnership debts, the court shall make such orders as may be deemed equitable and just to convert said property into money and to wind up the affairs of said partnership and distribute the assets among the partnership creditors. The court shall direct said winding up to be done by one or more of the partners not petitioning for a discharge and designated by the court for that purpose, and shall hold said partner or partners so designated accountable to the court as a receiver, giving to him or them all the powers of collecting and distributing said partnership estate as is necessary therefor and as might be properly vested in a receiver. But if the court shall deem all of said nonpetitioning partners for any cause unfit for designation for such purpose, or if all of them deemed by the court fit to discharge that duty shall refuse to accept it, then the court shall appoint a receiver with full powers to take charge of said partnership estate and wind it up. And the court shall, in case of insolvency of the partnership estate, make all necessary orders and decrees, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as may be consonant to the rules of equity, in reference to said estate, as in cases of a dissolution of said partnership and a distribution of the assets by decree of a court of equity.

SEC. 15. That the said courts of bankruptcy shall have power to make all proper rules not inconsistent with this act for the exercise of the jurisdiction vested in them by this act.

SEC. 16. That any person who is unable to pay his debts and owes $200 or more and who has no property besides what is exempt by law from execution and liability for his debts may, without making any assignment as provided for in this act, file his petition in the court for the district or division thereof in which he has resided for six months previously for a discharge from his debts as herein provided for, accompanying the same with a list of creditors, and thereupon the court shall take such proceedings as are provided for in this act for cases where there is an assignment, so far as the same may be applicable. In this case the filing of the petition shall have the operation provided for in the last clause of section 10 as to discharge from debts and the acquisition of property.

SEC. 17. That where any debtor, who, being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, or manufacturer, owing $500, and who is unable to pay his debts, shall make any assignment, transfer, or conveyance of his property, real or personal, or any part thereof, or give or suffer any lien or incumbrance on the same, contrived or devised with the actual intent on his part to make a preference or to defraud his creditors, or any of them, such act when found and ascertained as hereinafter provided shall be deemed an act of bankruptcy; and a creditor or creditors having debts against said bankrupt to the amount of $500 may file a petition against said fraudulent debtor in the court of bankruptcy of the district in which said debtor may reside, alleging such fraudulent acts of bankruptcy. The debtor shall have such reasonable notice of the filing of said petition as the court shall prescribe; and on the day fixed by the court, if the debtor shall answer, denying the facts alleged in the petition, the said court shall hear the parties and the evidence, and if it shall be proven to the satisfaction of the court that such actual fraud was committed with the fraudulent intent and purpose aforesaid, and that the said debtor was at the time of committing said act without sufficient property to pay his debts, or if the debtor shall fail to answer, the said court shall adjudge him to be a bankrupt; and if not so satisfied the court shall dismiss said petition with costs to the defendant.

Either party may demand that said issues shall be tried by a jury under the direction of the court as in other cases at common law.

If the debtor shall be adjudged a bankrupt as aforesaid, then the court shall take such other proceedings by the appointment of an assignee or receiver, and by such other and further orders as may be necessary to recover said property and all other property so found to be fraudulently transferred or conveyed, together with all other property belonging to said bankrupt, not exempt by law from seizure to pay his debts, and to distribute the same among his creditors, excluding from any participation therein the person or persons for whose benefit said conveyance, assignment, lien, or incumbrance was made or suffered, if such person had actual notice of the fraud of the debtor aforesaid.

Said petition shall not be filed unless within four months next after the commission of said act of bankruptcy.

All the other provisions of this act so far as the same may be applicable shall apply to proceedings under this section.

SEC. 18. That this act shall not be construed to repeal, annul, or suspend the laws of any State or Territory now in force, or which may hereafter be enacted for the compulsory distribution of an insolvent's estate among his creditors; nor to interfere with proceedings under said laws for that purpose which shall have been commenced prior to the filing of the petition as hereinbefore provided; and said petitioner shall not be permitted to dismiss his petition after filing the same without the consent of the court; but the jurisdiction of the court shall continue and remain after such filing for the purpose of recovering all property liable to the petitioner's debts and distributing the same among creditors, until full and complete distribution shall be had: Provided, The court may, if it shall deem the ends of justice will be subserved thereby, with consent of two-thirds of the creditors in amount and number, authorize a dismissal of said proceedings.

SEC. 19. That the court shall have power to appoint a sufficient number of auditors to transact such business as may be committed to them under this act. The auditors shall have power to administer oaths, state accounts, and under orders of the court examine witnesses, and perform such other duties, not of a judicial character, as may be prescribed by the rules of the court. The auditors shall also have power to make the necessary orders declaring the petitioner a bankrupt, and for serving notice of filing the petition of bankruptcy and for fixing the day at which a hearing on the petition shall be had. The fees of the auditor shall be fixed by the court, but in no case shall any fee exceed the sum fixed by the laws of the State in which he holds his office for similar services rendered by State officials.

SEC. 20. That all oaths required to be administered in any proceeding under this act may be taken before and certified by any officer of the State in which they are taken, authorized by the laws thereof to administer oaths.

SEC. 21. That there shall be kept at each place at which said courts of bankruptcy may be held, by the clerk thereof, a docket, in which shall be entered the filing of each petition and schedule and list and other papers, and a short statement of every order or decree of the court and of the auditors in that case, and copy of the decree granting or refusing a discharge; and such entries on the docket, together with the papers filed, shall constitute the record in such case. The cost of such docket shall be paid for as other record books and dockets of the district courts are paid for. The fees of the clerk, when not otherwise specified in this act, shall be fixed by the court, but shall not exceed the sum of $1 for service in any case of bankruptcy.

SEC. 22. That this act shall continue in force three years and no longer, except as to all proceedings commenced under it within that time, and as to them shall continue in full force and effect until they are finally disposed of.

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute, the Speaker declared that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 53 members voting in favor thereof.
